The accusations levelled at Libyan officials are of the gravest possible kind. As the warrants which the Lord Advocate will be making public make clear, the charges allege that the individuals acted as a part of a conspiracy to further the purposes of the Libyan intelligence services by criminal means and that those means were acts of terrorism. This was a mass murder which is alleged to involve the organs of government of a state. Libyan officials have been accused of such a crime, not only in Scotland and America, but in France where arrest warrants were issued on 30 October over the destruction of flight UTA 772 in September 1989. We are consulting the United States and other friendly Governments, many of whom lost nationals in Pan Am flight 103, about the next steps.

I understand that the investigation has revealed no evidence to support the suggestion of involvement by other countries. I pay tribute to all those whose untiring work under the direction of the Lord Advocate over almost three years has produced this remarkable outcome. In particular, I pay tribute to the work of the Dumfries and Galloway constabulary and all those in many parts of the world who have helped with the gathering of evidence and information. We are grateful for all the help given to the investigation in many countries.

We expect Libya to respond fully to our demand for the surrender of the accused. The interests of justice require no less. This was a fiendish act of wickedness and it cannot be passed over or ignored.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I thank the Foreign Secretary for his statement, and I join him in congratulating the Dumfries and Galloway constabulary and all other law enforcement agencies and forensic experts, both here and in other countries, whose dogged work, obviously of great brilliance, has resulted in the successful outcome of the investigation.

Nothing can ever console those bereaved by that atrocious act of terrorist mass murder for the loss of their loved ones. However, they may be reassured to know that not for one day have the police rested in their determination to bring the perpetrators to justice. I note that the investigation continues. Have we learnt all that we can learn and implemented all appropriate recommendations—such as reconciling baggage tags with passenger lists—emerging from that terrible tragedy?

The Libyans have for some time been sending signals that they wish to resume relations. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that a test of their sincerity will be whether they deliver to the forces of law and order the men for whom warrants of arrest have been issued? If Libyan protestations of non-involvement in that terrorist act are true, they have nothing to fear from a fair trial. If they do not hand over those men for trial, we shall all know what conclusions to draw. In those circumstances, we shall have to consider what action to take in accordance with international law. For Libya can be received back into the world community only when it is clear beyond doubt that it is no longer involved in instigating, assisting and carrying out acts of terrorism that sicken the civilised world.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. Certainly, as he says, the investigation continues, and one cannot be certain that other evidence may not come to light. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and his predecessor have kept the House informed of developments in aviation security since the disaster. The right hon. Gentleman referred to professions which have been repeated over and over again by Ministers and others of the Libyan Government, that they have turned their backs on terrorism and are now opposed to it. I have warned my colleagues in Europe and elsewhere to be very reserved and cautious about such professions. The right hon. Gentleman set a test with which I would agree.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned, but did not press me on, action which might follow. The House will not expect me to go further than I have today. We are following a course of law. There has been an independent investigation and a decision to issue warrants against two individuals. The next step is to require the handing over of those individuals for trial. Other steps may have to follow, but they are not for today.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): May I add my praise of the Dumfries and Galloway constabulary, in particular the chief constable, Gordon Esson, and detective chief superintendent Stewart Henderson and his team who led the investigation, and also the Lord Advocate and his team for their tremendous support for the police in Dumfries and Galloway?

The people of Lockerbie have welcomed among them the relatives of the 270 who lost their lives in the town. They hope that today's announcement will go some way to easing the sorrow and the memory of those who died in the disaster. The feel that the best result is to bring those murderers to justice. I know that my right hon. Friend will do his very best to do that.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has represented the people of Lockerbie through this period of anxiety and, for some of them, torment with great dignity and perseverance. I am sure that he is right in his conclusion.

Sir David Steel (Tweddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): In addition to the well-deserved tributes that he has paid to the local people, will the Foreign Secretary also recognise the work that was carried out by Army units and other voluntary organisations, such as the mountain rescue teams, which had the anguished task of collecting the human and material remains of flight 103, which enabled the evidence to be pieced together and thus led to the charges that have been brought today? If need be, will he contemplate the possibility of going to the United Nations Security Council to press for the transfer to justice of the alleged perpetrators of that uniquely terrible international crime?

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman is right on his first point, and I add to his words of thanks. For the reason that I have already given, I should rather not be carried further on the consequential steps today. We do not need to use an intermediary to make the demand that has been made by ourselves and the United States. We can do that direct to the Libyans, and that is what we are doing.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): What steps have been taken towards identifying the explosive that was used? Was it Semtex, and if so, what co-operation have we received from Czechoslovakia in terms of giving Semtex and other modern plastic explosives an identifying character, which the previous Czechoslovak Government refused to do?

Mr. Hurd: I should rather not be drawn into describing the evidence in any particulars. As I have said, my hon. Friend can find the Lord Advocate's announcement in the Library. For obvious legal reasons, I should rather not paraphrase it or embroider on it. My hon. Friend asked a perfectly reasonable consequential question. For some time now, we have been in touch with the Czechoslovak authorities about the production and distribution of Semtex and especially about finding a means of identifying particular batches. Those discussions continue.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): What obligations does the Foreign Secretary think that he has towards the British community of about 5,000 engineers and other workers who are working for Brown Root, Sir Alexander Gibb and partners and 36 other British companies which are involved in the great man-made river project? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that my colleagues and I who went to Libya, led by my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant), were assured vehemently—I do not want to be naive about this and can only report back that we were assured vehemently—that Libya was not responsible for the terrible thing that happened at Lockerbie? Will the right hon. Gentleman therefore proceed with the greatest caution, remembering that it is far from clear that the Libyans were responsible for the tragedy of the 1986 bombings and that that responsibility might lie elsewhere, perhaps in Syria?

Mr. Hurd: We are proceeding with care. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will look at what is available in the Library and that he will study it with care in the light of what he heard in Libya to the contrary effect. The hon. Gentleman referred perfectly reasonably to the fact that we have about 5,500 British nationals in Libya. The hon. Gentleman gave the figure correctly. There is no immediate threat, but we shall obviously need to watch the position in that country very carefully. All the British nationals there know that, in the absence of direct diplomatic relations, the scope for consular protection is, in practice, limited, but they should—and no doubt will—keep in close touch with the British interests section of the Italian embassy there.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): In fairness to the Governments of Iran and Syria, with whom we have diplomatic relations, and in view of his comment about there being no involvement from other countries, will my right hon. Friend make it clear that the widespread and detailed reports that the job was commissioned by the Government of Iran from Syrian nationals, who were seized, and was then subcontracted to individuals in Libya, are wholly untrue? In view of the publication of those widespread and detailed reports, and in fairness to our friends in Iran and Syria, does my right hon. Friend feel that he has a duty to make it abundantly clear that, following detailed research, he has discovered that those reports are simply untrue?

Mr. Hurd: The police investigation deals with evidence, not rumours. But it has taken a long time because several lines of inquiry had to be followed not by the Government but by the Scottish police—my hon. Friend will accept that. I deliberately put in that sentence that there was no evidence about the involvement of other Governments because of the consideration which my hon. Friend mentions. He mentioned one part of a line of inquiry. Members of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine general command cell in Germany arrested in 1988 clearly had bomb-making equipment, some of which was superficially similar to the Lockerbie bomb. They may well have had plans to attack civil aviation which were derailed when the arrests were made. But the thorough inquiries along that line failed to reveal any direct link between that group and Lockerbie. There were notable differences—especially the timer—between the bombs in which they were involved in making and the Lockerbie bomb.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is great pressure on business today. We have business questions after this and an important debate. I shall allow questions on this matter to continue for a further five minutes, after which we must move on.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): May I also send congratulations to the constabulary of Dumfries and Galloway? I understand the Secretary of State's reluctance to discuss the consequential steps that Her Majesty's Government may have to take if the Libyans are not forthcoming, but will he give an assurance that he is taking suitable precautions against the consequential measures which the Libyans might themselves adopt? I have no doubt that he recalls the last time that the Government assisted the United States Government in actions against state-sponsored terrorism from Libya. The Libyans retaliated by making substantial supplies of munitions for arms available to the IRA. Shipments came into Northern Ireland during the period when the Foreign Secretary was Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, undoubtedly much to his embarrassment.

I hope that the Foreign Secretary will advise the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, if he has not already done so, that the co-operation that he is supposed to get from the Irish Republic in this matter is a broken reed.

Mr. Hurd: I do not want to be drawn on co-operation with the Irish Government. I informed the Irish Foreign Minister yesterday of the broad scope of the announcement that I intended to make today. The hon. Gentleman is right to this extent: in any steps decided on in consultation and concert with other friendly Governments we shall have to weigh carefully the consequences and precautions that need to follow.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): What is my right hon. Friend's estimate of the chances of the Libyan authorities responding favourably to the extradition request? If, as one must suspect, the chances are pretty low, does my right hon. Friend understand that the House will press him on what course of action the British Government intend to take? Can he at least say today that our Government have a firm and strong plan in mind, especially as we were somewhat weak in dealing with some of the Syrian terrorist episodes from official sources.

Mr. Hurd: I would rather not speculate in answer to my hon. Friend's point, but I note what he says. I am sure that the pressure of which he speaks will reflect strong public opinion.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): Does the Foreign Secretary accept that if the perpetrators of this atrocity are eventually caught, no one will be happier than me? Does he agree that it is unwise to use words such as "success" at this stage and to hand out applause to the various parties involved before a fair trial in front of all the evidence has taken place?

Mr. Hurd: I think that, whatever happens hereafter, anyone who studies the documents in the Library or anyone who has followed the investigation will realise that it was a remarkable and complex investigation. That is what I have said.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Under what legal authority were the warrants issued? Was it the domestic application of a multilateral convention? If so, is not that an excellent precedent for dealing with war crimes committed in Iraq and Yugoslavia?

Mr. Hurd: That is not really a question for me, but the warrants were clearly issued under Scottish law. It was a straightforward matter and the crimes committed were committed under Scottish law.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): I, too, congratulate the Scottish police force and its international colleagues on the excellent work that they have done. Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the greatest tribute that we can pay to the innocent victims is to ensure that the perpetrators of the crime are brought to justice? Will the right hon. Gentleman explain exactly how that will be done? Will it be done through an international organisation such as the United Nations or will there be individual state action? Given the obvious Libyan involvement, will the right hon. Gentleman guarantee that there will be no diplomatic recognition of Libya while Gadaffi remains in power?

Mr. Hurd: I do not want to range wider than I have. A crime of mass murder has been committed. There has been an independent investigation, and as a result warrants have been issued against two individuals who are officials of the Libyan Government. We and the United States Government have asked that the two individuals be handed over. We have done that directly and there is no ambiguity about it. We await the response.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Later, after business questions.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: My point of order is on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: That does not matter. I will take the point of order later. That is the usual procedure.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: No, Mr. Speaker. My point of order is on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take the hon. and learned Gentleman's point of order at the usual time.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: As a former Law Officer, why was I not called to ask a question about a prosecution in Scotland?

Mr. Speaker: I think that we shall have the business statement from the Leader of the House first.

Business of the House

3.51 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): May I ask the Leader of the House to tell us the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John MacGregor): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 18 NOVEMBER—Second Reading of the Competition and Service (Utilities) Bill

TUESDAY 19 NOVEMBER—Second Reading of the Education (Schools) Bill

WEDNESDAY 20 NOVEMBER AND THURSDAY 21 NOVEMBER—Debate on the European Community on a Government motion

FRIDAY 22 NOVEMBER—Debate on nuclear defence on a motion for the Adjournment of the House

MONDAY 25 NOVEMBER—Second Reading of the Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill

Motion on the Library Charges (England and Wales) Regulations

The Chairman of Ways and Means is expected to name opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committee B will meet at 10.30 am on Wednesday 20 November, to consider documents Nos. 4173/91, 4174/91 and 4175/91 relating to copyright and neighbouring rights.

Relevant Reports of European Legislation Committee
HC 29-xii (1990-91) and HC 29-xviii (1990-91)].

Dr. Cunningham: When we debate the Education (Schools) Bill next week, will the Leader of the House ensure that the Secretary of State for Education and Science publishes the report that he commissioned on the future of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools, which seems to have been suppressed by the Secretary of State? Is not this a clear example of the double standards of the Secretary of State for Education and Science? He introduces a Bill requiring schools to publish more information about their activities while he is suppressing information about the activities of his own Department. There could be no greater deception of the public and parents.

When can we expect to see the terms of the motion that is to be debated next week on developments in the European Community? I hope that the Leader of the House recognises that it would be of interest and, no doubt, of benefit to all his right hon. and hon. Friends, as well as to the Opposition, to see the terms of the motion as soon as possible. In addition, it would be helpful if we could also know, and quickly, who will be speaking from the Government Front Bench during the two-day debate. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will quickly be able to help us with that information.

May I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to early-day motion 136?

[That this House notes with deep concern the state of health care within the Parkside and Riverside health authorities which has prompted five consultants and 10 general practitioners to call for an inquiry into allegations that both authorities are failing to meet legal requirements on patient care; and further urges the Government to conduct such an inquiry as a matter of great urgency.]

As the right hon. Gentleman will see, the motion, which concerns the Parkside and Riverside health authorities, was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe). Is the Leader of the House aware that doctors and consultants have alleged that those authorities are failing to meet their statutory duties in patient care because of a lack of resources? Is not this a serious state of affairs? Does not it cast great doubts on the efficacy of the Government's policies towards the health service? Will we have a statement from the Secretary of State for Health next week about the two authorities?

Will it be possible to have a debate next week on electoral reform in the Conservative party? Has the Leader of the House seen the quotes in newspapers today about his colleagues behaving as if they were "rooms full of imbeciles", to quote the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens)? What about the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), who had to climb on to the table to get his ballot paper? After all that the Government have had to say about the conduct of elections and ballots in trade unions, is not it shameful that they cannot even guarantee one person one vote in their own party?

Mr. MacGregor: On the hon. Gentleman's question about the Education (Schools) Bill, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science made it clear in the House on 6 June that the review of HMI, to which reference was made in a newspaper this morning, was internal advice to Ministers, and that he did not intend to publish it. It is for Ministers to make up their minds on any internal advice from Departments, and there is often a great deal of it from different areas within Departments.

My right hon. and learned Friend has made his decisions clear. He has informed the House about a number of relevant facts and about other matters that follow from those decisions, and I have no doubt that he will do so again in the debate next week. The Government will be making the position absolutely clear.

Dr. Cunningham: But not publishing the report.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. and learned Friend will make his position on the decisions that he made absolutely clear, and he will fully report to Parliament on them.

On the question about the European debate next week, I confirm that, because of the great importance of the matter and, as the hon. Gentleman said, the extensive interest in it not only in the House but elsewhere, we are arranging for the motion to be published tomorrow. The House will be able to consider the terms of the motion well in advance of the debate.

Dr. Cunningham: What about the Government's speakers?

Mr. MacGregor: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have to consider such matters. I shall, in the usual way, inform the Opposition and others about who those speakers will be.

[Mr. MacGregor]

The hon. Gentleman requested a statement on the Parkside and Riverside health authorities. I do not think that that is necessary, because the facts are clear. Indeed, those facts dispute a great number of the allegations. More money is spent in Riverside and Parkside districts than anywhere else in the North West Thames region. This year, patient care activity at Parkside is likely to be up 30 per cent. on last year. Riverside is carrying out routine elective surgery and waiting lists are falling. No less than £206 million is being invested in the new Westminster and Chelsea hospital, which will be the most modern teaching hospital in the country. In view of those facts and that statement, I do not think that a further statement is necessary.

Finally, the hon. Gentleman referred to a certain election, in which there was a great deal of interest. Under our rules it is for the outgoing chairman and his committee to decide how the election is conducted.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Following the statement of our right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, will my right hon. Friend arrange for a debate on the relative benefits of the investigative and prosecuting services in England and Scotland? As the investigation has resulted in an announcement—although our right hon. Friend was shady in saying so—[HON. MEMBERS: "Shady?"] Our right hon. Friend was cautious in saying that the investigation has resulted in charges of the murder of 260 people, conspiracy to murder, and various statutory contraventions of aviation legislation. As that is due alone to the particular characteristics of the investigative, prosecuting, criminal and corroborative services in Scotland, will my right hon. Friend arrange a debate, just as a reminder that when those who are accused are convicted, if found guilty, they will not thereafter get away with it as they do in England, thanks to the rottenness of English law?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. and learned Friend paid tribute to the work of the investigating authorities in this case and he has made his point about the Scottish authorities. I do not think that it is necessary to have a debate and I do not want to enter into the issue now.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Following the clear precedent set by the Secretary of State for Health with regard to expenses for the Cleveland inquiry, can we expect the Secretary of State for Scotland to make an announcement next week that he will give funding to the Orkney islands council to assist with the expenses being incurred there with regard to the judicial inquiry into events in South Ronaldsay rather than the whole burden falling on some 15,000 poll tax payers in Orkney?

Before we debate the Education (Schools) Bill next week, can we be told whether the Government intend to withdraw the current Bill and issue a new one, because, as things stand at the moment, the section requiring information from schools in England and Wales applies to Scotland only and the section requiring information from schools in Scotland applies to England and Wales only? Will there be a league table of Cabinet Ministers on their attention to detail?

Mr. MacGregor: We have no intention of withdrawing the Bill, but I shall consider the hon. Gentleman's point. I shall draw his first point to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): My right hon. Friend has given the good news that we are to have a two-day debate on Europe next week, but will the announcement that we are to learn the terms of the motion tomorrow cause embarrassment on the Opposition Benches? Given that they have changed their minds seven times on the principle of the EC, that may not give them enough time to change it again, or it might encourage them to incorporate in their amendment the views of the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) as expressed in The Daily Telegraph earlier this week.

Mr. MacGregor: As I understand it, it is many more on the Opposition Benches than the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney. I have no doubt that those points will be made in the debate. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the large number of times that the Labour party has changed its policy on the issue. Ours has been clear for many years.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Is the Leader of the House aware that, on average, one member of the armed forces dies on duty every week, some of them while training, but the Ministry of Defence refuses to disclose full details of the boards of inquiry, causing deep distress to the relatives who are entitled to the facts? May we have a debate on that next week please?

Mr. MacGregor: I cannot promise a debate, but I should like to say something about it, because I know that the right hon. Gentleman has an early-day motion on the subject. We well understand and greatly sympathise with the grief and distress of the relatives of service men and women killed in the course of their duties. It is never the Ministry of Defence's intention to exacerbate that by withholding information on the circumstances surrounding the death. However, there are legitimate reasons why some documents, including boards of inquiry reports, must remain confidential to the Department. To assist bereaved relatives the MOD will always provide, on request, a statement summarising the board of inquiry report and will be as helpful as possible in answering any subsequent questions.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): I endorse the point made by the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley). My right hon. Friend will know that a constituent of mine, Simeon Ferrante, died on parachute training and during the two years since that date his father has been trying most energetically to get to the facts, not just to find out what happened to his son, but to ensure that a similar accident does not happen again. The problem with the board of inquiry is that there is no alternative way of testing the evidence and making clear whether the MOD has some faults to put right. It is essential that we have a debate so that the MOD understands that its policy of secrecy puts it always in the wrong.

Mr. MacGregor: I have given a fairly full answer to the question and I would simply say to my hon. Friend that, as he will know, there are ways in which he can pursue the matter in the House. I will just repeat that the MOD endeavours to be as helpful as possible in answering any questions on individual cases.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): In view of the remarks made by the Leader of the House to the Committee studying the question of changing parliamentary hours, when he suggested that Members of Parliament should have only a four-day week, will the right hon. Gentleman have a few words within the next few minutes with the Secretary of State for Energy, and tell him to withdraw that section of the Coal Industry Bill that seeks to allocate a larger number of working hours—up to 48 hours a week—to miners? That shows the Government's hypocrisy, for they are prepared to recommend four-day weeks for Members of Parliament and Cabinet Ministers, but longer hours for miners working underground.

Mr. MacGregor: I am very surprised with the hon. Gentleman, who obviously has not read my comments to the Committee. I said that Members of Parliament also have substantial constituency functions to undertake, and Fridays and weekends are often the only times when right hon. and hon. Members representing constituencies outside London can perform them. I was looking for ways in which, included within the very lengthy period that we spend in the House during the week—which is well beyond 48 hours—Members of Parliament could more easily attend in their constituencies during weekdays. I am sure that I speak for nearly every right hon. and hon. Member when I say that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is misleading the public if he is suggesting that Members of Parliament would work only a four-day week if sometimes the House did not sit on Fridays.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is increasing support in the country for a national lottery? Will he arrange a debate on that subject—if not next week, then before Christmas—so that the views of the House may be heard?

Mr. MacGregor: I do not want to discourage my hon. Friend, but such a debate certainly cannot be arranged for next week and, as we have a great deal of business to complete before Christmas, I do not see much opportunity for a debate in Government time before then.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Leader of the House make a statement next week on early-day motion 137, which concerns the proposed closure of Westwood hospital?

[That this House notes that, shortly after this Government rubber stamped approval for the second hospital trust in Bradford, the trust announced closure proposals for Westwood Hospital for mentally handicapped people which will involve dumping patients into varying degrees of community care in order to sell off the land for residential development from this tranquil sheltered site which should be the basis for a village community for the mentally handicapped; and recognises that instead patients will be treated like pawns by a group of trust managers who put profit and puffed up salaries before patients whilst riding roughshod over the wishes of relatives and patients alike in an act of betrayal towards the mentally handicapped, one of the most vulnerable sections of our community.]

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that that second Bradford trust hospital was based on a false prospectus, because during the period of the application—which was so eagerly rubber-stamped by the Government—no mention was made of the fact that the trusts would close a hospital for mentally handicapped people against the policy of the Department of Health, which encourages village communities for such people? Instead of the site in question being used to benefit the mentally handicapped, it will be sold off for residential development and the hospital will be closed—which will be a serious blow against the provisions for mentally handicapped people.

Mr. MacGregor: I looked into that matter, because the hon. Gentleman has raised it before. The Bradford project to which he refers long predates the establishment of the local NHS trust and is all about providing more homely community facilities for the people concerned. All the revenue from the sale will be reinvested in community services. The hon. Gentleman should support that project, rather than denigrate local efforts and mix them up with NHS trusts—which are, across the country, already demonstrating that they are a successful method of reforming the NHS—as is the case at Guy's.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): In view of the considerable constitutional implications of the outcome of the Maastricht summit, will my right hon. Friend consider devoting more time to debating developments in the European Community, so that all the views of Back Benchers can be expressed? If my right hon. Friend cannot devote more time to hearing the views of Back Benchers, how are the wishes of the British public to be adequately expressed?

Mr. MacGregor: We are allowing substantial time to enable the House to debate those matters, including a two-day debate next week. My hon. Friend will realise that I must bear in mind the very important business that the Government have to get through in the current Session, which will require many Second Reading debates before Christmas.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): In view of widespread concern about the workings of opted-out hospitals, and of the implications for an area such as my own if an application is approved, will the Leader of the House arrange a debate both on what was in and what was out of the Select Committee on Health's report on that topic? Must we wait for such a debate until the Privileges Committee has succeeded in swatting the Tory sneak?

Mr. MacGregor: I am making arrangements with the Clerk for the Committee to meet as soon as is practicable, but I certainly do not think that we shall be able to have a general debate on the matter in the forthcoming weeks. As I have said, we have a great deal of other business to handle.

Mr. James Cran (Beverley): It is indeed welcome news that we are to debate the future of the European Community next week. In the light of what has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), however, will my right hon. Friend think again about the amount of time that is to be allowed? I know perfectly well what my right hon. Friend has done to secure a two-day debate, but the fact remains that most Back Benchers will be crowded out. Essentially, the debate will be reserved for Privy Councillors, former Ministers and the like, and we shall not get a look-in.

[Mr. James Cran]

If my right hon. Friend is unable to do anything about that problem, will he at least ensure that no statements are taken on those two days? Statements would further curtail Back Benchers' time.

Mr. MacGregor: I have nothing to add to what I said earlier. Given all the business that is ahead of us, I feel that two days constitute a large amount of time. I shall, of course, endeavour to avoid the scheduling of statements on those days, but sometimes—today, for instance—a statement is needed urgently, and can be made only on a specific day.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): I understand that a new Director of Catering has been appointed, and I wish the lady well. May I ask her to examine, as one of her first duties, the continued abuse of our catering facilities by outside organisations? An organisation known as the Tobacco Alliance, for instance, is currently writing to newsagents throughout the country telling them that they are invited to tea at the House of Commons, provided that they bring along their Members of Parliament. That, surely, is a breach of privilege.

Mr. MacGregor: I seem to recollect that the way in which catering facilities are made available for activities in which outsiders can participate was examined recently. I did not know of the specific case referred to by the hon. Gentleman, but I am sure that those concerned will take note of what he has said.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Further to what was said by the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) and my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed), may I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 776?

[That this House, conscious of the fact that real care for the men and women of our armed forces has enabled our country to rely, even to the point of ultimate sacrifice, upon their loyalty, steadfastness and efficiency in times of grave national threat, is astounded to note that, when digging a trench during an official Army exercise in Canada in July 1989, three men of the Grenadier Guards (Adrian Hicks, John Ray and Sean Povey) detonated a six year old unexploed shell which was not only rendered them limbless but caused them such grieivous wounds that Mr. Ray and Mr. Povey are still, after almost two years, in receipt of hospital treatment; notes that the Ministry of Defence find themselves unable, on the grounds of unattributable negligence, to pay compensation; and calls upon the Prime Minister to review this case personally and to ensure that, regardless of the possible legal responsibility of some unknown nation who failed to 'clear' the shell some six years previously, Her Majesty's Government is seen to follow truly a policy that shows an appreciation of human understanding, human dignity and the value of a human life on earth by awarding generous compensation and a return of the accumulated legal costs to these youthful British Grenadiers.]

Despite the successful conclusion of the case, the tabling of that motion indicated that something is very wrong with the present legislation relating to compensation for those who are injured in the course of their duties in the armed forces. The problem, essentially, is that currently the onus is on an injured soldier, sailor or airman to prove negligence by the Government. Surely the onus should be on the Ministry of Defence, as a good employer, to prove negligence by its personnel. In the meantime, the Government merely suggest that service men take out personal accident insurance. Surely the Ministry of Defence should take out blanket insurance cover for all its personnel.

Mr. MacGregor: As my hon. Friend knows, the matter has been discussed before. As I recall, the early-day motion concerned a specific case. I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces spent a great deal of time in reaching a conclusion that proved satisfactory for all concerned.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will the Leader of the House reconsider the suggestion by my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) that a debate on internal matters be held next week to avoid a repetition of yesterday's unseemly and undignified scene? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, in the event of any such debate, the parliamentary Labour party would be entirely willing to supply scrutineers for internal Tory elections to ensure the fairness that, apparently, did not operate yesterday?

Mr. MacGregor: I do not agree; I think that the process was perfectly fair. What yesterday's events demonstrated was the great enthusiasm within the Conservative party to discuss and vote on European matters.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Since, in practice, most of next week's two-day debate on Europe will be dominated by the thunder and lightning of the twilight of the gods and godesses in the Privy Council, will my right hon. Friend consider extending Wednesday's debate, when there will be no vote, to midnight to give the ordinary squaddie a chance to take part?

Mr. MacGregor: I am not sure that that is an appropriate description. I have to take into account the need to give adequate time for debate and also the wish, expressed in most of the responses to the Committee chaired by my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling), that the House should not rise too late at night on these occasions. I shall give thought to my hon. Friend's request, but without commitment.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): May I draw the Minister's attention to clause 17 of the Education (Schools) Bill which relates to an exclusively Scottish matter in what is otherwise an English Bill? It is yet another example of Scottish matters being shoehorned into English legislation. It means also that decisions will be taken by Members of Parliament with no knowledge and experience of or participation in the Scottish education system; the Conservatives have no electoral mandate in Scotland. Will the Minister consider transferring this particularly Scottish clause to the Scottish Grand Committee or to a Scottish Standing Committee for consideration, or drafting a separate Scottish Bill in order to allow informed comment and decision making on it?

Mr. MacGregor: But I would point out to the hon. Gentleman that Scottish Members are entitled to participate and frequently do so in many debates and votes on many English matters, including the whole of the region of East Anglia. I have not heard them complain about their ability to do that.

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): Further to the points that have been raised by my hon. Friends about the European debate and in the interests of fairness to those who sit on the Opposition Benches, I wonder whether my right hon. Friend has done his mathematics to ensure that there will be time for at least a 10-minute speech to be made by each of the 42 Labour party Members who have distanced themselves today from the position of the leader of their party, including the hon. Members for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett)?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend makes a fair point, but I suspect that quite a number of those 42 will, for one reason or another, not wish to participate in the debate.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): Is the Leader of the House aware of the 22,000-signature petition, handed in to No. 10 Downing street on Tuesday, which calls for urgent action by the Government to stem the badly misnamed practice of joyriding? Why are the Government not giving the matter urgent priority? People's lives are being disrupted daily by that practice, and every day that the Government delay further lives are in danger of being lost.

Mr. MacGregor: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman's description of joyriding. That is absolutely the wrong word to describe the dreadful practice that takes place. I agree also with him about the need to have legislation as quickly as possible. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees with me that it is important that it should be drafted correctly. The Government intend to bring forward legislation as soon as they possibly can. As I hope and believe that such legislation has support on both sides of the House, I hope that we can pass it speedily.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for an early debate on the work of the national health service trusts? Is he aware that Guy's hospital, the flagship trust, has been able to report that there has been an 8 per cent. increase in the number of patients treated and a substantial reduction in waiting lists and that it will be giving NUPE employees a Christmas bonus and a salary increase in January? Is not that the sort of progress that anyone who cares for the national health service will welcome?

Mr. MacGregor: I have seen the excellent progress report from the Guy's NHS trust. I am sure that it will be followed by others. I hope that a great deal of publicity will be given to that progress. It illustrates how well the reform is moving after a very short time. I cannot, however, promise a debate next week.

Mr. Gordon McMaster (Paisley, South): During next week's debate on nuclear defence, will the House have an opportunity to debate the case of the British nuclear test veterans? Is the Leader of the House aware that the Government's continued refusal to pay just and adequate compensation to these victims of Britain's nuclear tests is becoming less and less credible as more and more evidence accumulates?

Mr. MacGregor: That will be a matter for the Chair, but the debate will be fairly wide, as it is to be on the Adjournment of the House.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Will the Leader of the House guarantee that in next Friday's debate full account is given to the supremely important issues raised in early-day motion 157?

[That this House recalls that five months before the start of the Gulf War, on 19th April 1990 (Official Report, column 1013-4) the honourable Member for Newport West requested the Government to initiate investigations at the International Atomic Energy Agency into the Iraqi nuclear weapons programme, and that the then Minister of State at the Foreign Office, the Right honourable Member for Bristol West, replied that Iraq was a party to the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty, "and as such has undertaken not to develop nuclear weapons. We expect Iraq to abide by her international obligations. We do not envisage taking the specific action outlined by the honourable Member."; notes that in a parliamentary answer on 11th November 1991 the Minister of State at the Foreign Office the honourable Member for Grantham, replied to the honourable Member for Newport West "We now know that Iraq circumvented IAEA safeguards in seeking to develop a nuclear weapons capability. This is a cause for concern. The IAEA is considering how to strengthen the system.".]

It recalls that five months before the start of the Gulf war the Government had refused a request to increase the international surveillance of Iraq's nuclear weapons programme on the extraordinary grounds that Iraq had signed the international non-proliferation treaty and the Government believed that Iraq would abide by its obligations and would not build nuclear weapons. As those conditions still exist and 30 other countries might be deceiving the international community, is not it crucial that we now have proper international surveillance of all those unstable countries that might be building nuclear weapons as Iraq would have done? If the war had not started, Iraq would have continued to deceive the world and would have nuclear weapons by now. Is not the most important issue to create world peace by reducing the proliferation of nuclear weapons?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman knows well the Government's position on the proliferation of nuclear weapons. It seems that he has already made his speech for next Friday. It is likely that that could be covered in the debate, but I shall draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence the fact that the hon. Gentleman has raised it.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): May I press the Leader of the House further on the proposed closure of Westwood hospital? Is the Secretary of State for Health required to approve the closure and the disposal of the grounds—estimated to be worth at least £11 million—for residential development? Is he aware that, in the bogus consultation exercise before the establishment of the second trust in Bradford, there was no word about the closure of the hospital or the flogging off of the grounds? Is he aware that earlier this year——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We cannot have a debate on this. Will the hon. Gentleman ask a question about next week's business please?

Mr. Madden: The chairman of the health authority told me earlier this year that there was to be a 50 bed——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman ask a question?

Mr. MacGregor: That is a bogus question for the business statement because it is not asking for a debate on a particular point. However, I shall draw the matter to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): With regard to the request made to the Leader of the House to extend next Wednesday's debate to midnight, may I point out that I have the Adjournment debate that night and I would rather be called at 10 o'clock than at midnight?

With regard to next Wednesday's meeting of European Standing Committee B, will the Leader of the House impress upon his ministerial colleagues the need to dispatch the relevant documents to the members of that Committee in plenty of time? The Department of Energy has set a fine benchmark in that regard and other Departments should attempt to achieve that record.

Mr. MacGregor: On the hon. Gentleman's first point, I have noted with interest the view that he expressed. It shows the different considerations that I have to take into account when reaching decisions on questions of business. I shall bear it in mind.

On the second point, the hon. Gentleman knows that I am anxious that, wherever possible, Departments should get the documents to the members of the European Standing Committees as early as they can. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy will have noted the tribute paid to the good lead given by his Department. I am keen that as many Departments as possible should send out the documents quickly. Of course, as the hon. Gentleman knows, the matter is not always in our hands, because some of the documents come rather late from the European Community to the Departments.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): In light of a dramatic increase in crime nationally and, in particular, in my constituency, can we have a statement next week on police numbers and police authority budgets? Will the Leader of the House ask the Home Secretary whether he would be prepared to meet Labour Back Benchers individually to discuss policing problems in their constituencies?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman's second point is not for the business statement. On the first point, with the business that we have next week, it is unlikely that we shall be able to have a specific statement on the question of police numbers.

Points of Order

4.23 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have given notice of my point of order to you and to the Secretary of State for Education and Science, who is in his place. It relates to the Education (Schools) Bill which is due for its Second Reading next Tuesday. Page 382 of "Erskine May" concerns the citing of documents not before the House and makes it clear that a Minister may not

"read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he is prepared to lay it upon the Table."

It is well known that the Education (Schools) Bill, which seeks to privatise the schools' inspectorate, is a matter of great controversy. The Bill is based partly on an internal review of Her Majesty's inspectorate which the Secretary of State has refused to publish. I disagree with his refusal, although I realise that he is entitled to take that position. He says that it is a confidential document.

That document was today leaked in part in The Independent and the newspaper also contained my allegation that the Secretary of State may have misled the House in relation to figures that he quoted last week in the House. Normally, when Ministers face the problem of leaked documents, they refuse to make any comment on the content of the document or, sometimes, on its existence. In doing so, they maintain clear security from the contents of page 382 of "Erskine May". In this case, the Secretary of State has today issued a public statement disputing various parts of the report in The Independent and he has sought to quote from other aspects of the internal review which he has said is so far confidential. If I may——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not a point of order. It would be more correct to raise the matter in debate. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was here earlier, but a question on the matter was raised with the Leader of the House during business questions and he answered it. It is not a point of order for me.

Mr. Straw: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, you may wish to take time to consider the point of order and it is, indeed, a point of order. By his statement today, the Secretary of State has shown his readiness selectively to quote from the review outside the House. Hon. Members of all parties may wish to quote inside the House next Tuesday what the Secretary of State has said. The right hon. and learned Gentleman will no doubt wish to quote from the report. In those circumstances, and given the readiness of the Secretary of State to quote from the report outside the House, surely it is incumbent on him now to lay the report on the Table. It is a point of order for you, Mr. Speaker—although you may wish to take time to consider it—because page 382 of "Erskine May" makes the position absolutely clear. If a Minister wishes to quote from a report or state paper, he must lay it on the Table.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I will explain briefly to you, to the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) and to the House why the hon. Gentleman is mistaken in what he has just said. I announced to the House in reply to a parliamentary question that we were carrying out the review of Her Majesty's inspectorate. I made it clear that it would be an internal review carried out by my officials and that it would remain confidential on the usual basis that advice to Ministers remains confidential.

As the hon. Member for Blackburn correctly said, there appears to have been an unauthorised leak to The Independent——

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): As opposed to an authorised leak?

Mr. Clarke: Not an authorised leak, but a very unauthorised one.

Not surprisingly, I have commented on the newspaper article. My comments address the article and point out that the proud possessor of the leaked document has drawn some fairly ridiculous conclusions from what he had in front of him.

The question whether I misled the House has been raised. The hon. Member for Blackburn has previously bandied about the numbers. He refers to numbers that were put forward for the size of the inspectorate, which The Independent says come from the review carried out by officials on the basis of their proposition. I have given the House the figure of 175 members of Her Majesty's inspectorate, based on the opinion of the senior chief inspector and myself about the number of people required to carry out my policies. The independent, all-powerful HMI needs 175 people to carry out its duties. That figure remains accurate and perfectly straightforward. I have not misled the House in any way and the hon. Member for Blackburn should not make such ridiculous statements.

Mr. Speaker: I think that this is all part of the debate that will take place next week. It is not a matter of order for me. [HON. MEMBERS: "It is."] I repeat that it is not a matter of order for me. It has absolutely nothing at all to do with me. I did not issue the document.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): We are entitled to seek your advice, Mr. Speaker. The Secretary of State has been quoting from the report and the rules in "Erskine May" are clear—if Ministers refer in the Chamber to documents or to reports, they should table them. Is not the best way to clear up the matter in the interests of the Secretary of State and of parents whose children will be affected—of whom I am one—for us all to see the report?

Mr. Clarke: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish that the Opposition would at least listen to what I say. The hon. Gentleman will find that I did not quote the report, and I advise the Opposition to concentrate not on nonsense in The Independent but on the policy of the Bill which will be debated next Tuesday. It will create a stronger and more powerful inspectorate and will introduce regular reports to parents on the results of its inspections. The Opposition should stick to the issue rather than to silly legalistic nonsense.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As a simple fellow, I seek your ruling on a simple question. If it is in order for a male member of the House for the most honourable reasons to take his dog into the Division Lobby—the dog looking after him—why is not it in order for a female hon. Member to take her baby into the Division Lobby? After all, hitherto at any rate, women are the only things that bear babies.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not responsible for such matters. I think that I shall leave it at that.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your advice on early-day motion 142 which has been tabled by 17 Opposition Members and which criticises my conduct in an issue in my constituency. Are we to allow a situation to arise in which two local councillors, one of whom will be my opponent in the general election, can instigate on the Order Paper without any investigation an early-day motion that criticises me and which is signed by 17 Opposition Members, none of whom has taken the trouble to talk to me about the rent rises—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will allow the hon. Gentleman to finish.

Mr. Hind: If that is to be allowed, it will mean that, with his colleagues, every Conservative candidate for a Labour-held seat could initiate early-day motions that could equally be signed in ignorance by Conservative Members and we shall have 650 early-day motions every day. They would blight the Order Paper and abuse the system. Is not it time that the matter was sorted out and that members of the Opposition talked to other hon. Members instead of stabbing them in the back for political purposes?

Mr. Speaker: I deprecate the use of the Order Paper for personal attacks on hon. Members, but the early-day motion involved was in order. If it had not been in order, that would have been brought to my attention by the Table Office but that was not the case. We had better proceed.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your advice on this morning's Hansard. I refer to columns 1061-78 and to oral questions. Some Scottish Back Benchers have every sympathy with your earlier strictures on the need for Front-Bench spokesmen and Ministers to offer concise answers to questions. If one reads the exchanges between the Front Benches, one sees that that is where most of the time was taken up. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of Scottish Questions next month, to remind Front-Bench spokesmen and Ministers of your earlier strictures.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has done that himself. In the interests of Back Benchers, I must stress that lengthy questions and answers from the two Front Benches take time from the Back Benchers, and I hope that that will be borne in mind.

Orders of the Day

Coal Industry Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: There is considerable pressure to speak in the debate, and I propose to put a cautionary 10-minute limit on speeches between 7 and 9 o'clock. However, if Members called before that time bear the limit in mind I hope that it may be possible to relax it later in the evening.

4.35 pm

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. John Wakeham): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

This Bill is of great importance to British Coal, enabling the corporation to continue the restructuring of the industry which is essential for its future.

Clause 1 extends the availability of restructuring grant by three years from March 1993 to March 1996 and raises the ceiling on the payment of grant from £1,500 million to £2,500 million. That ceiling will be increasable by order to £3,000 million. Restructuring grant was introduced by section 3 of the Coal Industry Act 1987. It provides support for British Coal's expenditure on redundancy, early retirement, transfers and retraining. It also assists the finances of British Coal Enterprise.

The existing ceiling on the grant is likely to be reached during the next financial year. Without restructuring grant British Coal would face heavy losses and a financial crisis. It is clearly necessary to raise the limit, but the increase is only an increase in the limit. It is not based on a specific view of what any future manpower rundown may be.

The actual requirement for restructuring grant payments will be determined primarily by the degree to which British Coal succeeds in cutting costs further and winning business.

Clause 2 concerns the repeal of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1908.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): The 1908 Act is most important. Has the Secretary of State arranged for it to be available for us to read? The Act concerns more than just the number of hours to be worked. It has wider implications.

Mr. Wakeham: The Act is available in the Library. I do not have a copy of it here, but I shall explain what the Government have in mind.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Mr. Wakeham: I had better make a little progress first, then I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Clause 2 concerns the repeal of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1908. That Act, which regulates hours of work, has long been recognised as out of date by most of those working in the industry—mineworkers and management alike.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley) rose——

Mr. Wakeham: The 1908 Act restricts hours of work to a prescribed period of no more than 7·5 hours. Everyone working in the industry knows that to be too rigid a constraint. The limit reflects neither the latest mining methods nor good mining management.

Mr. John Cummings (Easington): How does the right hon. Gentleman know?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman will not know anything if he shouts instead of listening.

Mr. Cummings: I was 29 years underground.

Mr. Wakeham: Absolutely. If the hon. Gentleman listens to the arguments he may learn something to his benefit.

The 1908 Act does not take account of the technology that has been the backbone of the industry's modernisation and increasing competitiveness. Mechanisation has been under way in the coal industry since the 1950s.

Over a period of 40 years or so the 1908 Act has been becoming increasingly impractical and constraining. It is by adopting greater flexibility in working practices, by developing improved modern management and by investment in modern mining technology that the industry has achieved the improvements in productivity that are so vital to its future.

The safety of mine workers is of paramount importance. The Government's policy is that the much-improved standards that have been achieved must be maintained. The Government will not bring forward any measure that will prejudice safety. Unnecessary fears have been raised by the Opposition.

Mr. Redmond: Does the right hon. Gentleman believe that there should be special legislation for those working underground?

Mr. Wakeham: That question arises in relation to the European directive——

Mr. Redmond: Not just that.

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman has asked me a question; perhaps he will do me the courtesy of listening to the answer.

What replaces the Act depends entirely on whether it is possible to meet the conditions of a European directive that covers these matters. The hon. Gentleman has rightly referred to safety. Before we presented this legislation we consulted the Health and Safety Executive, which advised us that no questions of safety arise under these proposals.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Does the Secretary of State agree that the Health and Safety Executive consists of paid public officials whose responsibility is to the Health and Safety Commission, which has not been consulted?

Mr. Wakeham: As I understand it, the Health and Safety Executive is presenting its views to the Health and Safety Commission. The latter will then know what the position is.

The commencement order for this Act becomes operable after Royal Assent. I give an undertaking that I have no intention of signing the necessary papers to operate the commencement order until a European directive is in place—or at least until I have come to the House to explain what is happening. I have no other intentions at the moment. Opposition Members would be a little wiser if they allowed me to explain the Govenment's intentions before being so free with their criticism. I shall explain what I intend to do and then allow hon. Members to intervene.

The safety of mine workers is of paramount importance. Government policy is to maintain the much-improved standards that have been achieved. The Government will not introduce any measure that will prejudice safety—the fears that have been raised are ill-founded.

The repeal of the 1908 Act will not prejudice safety. The improving record of mine safety is due primarily to technology. Last year there were 11 fatalities at British Coal workplaces and I am sure that we all agree that that was 11 too many. But at the beginning of the century, when the 1908 Act was introduced, there were more than 1,000 fatalities a year.

The harsh labouring conditions of that era led to the legislation which prescribed a limit of 7·5 hours per shift. But, like so many industries, coal mining has seen major improvements in working conditions over the past 80 years. The industry has long left behind the days of hewing coal by pick and shovel. No one who has a genuine interest in the future of the industry wants to see its efforts being hampered by the antiquated legislation of a bygone era. Conditions in the coal industry have been transformed by mechanisation and by the application of modern technology. Outdated constraints clearly need to be removed if the coal industry is to be able to compete.

The proposed European directive on working time would present the British coal mining industry with a difficult challenge. The directive is still under debate and the outcome is uncertain, but it is clear that a combination of the 1908 Act and the directive could increase the industry's unit costs. It could also reduce the earnings of its employees.

If the directive comes into force, it will apply immediately to British Coal as a public sector body, while private sector companies will not have to comply until the United Kingdom implementing legislation came into force. To ensure that British Coal would have time to negotiate new working agreements, we are including a provision in the Bill to enable the 1908 Act to be repealed by order at the appropriate moment.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The Minister said that the Government regard safety in the mines as important, so would not it have been reasonable if the Government had entered into a modicum of consultation with the National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers, whose statutory responsibilities involve safety? Does not he understand that one reason for the advances in safety in the mines has been the existence of legislation such as that which he proposes to dismantle?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman's second point is far from realistic, but the first part of his question was perfectly reasonable. To conclude the negotiations in time we have to repeal the Act in steps because the European directive, if agreed, will come into force immediately. I do not intend to sign the order repealing the 1908 Act until the European directive comes into force, but by the time that happens we must have held the negotiations because the directive comes into force immediately.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): I concur with the Secretary of State's remarks about British Coal's excellent safety record, but does he agree that all the advances in safety in mining took place during the period of nationalisation when there was a mines inspectorate, an independent body under the jurisdiction of the Department of Energy? Even now, under the Health and Safety Executive, it can make independent judgments.

Mr. Wakeham: I have considerable doubt whether the hon. Gentleman is right that all the improvements in safety have taken place since nationalisation. I certainly agree with him that we should pay tribute to the significant improvements in safety since 1946 when the mines were nationalised. They have largely been a result of enormous improvements in technology and investment.

Mr. Skinner: The Government say that they will oppose the bureaucrats in Brussels in respect of the advances in the social charter, so why must they take orders from the Common Market on increasing the hours of underground workers? The right hon. Gentleman should have a word with the Leader of the House, who last week suggested to the Select Committee on Sittings of the House that Members of Parliament and Cabinet Ministers should work a four-day week. This hypocritical Government are introducing a measure to increase the hours of miners. If it is all right for Members to work a four-day week, why is it not right for the miners?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not think that my hon. right hon. Friend's proposals for a shorter working week necessarily applied to Cabinet Ministers, or even to hon. Members, who perform many duties outside the Chamber.

The European directive's impact on the private and the public sectors will vary significantly. The public sector must implement it immediately, but it cannot do so while the 1908 Act is in place. I shall not sign the order repealing that Act until we have an alternative because I fully recognise that a proper regime must be in place.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton) rose——

Mr. Wakeham: I shall give way for the last time.

Mr. O'Brien: Coalmining has certainly moved away from the hewing of coal at the coal face and has introduced mechanisation. The right hon. Gentleman assured the House that before signing any document he will wish to ensure that safety is the paramount consideration.

Will the Secretary of State consider the conditions that prevail underground? As a result of mechanisation, there are conditions which must be reckoned with. Before he signs away the 1908 Act, will he consult the people working in the industry about the current conditions underground, including dust and other hazards? Instead of agreeing to longer hours per shift for people working in those conditions, will he consider the demand for shorter working hours? That is how we should be making progress in the mining industry. There should be shorter days underground, not longer days.

Mr. Wakeham: It is not for me to negotiate the hours of work or anything of that kind. The 1908 Act will not cease to operate in the British mining industry until it is replaced by an alternative which will be arrived at either through a European directive or as a result of proposals in the House. I have no intention of producing such proposals at the moment.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The implication of the proposal to repeal, not to revise, the legislation is that there will be no statutory control from this Parliament over the minimum and maximum number of hours that people work underground. However, the Secretary of State has not mentioned another option whereby the British Government, in negotiations in the European Community, try to ensure that the same requirement in the 1908 Act is part of the directive. The Secretary of State has not addressed that. He has not told us why it cannot be perfectly permissible and legitimate for a similar provision to be contained in European Community legislation.

Mr. Wakeham: The European directive will cover the same issues about hours of work as those covered in the 1908 Act, although not necessarily in the same way. However, that matter has not yet been negotiated. I will not repeal the 1908 Act or stop it operating until we have an alternative which can be discussed. We cannot move into a period when there are no regulations. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) is right. The European directive could be as restrictive and restraining as the 1908 Act. As I have said, we believe that there are shortcomings in that proposal.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Wakeham: No, I have been most generous in giving way and I must now make progress.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Wakeham: I will give way to my hon. Friend in a minute, but I must first make progress or we will be here rather longer than we should.

The coal industry's performance over the last five years has been remarkable by any standards. British Coal has raised productivity by over 100 per cent. since the 1984-85 strike. It has cut colliery unit costs in real terms by over 40 per cent. during the same period and last year British Coal achieved a bottom-line profit for the first time in 13 years.

Those achievements, which I am sure are welcomed on both sides of the House, would not have been possible without massive support from the Government. That support includes the £6 billion provided under the Coal Industry Act 1990. That £6 billion provision enabled the corporation to carry out a major financial reconstruction. The debt burden of the corporation was reduced by over £4 billion and it was relieved of annual interest payments of some £400 million. As a result, British Coal's financial results now more accurately reflect the performance of the current ongoing business. I have been informed by the chairman that British Coal is once again on course this year to make a bottom-line profit.

That excellent improvement in British Coal's performance has not been achieved without difficulty and sacrifice. The market for British Coal has been in decline for decades and in recent years British Coal has also needed to deliver coal prices falling in real terms. In the past five years over 70 collieries have closed and the number of employees has been reduced by over 100,000.

This problem is not new. The coal industry has faced difficult periods of adjustment and reconstruction in the past, including during the term of office of the Labour party from 1964 to 1970. In April 1964, there were 576 pits. By the time Labour left office in 1970, the number had fallen to around 300—a reduction of nearly half, down by 280 collieries and about 170,000 men. It is a tribute to the work force and management that the recent contraction in the industry has been achieved without disruption.

British Coal has been able to offer alternative jobs to any man who has chosen to remain in the industry. Those who have decided to leave have received substantial sums in redundancy payments. They can also obtain retraining and counselling through schemes run by British Coal Enterprise.

The Government's commitment to the industry goes far beyond providing the finance needed to ease the problems of redundancy. I want to reaffirm the Government's commitment to an ongoing economic coal industry and its long-term future. Since 1979 we have approved investment expenditure of over £7·5 billion in the coal industry. That is more than all other Governments since the war taken together. We have also provided grants totalling over £11 billion in addition to the £6 billion provided last year. We expect to provide nearly £700 million in grant this year.

Our commitment to the coal industry is not only demonstrated through financial assistance. Last Session, for instance, we tackled the long-standing problem of subsidence. The provisions of the Coal Mining Subsidence Act 1991 should greatly improve the coal industry's relationship with those under whom it mines.

What of the future for British Coal? Our main aim is to ensure that we achieve the largest coal industry that is economically sustainable. The main challenge for the industry is to try to win the best possible outcome from the contract negotiations with the generators. The measures that I have described are essential to the future of the industry and would be necessary whether the industry's future lay in the public or the private sector.

Of course coal, not just in this country but worldwide, faces challenges over the next five to 10 years. Here in Britain the power generators, the market for the bulk of the corporation's coal, are turning increasingly to environmentally friendly gas. Our policy and the policy of all Administrations over the past two decades has been to support diversity of fuel supply. Nuclear, renewable energy and gas all now have key roles to play as well as coal. Increased use of gas in generation brings enormous benefits to the electricity consumer and to the environment.

The consumer benefits from the lower electricity prices that will result. The environment benefits from lower levels of carbon dioxide and sulphur dioxide emissions. The threat of global warming and the problems of acid rain are reduced. The Government are not going to hinder the development of the competitive market that we have created with the privatisation of power generation by interfering with the use of cost-effective gas. We are not convinced by doomsters who say that all coal not extracted now will never be accessible in future. It is foolish to subsidise coal extraction now when improvements in mining technology are likely to make much of that coal exploitable on an economic basis in later decades.

I turn for one moment to the Labour party's plan for the coal industry. On the surface that plan is straightforward. It is, according to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), to maintain the coal industry at its present size—by protecting it at all costs from the rigours of competition that everyone else has to face. How would the Opposition do that? They would stop coal imports and restrict the mining of opencast—or so they say. They would "deter" the use of gas for power generation and phase out nuclear power—or so they say. They would renationalise the national grid, at huge cost to the taxpayer, and attempt to force the generators to burn high-cost coal—or so they say.

The coal industry recognises that it has to live in the real world—not in the twilight zone that some Opposition Members seem to inhabit. For the truth, as most people now know, is that Labour could not fulfil any single one of the pledges that I have just outlined.

Restrictions on imports would be contrary to the European internal market—less than 14 months away—and to our obligations under GATT. They could not restrict opencast coal mining without putting at risk 10,000 deep-mined jobs. They could not "deter" the use of gas because gas stations are already being built and the gas has already been contracted for.

The hon. Gentleman's pledge

"to maintain the coal industry around the size it is now" is not worth the paper it is written on. He could not fulfil his pledge—nobody could. I challenge him to say specifically what he would do to fulfil his pledge and to say what the costs to the consumer, the environment and the taxpayer would be.

I make just one other point on Labour's plans, although I am sorry that the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) is not here to take note. That concerns the inherent contradiction between Labour's environmental commitments and its energy policies. There is no way in the world that the Labour party could ever meet its commitments on carbon dioxide and sulphur dioxide emissions at the same time as meeting its commitments to the National Union of Mineworkers. If Labour is determined to phase out nuclear power and to deter the use of gas, at the same time as meeting the environmental obligations that it has set itself, it would have no option but to destroy the coal industry. Opposition Members can seek to protect the environment or they can seek to preserve the coal industry at its present size—but their policies will not do both.

The Government believe that the best protection for the coal industry is to become economic and we have demonstrated our commitment to that objective, with finance, support and action. I believe that it is time for the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras to give the House a proper explanation of his party's policies and what it would do—and perhaps with a little more precision than is usual for him.

I do not normally comment on what the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras says before breakfast, but I have received a message from the management of British Coal that they are incensed at his suggestion this morning that there would be any reduction in safety standards in the British coal industry. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take this opportunity to withdraw any such suggestion.

Finally, British Coal must face the challenges to its market head on. No one can deny that much has been accomplished in the years since the miners' strike. Much still needs to be done. British Coal must fight for every tonne of commercially viable business. It must build on the increases in productivity already achieved. Further productivity gains are essential if the growing competition from other fuels and imported coal is to be met.

The Government have provided strong backing and very large sums of taxpayers' money to enable the industry to restructure and increase productivity further. The Government will continue to give strong support to this important industry. I commend the Bill to the House.

5.3 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): As the House will recall, on Thursday 31 October, in the debate on the Queen's Speech the Government said that they would "continue to prepare for the privatisation of the . . . British Coal Corporation."—[Official Report, 31 October 1991; Vol. 198. c. 6.]

On Friday 1 November, they published this Bill. Nothing could be clearer—the Bill is intended as the next step on the road to coal privatisation. It does two things. First, it doubles the money available for redundancy payments from £1,500 million to £3,000 million, and extends the date that that will be available beyond the existing deadline of 1993. That is necessary, because, if privatisation occurs, there could be as many as 30,000 redundancies in 1993-94 alone.

Secondly, the Bill would reduce the cost of mining by reducing safety standards, by repealing the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1908. Before the Secretary of State quotes British Coal in support of his contention that lengthening mining hours will not affect safety, I remind him that Mr. Moses of British Coal once gave his opinion that a 10-hour shift would not be objectionable.

We will vote against the Bill because it tampers with the safety of mines and miners. It is a disgrace that the Government have brought it forward.

Let us look first at the doubling of the restructuring grant to pay for redundancies. The previous Coal Industry Bill was before the House almost exactly two years ago, in November 1989. It doubled the redundancy fund from £750 million to the present £1,500 million, and extended its period of availability to the present limit, 1993. We said then that that was to finance as many as 30 pit closures with the loss of 30,000 jobs in the three and a half years until 1993. The Secretary of State accused me of scaremongering. British Coal called us Jeremiahs.

I invite the House to consider what has happened. In November 1989, there were 77 collieries in operation. Since then, British Coal has closed 21 collieries and announced the proposed closure of another five. Against our estimate of 30 closures in three and a half years, we have seen 26 closures in the first two years. That is worse—far worse—than anything we predicted. When the Tories challenge our predictions now, people should remember what they said about our predictions two years ago.

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): I understand the passion that one sometimes hears from hon. Members who have been down the mines, but then I look at the record and see 295 pit closures under Labour Governments, and I am not surprised to find that Labour mining Members are to test the loyalty of their leader at a meeting. If Labour Members do not trust the Labour party to look after the mines, why should the miners?

Mr. Dobson: If the hon. Gentleman from that well-known mining area of Battersea has been sent in by the Tory Whips to ask a question based on a totally misleading article in today's Evening Standard, the best that he can do is to keep quiet.

Mr. O'Brien: I have worked down the pit for more than 30 years, so I know exactly what the conditions are. The figures that were given and the suggestions that were made two and a half years ago were on target. Notices have been issued to collieries in west Yorkshire that, within the next six months, there will be a further rundown of manpower. In my own colliery, Sharlston, there is an indication that there will be a rundown of manpower. The figures that we gave the previous time we discussed mining legislation were correct.

Included in the Bill is the intention to take away the concessionary fuel allowance for miners' widows and retired miners that has been available ever since the industry began. Why should that happen in this legislation? May we have an assurance that retired miners and miners' widows will not lose that fuel allowance?

Mr. Dobson: I regret to say that I cannot offer any assurances about what the Government or British Coal might do. In the light of the assurances that have been given by successive Secretaries of State for Energy and chairmen of British Coal, it is clear that nobody in their right mind would accept any assurance from any of them because they scarcely ever deliver.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: I shall give way in a moment.

I do not have the up-to-date figures for the number of job losses since November 1989, but when 18 pits closed, 20,000 jobs went too. Those closures not only harm miners, their families and the coalfield communities, but the whole country.

Mr. Gerald Howarth rose——

Mr. Dobson: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will let me get on a bit.

Taxpayers will have to pay out a fortune if pits are closed. Enormous sums will be required in benefits, and there will be not only a massive loss of income tax, but also of other taxes, including VAT. Those are the consequences for the taxpayer of this scale of closure.

Another consequence of pit closures for the rest of the country is the effect on the balance of payments. In the first nine months of this year, 15 million tonnes of coal were imported. I remind the Secretary of State that foreign coal also produces sulphur dioxide and carbon dioxide and cannot be said to make a big contribution to the environment. That 15 million tonnes in the first nine months of this year compares with the 15 million tonnes that were imported for the whole of last year and grotesquely exceeds the 4 million tonnes that were imported in 1982. We all know that PowerGen are investing in more and more coal handling facilities at ports around the country and that they intend to import more and more coal and to put more and more British miners out of work by closing more and more British pits.

During the summer the Government appointed Rothschild merchant bank to advise them on coal privatisation. Lest anyone should think that an objective, professional and expert approach will necessarily be adopted, I remind the House that the privatisation unit at Rothschild is run by an exceedingly neutral and objective person—the Tory candidate for Hampstead and Highgate. At great expense to the taxpayer, Tory merchant bankers have produced secret reports that can be considered in secret by Tory Ministers. The Secretary of State has refused to publish any of the Rothschild reports. Some of them have been leaked—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] When I published the information that Rothschild considered that only 28 of the then 60 collieries would remain after privatisation, I faced the usual charge of scaremongering. The hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) went on the radio in the east midlands to say that I did not know what I was talking about—[Interruption.] Well, the next thing that happened was that the Financial Times produced another document that proved that Rothschild had whittled down its figure of 28 to just 14 collieries that might survive the privatisation process.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): Will the hon. Gentleman specifically deny that it was he who leaked the Rothschild report to the power generators and that the Labour party was entirely responsible? In doing that, does he accept that he has jeopardised British Coal's commercial position and sold down the river the prospects of every single person who works for British Coal?

Mr. Dobson: If the hon. Gentleman had taken the trouble——

Mr. Hughes: Answer the question.

Mr. Dobson: Yes, I will answer that question in a minute, but I shall make my own speech in my own way —[Interruption.] Let me make it clear that if the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) had read the Rothschild report, which I made public—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] Yes. If he had read it, he would have found that Rothschild recommends that the Secretary of State should get involved in the discussions between British Coal, National Power and PowerGen to ensure that, for a start, it got a good contract. I sold no one down the river—[HON. MEMBERS: "You did."] Well, I shall tell the hon. Member for Harrow, West and his hon Friends that I have not received any complaints from any miners in this country about releasing information about the Tory bankers who advise Tory Ministers behind the backs of the miners and their families and who seek to treat them like chattels to be bought and sold.

Anyone reading that report from Rothschild will understand why the Secretary of State kept it secret. It envisages a deep-mined output of just 20 million tonnes in this country, and imports of 30 million tonnes; reducing the number of deep mines by 1993-94 to 20, which will then fall to 14 or even 12. It also envisages 33,000 redundancies in 1993-94 and that most of the British coal industry will end up in foreign ownership. In other words, there will be more pit closures and more redundancies. The Government need this legislation so that they can find the money for the redundancy bill that will prepare the industry for privatisation.

Mr. Péter Rost (Erewash): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the Rothschild report also recommends a miners' buy-out as one of the privatised options? As the Rothschild investigation considered that to be a reasonable prospect, does the hon. Gentleman support it?

Mr. Dobson: Either the hon. Gentleman has another version of the Rothschild report or he has not read the one that I have. The report specifically warns miners to be wary of investing and buying shares in their own pits. Creswell and Gedling collieries in the Nottinghamshire coalfield have closed in the past three weeks. If the miners there had owned shares in their own pits, they would have lost their savings as well as their jobs. That is what Rothschild warned. It does not recommend the course of action to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

The Secretary of State and his right hon. and hon. Friends still deny our assertion that the coal industry will be virtually destroyed. On Monday, the Secretary of State once again described me as a Jeremiah. I assume that that was intended as an insult, but modern Tories are an ignorant lot. I went to a grammar school in York that was founded during the reign of Henry VIII by an archbishop of York. It was wise to learn a little bit about the Old Testament. I learnt that Jeremiah prophesied dire consequences if the people in charge did not mend their ways. He was denounced by the powers that be, who ignored him. They did not mend their ways. The destruction that Jeremiah predicted then happened. I do not take it as an insult if I am called a Jeremiah. He was certainly a better forecaster than any Tory Minister. In deference to one of my newest hon. Friends, the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright), I should add that that Tudor archbishop of York would probably have been on our side in this debate because his potted history relates that he was born a poor scholar in the parish of Hemsworth near Pontefract. Let us have no more Tory talk about Jeremiahs.

We do not need a prophet's crystal ball because we have the Rothschild report. We know what the hard-faced Tories think should happen to the coal industry. They want to run it down, close it down and sell it off. They would be closing the cheapest and most efficient coal industry in Europe. It costs three times as much to mine a tonne of coal in Germany as in Britain. The dearest coal in Britain is cheaper than the cheapest coal that is mined in Germany.

As the Secretary of State referred to Radio 4, I shall do so. This morning on Radio 4's "Today" programme he said that we needed to import cheap coal to stop the rise in the price of electricity. As he is not a physician, I cannot say, "Physician, heal thyself." But as he is an accountant, I can say, "Accountant, read thine own figures." Over the past five years coal has not increased in price whereas electricity has increased in price by 30 per cent.

It is not the fault of British miners that electricity prices have risen. The coal industry and the coalfield communities look set to be sacrificed on the altar of the Tory privatisation dogma. They have already been severely damaged by electricity privatisation and now they are being damaged by preparations for coal privatisation. The impact of coal closures on not only miners but on entire communities is truly awful. As that impact is felt we get crocodile tears from Tories around the country who feel that their seats might be at stake.

Speaking about the closure of the Coventry colliery, the hon. Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. Maude) is reported as saying that he wanted to "make sure that everything is being done to protect the interests of my constituents who work there."

I wonder whether this is what he meant. It is taken from the Coventry Evening Telegraph of 9 November this year:

"Humiliated miners have been forced to play bingo for the chance to work. Hundreds of miners were given raffle tickets and were told to wait in the pit canteen for their numbers to be called out.

The 'winners' received an interview with private contractor Thyssen which is recruiting salvage teams at the colliery. The losers were simply ordered into the redundancy line. On Tuesday there was a queue of men three deep and 50 yards long desperate for work with the contractors. The following day, they were giving out tickets to the men who were told to wait in the canteen where a man with a microphone called their numbers out."

I assume that that is what a Treasury Minister sees as protecting the interests of his constituents. That is the humiliation which is heaped on miners, their families and their communities. We do not oppose generous redundancy terms for the miners. We do not want them to be made redundant in the first place.

On safety, we start off with some clear facts. British coal mines are the safest in the world. They are twice as safe as those in Germany, five times as safe as those in the United States and 50 times as safe as those in South Africa, Colombia or the Soviet Union. Any Government should take pride in that record, seek to keep it up and, if possible, improve it. Any Government who had pride in this country would seek to promote the raising of standards around the world to match our standards. Any Government with any real pride in our people would get on to our European partners and say, "Bring up the standards in your coal mines to our standards." God knows, not many British industries are three times as efficient and twice as safe as their German counterpart. But that is true of the coal industry.

However, the Government are not thumping the table and telling other countries to bring their standards up to our level. Quite the reverse. They are repealing the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1908—the only legal limit on the hours worked underground—and applying the European directive on working time.

Mr. Lofthouse: I agree with my hon. Friend that British mines are the safest in Europe and probably in the world. However, they are not as safe as they used to be. British Coal is not using the safest method of supporting the roof. I have here a death certificate of a miner killed at Allerton Bywater colliery only a few weeks ago. Under cause of death it says:

"following and due to a fall of roof associated with the application of tension to roof bolts in the course of his employment at Allerton Bywater Colliery".

The chief inspector of mines has told the Energy Select Committee on two occasions that that is not the safest method. The safest method of supporting roadways is by arch girders. British Coal is no longer using that method.

Mr. Dobson: Indeed. I was going on to refer to the way in which the Government, including, I regret to say, the mines inspectorate of the Health and Safety Executive, have gone along with proposals from the management of British Coal which damages safety. This morning British Coal was apparently so incensed by what I said that an official rang the Secretary of State to complain. I have to say that no one rang me.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: I wonder why.

Mr. Dobson: The hon. Gentleman might be surprised to know how often British Coal rings me on other matters.

The European directive sets minimum standards for all workers in all workplaces. It does not even pretend to cover especially hazardous work in especially hazardous workplaces. The directive makes it clear that Britain can still apply laws and regulations which provide greater protection for health and safety.

It is a bit rich for the Secretary of State for Energy to say that in future he will rely on the European working times directive at the self same time as the Secretary of State for Employment is foaming at the mouth, denouncing it as a gross interference in British affairs and seeking to persuade his fellow Ministers in Europe not to adopt it.

The Government's proposals affect the safety of miners. Setting aside issues such as decent industrial relations and promises that other people have made, one would have thought it common courtesy for the Secretary of State at least to ask the miners whether they thought that the change was reasonable. Has the Secretary of State consulted the miners? No. Has he consulted the underground supervisory staff? No. Has he consulted the colliery managers? No. He has included the provision in the Bill without even consulting the Health and Safety Commission. It is no good him saying that he consulted the officials of the executive. The commission is responsible and it has not received a paper. Its secretariat told me that it might not even be able to consider it before Christmas. However, the provision was put in the Bill on 1 November.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: No.

This is the legislative approach of Tombstone: legislate first, ask questions afterwards. The proposal epitomises everything that the Government are about. They are a Government of know-alls. They think they know better than the people whose lives are at risk in the mining industry what is good for safety in that industry.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo rose——

Mr. Dobson: No.

In their comfortable offices in Whitehall they think that they know what is best for the safety of men working a mile or more below ground. The industrial accident that Ministers are most likely to suffer is to trip on a carpet or cut their finger on the sharp edge of a piece of paper. Yet they think they know more about safety than a man working a coal cutter three miles under the North sea off the Durham coast.

However, I have to say that that has not been a common characteristic all along.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: In a moment. Let me finish that point.

When the right hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Walker) was Secretary of State for Energy he appeared before the Energy Select Committee and said that no steps to repeal the 1908 Act would be taken without consultation with the miners. He said:

"I think if the industry were agreed that this"— getting rid of the 1908 Act—

"was beneficial to the industry and the talks I have mentioned could take place successfully"— that is with the representatives of the miners—

"I would presume any Government . . . would be very happy to change the legislation . . . The reason why the legislation was originally put in was very much on safety grounds, the importance of the protection of safety. Judgement on that would have to be taken by the Health and Safety Commission and, if it were judged to be totally safe," — after all the consultations and if the industry agreed,

"and no deterioration in safety resulted,"

he said that perhaps changes could be made. Why has this Secretary of State not kept the promise of that Secretary of State? In legal terms, they are both the same person. The Monopolies and Mergers Commission produced a preposterous report which, although all the witnesses mentioned safety in their evidence, did not mention safety in its part of the report. Even the MMC stated that if there were to be changes in working practices they should take place after consultation.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Throughout the hon. Gentleman's speech there are references to the 1908 enactment as a great piece of safety legislation. I have read the Act. Has the hon. Gentleman bothered to go to the Library to read it? There is nothing in the Act that is remotely connected with safety. It deals solely with hours worked below ground. If the Act has been amended to introduce safety provisions, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will tell us. Has it been amended to include safety considerations rather than simply hours worked?

Mr. Dobson: Dearie me. If the hon. Gentleman believes that the length of working hours has no connection with safety——

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): —he should not be in the House.

Mr. Dobson: My hon. Friend is right. If that is what the hon. Gentleman thinks, he should not be in this place.

Miners believe that a coal mine is an especially hazardous place in which to work. The deputies believe that and so do the colliery managers. Surely they are right to take that view. If they are right, surely miners are entitled to special laws, including legislation on working hours, which have a clear bearing on safety. Surely miners are entitled to expect special laws to cover the time that is worked underground.

When the Secretary of State responded to an intervention on this issue, he seemed to suggest that he did not believe that there was a need for special legislation for miners. It seems that he does not believe that they need any special protection.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: I shall not give way for the moment.

The Secretary of State suggests that as practices down the mines have changed since 1908 there is no need now to have such short working hours. I remind Conservative Members that in 1908 the bulk of miners lived in terraced houses within five or 10 minutes walk from the pit. Nowadays, some miners, especially because of successive mine closures, have to drive 20 or 30 miles to work. They have to change and then they go down the pit. They get on a manrider and travel perhaps two or three miles before they reach the face. The hours that pass between leaving their own front door and returning to it are longer now than they have ever been in history.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: No, I shall not give way.

I recognise that the Secretary of State is not likely to be convinced by anything that I say to him. However, I have referred to the 1908 Act and I have read the debates that took place on that measure. If the Secretary of State is not convinced by what I have to say, I recommend him to read Hansard of 6 July 1908. On that day, 120 Tory Members voted against the measure passing through the House. For good measure, they then voted against the introduciton of old age pensions. Those Divisions took place on the same day.

Mr. Wakeham: I was reluctant to interrupt the hon. Gentleman when he was telling us that he went to the Old Testament to learn how to run a modern coal industry, and when he went on to tell us about the debates that took place in 1908. I want, however, to make the position clear.

I am proposing that the 1908 Act be replaced by the European directive. If the directive is not satisfactory and is not agreed, the 1908 Act will stay and we shall then consider what to do. We have no proposals yet. Secondly, during the process of preparing the Bill the Department has, of course, kept the Health and Safety Executive informed of proposals to amend the 1908 Act. The executive will be recommending to the Health and Safety Commission later this month that this repeal would not diminish safety in mines.

Mr. Dobson: The HSE is not sacrosanct. The executive is heavily involved in general measures relating to mine safety and in proposing changes that everyone in the industry, with the exception of the top brass of British Coal, think will make mining more dangerous. I am not surprised when I hear what the executive's officials may have done. If the Secretary of State is not convinced when we say that miners deserve special treatment, I recommend him to read the closing speech that was made on behalf of the Government on 6 July 1908. The then Minister read an extract from a book that spelt out the advantages of shorter working hours for employees and for employers, and for society as a whole. He then said:

"But it may be said that these arguments are general, and that special circumstances existed to differentiate the case of coal-miners from that of many other industries in this country. Others have spoken of the heat of the mine, the danger of firedamp, of the cramped position, of the muscular exertions of the miner, at work in galleries perhaps a mile under the ground. I select the single fact of deprivation of light. That alone is enough to justify Parliament in directing upon the industry of coal-mining a specially severe scrutiny and introducing regulations of a different character from those elsewhere."—[Official Report, 6 July 1908: Vol. 19, c. 1331.]

That is a quotation from the speech of the then President of the Board of Trade, Winston Churchill. I agree with what he said that day. Today, 83 years later, the new Tories, under the man they tried to portray as "Nice Mr. Major", say that there are no special dangers down the mine. I do not think that they can believe that. So why are they proposing to introduce change? They are doing so because it is the first step along the road to privatisation. It is intended to attract foreign buyers for British Coal. It is intended to cut costs by cutting safety. It is intended to make our mines more attractive to companies such as Peabody Coal in the United States, which has recently been prosecuted and fined about £500,000 for deliberately, regularly and comprehensively fixing test filters in its mines. In effect, the Government are saying, "Come to Britain. We are levelling down our safety standards to yours."

That is why we shall vote against the Bill. That is why we shall oppose privatisation. That is why, after the general election, the incoming Labour Government will abandon privatisation and bring new hope to the coalfields and the coalfield communities.

5.39 pm

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): This Coal Industry Bill must be one of the shortest of its sort ever to come before Parliament. It is, however, consequential to the future of our coal industry. It implies a great degree of uncertainty, but equally it presents a challenge to the management of British Coal to fight for every ounce of viable business that it can obtain. That will mean continuing to reduce unit costs, while increasing productivity.

Clause 1 complements that process and shows the Government's continuing commitment to the industry. It allows, where necessary, generous redundancy terms for men who wish voluntarily to leave the industry. It is worth saying that this Bill has nothing to do with privatisation or the Rothschild report; it will give the tools to British Coal so that it can compete successfully for the coal contract post-April 1993.

We already know what is possible—over five years, the miners have increased productivity by 108 per cent., while prices have reduced in real terms by 40 per cent., representing an annual cash reduction to the generators of £150. What the people of Sherwood and many others want to know is why National Power and PowerGen have not reflected those bargain purchases from British Coal in lower electricity prices.

The current price paid to British Coal is 180p per unit of energy, with 24 units to the tonne. When processed into electricity, it arrives at our domestic power points costing £20. Therefore, for the generating companies to say that by importing coal at the present world price of 145p per unit would benefit the consumers is a gross misrepresentation of the facts. What it would do is close our collieries, place this country at the mercy of international coal traders, and give Britain an added trade deficit of about £900 million per annum, for a hypothetical saving of just over £1·25 per week for the average household.

Any industry, whether public or private, depends for its success on markets. What British Coal needs to know now, to enable its investment programme to proceed to meet the threat from coal imports, is the size of the United Kingdom coal market post-1993. Will it be 40 million, 50 million or 60 million tonnes? What we do know is that pre-emption means that no fewer than half the power stations' fuel markets in England and Wales are entirely removed from the danger of competition. Nuclear power survives on the back of the coal industry, subsidised by the fossil fuel levy. If the reverse were true, coal would be delivered free to the generators with a cash bonus of £10 a tonne.

Gas has also been given favoured status, supposedly to help Britain to meet its modest sulphur reduction targets. So far, the contracts signed for plants coming on stream up to 1995 are equivalent to 25 million tonnes of coal. To help the process along the way, the Labour party acolytes on Humberside county council fell over themselves to be the first to grant planning permission for gas generators at

[Mr. Andy Stewart]

Killingholme, replacing coal requirements by 3 million tonnes and with a loss of 3,000 mining jobs. The synthetic anguish and wringing of hands by Labour Members fools nobody. However, what stings the coal industry is that all but a few of the new gas plants will produce power at a total cost about 15 to 30 per cent. above that of British Coal.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): Is the hon. Gentleman seriously trying to say that the Labour council in Humberside is responsible for the Killingholme port? That was forced through this House by Government policy and their votes. Will he reflect on the fact that, if the Bill is passed, redundancy arrangements will be forced on the coalfields, and especially the pits in Nottinghamshire? Those pits already have 40 per cent. of places that they cannot fill because miners have already been moved there from other pits. If the Bill is passed, there will be a mass pit closure programme in Nottinghamshire, and mainly in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. Is the hon. Gentleman really trying to be serious, or will he come through the Lobby with us tonight?

Mr. Stewart: There were two parts to the hon. Gentleman's intervention. The first referred to his colleagues on Humberside county council. There is no question but that they granted planning permission for Killingholme. Planning permission was not required from the Department in London. I shall deal with the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question later in my speech.

What is worse, the part of the fuel market to which I have referred will be closed to competition for no less than 15 years, because the only way to obtain the gas is to sign a binding 15-year contract. That means that, with the pre-emptions, all coal plants—even the biggest and the cheapest—will be pushed off base loads, forcing 12GW of modern coal plants to close prematurely. We must not sanction the contracts lying on my right hon. Friend's desk—and by that I mean that there should be no more contracts for gas generation.

Accepting that half the coal market will have gone to privileged fuels by 1993, what are the real business prospects for British Coal, the miners and the coalfield communities? They will be doubtful if the little Englander view prevails both here and in the boardrooms of the generating companies. I use the metaphor in the knowledge that Scottish Power has recently signed a five-year contract with British Coal. It is ironic that Scotland, with an over-production of electricity, is already contracting its surplus to industry south of the border. Talk about playing golf while Rome burns; just leave the canny Scots to pick up the bargains.

Forget the doubters: British Coal knows that it has only one way to go, and that is forward. Nevertheless, its greatest threat comes not only from coal imports but from the Labour party. First, there were the financial consequences of Labour's blind support for a dictatorial trade union leader, who is now as popular in Walworth road as a fox cub in front of the Quorn hunt.

When Labour's support was needed in the House to block the building of the Humber port, which will be capable of handling 10 million tonnes of imported coal, Labour Members showed their true colours and left the Commons at 8 pm. Only 49 of the 229 Labour Members felt any sympathy for British miners and voted against the Bill. At that time, their motives were questioned but the questions remained unanswered. Now, all is revealed through Labour's policy decision to ban opencast mining.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): Will my hon. Friend remind the House how many Conservative Nottinghamshire Members of Parliament attended that unfortunate debate, compared with the attendance of Labour Nottinghamshire Members? If all Labour Members, who were supposedly so opposed to the Bill, had turned up, the Bill would not have become an Act.

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is correct. All Nottinghamshire Conservative Members were present at that debate, and they voted against the Bill. If the Labour party had put its money where its mouth was and voted with us, the problem facing us today would not have arisen. As I said, at that time the motives of Labour Members were questioned, and the questions remained unanswered. Now all is revealed through Labour's policy decision to ban opencast mines. The implication of that for Nottinghamshire's deep mines is catastrophic. Thousands of jobs will be lost.

Thirteen of the 14 Nottinghamshire collieries require low-chlorine coal from opencast sites to sweeten their product, on a ratio of 6 tonnes deep mined to 1 tonne open cast, before it is accepted by the power generating companies. The loss of that low-chlorine coal by itself is disastrous, but the loss of the £200 million annual profit from British Coal's opencast division, which is used to subsidise deep-mined coal, would increase prices by almost £5 a tonne, leaving British Coal with no market or jobs for its miners. That bombshell, coming from the Labour party at a time when Nottinghamshire miners are continually breaking production records, shows Labour's lack of faith in and support for the coal industry, and why Nottinghamshire miners abandoned socialism in 1985.

Notwithstanding that threat, I am confident in backing our miners, because only they can offer the generators long-term contracts which guarantee falling prices, paid for in sterling and free from exchange rate fluctuations. It is an offer that no other coal supplier at home or abroad can make.

One may well ask why, with such a generous offer, the chief executives of our generating companies are not queuing up at British Coal's door. For a start, they are inexperienced in the commercial world, having spent their earlier years in the cosy surrounds of a nationalised concern. Since privatisation, they have yet to make a major decision. Remember, the present coal contracts were fixed for them by my right hon. Friend.

With such complacency, it would be an abrogation of our duty to allow two commercial companies to ruin a major industry and its jobs and to wipe out a multi-billion pound investment made on behalf of taxpayers. Therefore, the time has come for my right hon. Friend to exercise our 40 per cent. shareholding in National Power and PowerGen and instruct the chief executives to sit down with British Coal and negotiate a mutually beneficial contract from 1993.

What I have advocated is possible and not just a dream, but it would be remiss of me not to consider the nightmare scenario of colliery closures at a time when we are increasing restructuring grants by £1,000 million. The death of a pit is the end of an era, in some cases lasting more than 100 years. Gedling colliery in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) closed a week ago after a four-year battle by the miners to make it successful. Nobody, not even the Labour party, could change the geological conditions. On behalf of the 400 men from Sherwood who work at Gedling, I thank my hon. Friend for his endless time and effort, not only during the past few weeks but over years, to keep that colliery open. He was such a regular visitor that he was given his own pit boots and locker.

However, we must ensure that there is life after death by creating new workplaces on the former colliery sites. The target number of jobs should equal those lost from the indigenous mining communities. A prime example of that can be seen at Blidworth in my constituency. Within hours of the colliery closing, Newark and Sherwood district council started work, in conjunction with other agencies, on a rebuilding programme. Two years later, the new developments are on stream, bringing the target of 400 job opportunities even closer.

The only criticism is the time taken to put the financial package together before work could begin. Grant applications have to be made to the EC, the Rural Development Commission and the Department of the Environment, with approvals taking months at a time when speed is of the essence. A simple change of policy, making British Coal Enterprise Ltd. responsible, would be a first step. It has a proven track record, creating 71,000 new job opportunities since it was formed seven years ago.

A closure dowry based on a ratio of £X million for every 100 jobs lost would enable BCE to take control on day one, working in partnership with local authorities and matching pound for pound any EC contribution. By doing that, we would eliminate the 12-month delay. Time wasted cannot be recovered, so it is crucial that we have a system designed and ready to implement the moment that any colliery closes.

Britain has commercial coal reserves at today's extraction rates to last more than 200 years, whether in clean coal power generation, gasification, liquefaction or chemical derivatives. It is one of our most valuable assets, like the land that produces our food. No one in his right mind would ever suggest that our farmers become nothing but park keepers as a result of surplus food in the world. Agriculture is part of the common agricultural policy and I urge my right hon. Friend to see the British coal industry as part of an integrated European energy regime. It would keep our industry competitive and offer a future to our miners. They deserve no less.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): I shall be better able to reply to the speech of the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) when the usual conventions no longer apply in three weeks' time.

In the meantime, I pay tribute to my predecessor George Buckley. No one could but admire the fortitude with which he bore his last painful illness and the way in which at the same time he stuck to his constituency work which he performed with great conscientiousness. He had been equally conscientious as a councillor when I worked with him and he was a fine and scrupulous justice of the peace.

I recall, and perhaps you recall, too, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that during one election period George Buckley was accused of being an extremist. He was extremely hurt by that and announced that he was a moderate and a patriot. I declare here and now that I intend to follow that same path.

Above all, I should say that George was a family man. He looked after his family; he cared for them. I am sure that the House will join me in sending our condolences to his widow and children.

Because Hemsworth has always had a large Labour majority, it sounds like a great monolith, but it is very far from that. It is a series of villages in the south-east of Wakefield metropolitan district which were essentially rural in character. But over the years, because of coal mining and their transformation into pit villages, they have become rural areas with urban problems, with poor communications. But each village has a fierce patriotism. The patriotism is not to Hemsworth unless one lives in Hemsworth. To someone who lives in Upton, Upton is the centre of the universe. Perhaps Upton people are right to say that because they have a tremendous history. I am sure that they will have a tremendous future. They populate the world. It is said that one cannot go anywhere—I know that this was true in west Africa—without meeting someone from Upton who will give good and wise advice.

There is also the village of Ackworth, where Geoff Boycott took his first faltering steps at the crease to become the greatest cricketer that the world has ever seen and a great Yorkshireman. Ultimately, because we pray for him every night, he will change his politics.

The constituency has been destroyed because of the destruction of its industry, mining; a destruction that was completely unnecessary. We are left with real problems of unemployment and all that goes with that with the drifting away of hospital care so that everything is centered outside the constituency; with the drifting away of real jobs so that people have to move outside. One reason for that drifting away is that, as a result of the Government's failure to obey European Community rules, we are not getting the money that we should under RECHAR.

Cato used to end all his speeches with the words, "Delenda est Carthago". I will conclude all my speeches with a plea for money from RECHAR. We have already sown the seeds of what needs to be done to bring about job regeneration in my area. The small extra amount of money for that purpose already approved by the Commission would make a tremendous difference.

The mining part of the community that I represent is extremely important, even though only one working pit is left. Our history and our traditions are in mining, and those traditions remain even when people move into other kinds of industry.

I want to consider for a moment the true price of coal. A very good friend of mine, George Gough, died last Saturday from emphysema. I pay tribute to the work done by my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) in the area and promise that I will assist him in his fight. The true price of coal centres on the lack of safety that is to be found in the mines, which reflects the lack of concern that is often shown.

The fear the Frickley colliers have now is that when their mine is privatised—and they are convinced that will happen soon, unless there is a change of Government—safety standards will fall. They look forward to other assistance from Europe in respect of the social charter. The Minister said that the Government are waiting for certain European directives, but failed to mention that the Government are blocking several directives that would assist workers in my constituency. I think particularly of consultation on change, which must take place under the social charter but which has not been observed. The miners of Frickley have in no way been consulted over their futures. I warn again that I will be fighting for that, too.

[Mr. Derek Enright]

Featherstone is another area that once relied on coal and it is also where I taught for 12 years as deputy head of a comprehensive school which I established. I am extremely proud of the comprehensive education system. My school vied with eight grammar schools and produced results better than any of them—and for many more children. That is why I am proud of the comprehensive system and why I will support my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) in all his splendid work to make education once more a human thing with human values.

Also in Featherstone we have a rugby team which will win the cup this year. I look forward to the Prime Minister being present that day—but, of course, by then it will be a Labour Prime Minister.

I will co-operate with and fight alongside my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) for the interests of coal and do all that I can to assist my party's energy team in that fight.

I want to make sure that Hemsworth can continue to be proud of its history. I will rail against its present problems and I will certainly fight for its future.

6.4 pm

Mr. Martin Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): It is truly a privilege to follow a maiden speech, and I am sure that I express the view of right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House in extending a warm welcome to the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) and complimenting him on his words. Given the hon. Gentleman's background, he will clearly represent the constituents who elected him last week. I thank the hon. Gentleman also on behalf of us all for his glowing and deserved tribute to his predecessor.

The hon. Member for Hemsworth stuck, within reasonable bounds, to the conventions of the House in not making an over-contentious maiden speech, but he came very near to being contentious—[HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish."]—when he suggested to a Nottingham Member of Parliament that Boycott was one of the best cricketers in the world. Given that I was born and brought up in Middlesex and spent my childhood idolising Compton and Edrich—[HON. MEMBERS: "More rubbish"] —the hon. Member for Hemsworth ought to be more careful in his support for Boycott, or he will fall out with many of his own right hon. and hon. Friends. As to his reference to rugby league, I plead ignorance and will not interfere with private griefs.

I declare a small and indirect formal interest in the affairs of the coal industry and in British Coal. If ever there was a clear indication of the Government's understanding of the changing needs of industry, the effect of change on a particular industry, and the Government's willingness to take on board the social consequences of change, the last five years and the Coal Industry Bill clearly demonstrate the Government's balanced commitment to honouring their duty to consider the wider public interest.

I am committed to the coal industry, but not blindly so, as are some Labour Members. I am committed to Nottinghamshire miners, which is hardly surprising—but that is not the case, or has not been, with Labour. I am committed also to the wider public that we must all represent. That requires an understanding of the environmental impact of energy production and usage, and of the price of that energy to commercial, industrial and domestic users. It is the Government's role to understand and to respond to the need for balance.

Labour is clearly unwilling to address that issue, and tailors its words to suit its audience. If one considers the commitments of various members of Labour's Front Bench whose portfolios touch directly or indirectly on energy, one finds total conflict, one with the other. In that regard as in others, we wonder what the policy of Labour Members would be if, heaven forbid, they ever sat on the Government Benches.

There is no way that we can be sure, from the statements of members of Labour's Front Bench, what the Opposition's policies would be in the context of the Bill and of the industry that we are trying to preserve and strengthen. If coal was just another industry or a medium-sized company in the private sector whose product was not as much in demand as previously, or had been superseded by another product that it could not make or compete with it, that industry or company would slim down or might even close altogether—with the same tragic effect on families and communities as has been seen in the coal industry. Given the social changes that have been necessary, and the consequences of those changes, I doubt whether any incoming Government would have looked after the coal industry as the present Government have.

Dr. Kim Howells (Pontypridd): We are discussing not a medium-sized company like any other, but a company that is concerned with one of our great energy assets. Energy, by any definition, is out of the ordinary: it is very close to the cockpit of politics. The need of a nation for energy —for the consistent supply of electricity, for instance—is vital, unlike the need for the products of many medium-sized companies.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I do not disagree with that. I apologise if I did not make myself clear. I meant that, in the case of any other industry, we probably would have let nature take its course. Firms slim down; firms close. There would have been no more than the statutory redundancies. Over the past five years, however, the Government have taken account of the very point that the hon. Gentleman has just made. All that has happened proves that they have taken on board the social consequences of change, while also recognising the future needs of a very special industry —the energy industry.

Yes, the coal industry has slimmed down; yes, it may even have to slim down further. But no, it will not disappear—because, as the hon. Gentleman rightly implied, it is a vital resource. It therefore has a long-term future. By producing this Bill, and by everything that they have done, are doing and will do, the Government are endeavouring to give British Coal the time and the means to meet what we perceive as longer-term needs.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already given a thorough airing to the detail of the Bill—as, perhaps to a lesser extent, has the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson)—let me address one or two other points. The Government have given British Coal Enterprise Ltd. some £60 million of public money, which has generated some £500 million of private-sector finance. Labour always scorns and derides the role of the private sector, but, as a result of that investment, an estimated 70,000 job opportunities have been created.

Mr. Illsley: But how many actual jobs have been created?

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I used the phrase "job opportunities" deliberately. I know how difficult it is to establish exactly how many jobs are involved in such cases. I mentioned the figure of 70,000; my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) referred to 71,000. Let us not argue about a couple of thousand in either direction. An awful lot of jobs have been created by the £60 million of public investment and the £500 million of private investment. We can be certain of one thing: the private sector does not put £500 million into an enterprise that has no end product—in this instance, jobs.

Mr. Illsley: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman used the phrase "job opportunities". There is considerable dispute about exactly how many jobs have been created by British Coal Enterprise. Opposition Members would take issue with the 70,000 figure; the number of actual jobs is very much smaller.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: The hon. Gentleman is playing with words. I thought that I had met him halfway: even I did not say, "Oh yes, I am right, it is 70,000." The figure concerned is fairly large, and it is represented by efforts, to the tune of over £560 million, to recognise the special needs of mining communities. The Bill extends the possibility of doing that.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras is no longer present. I listened with anger to what he said this morning on Radio 4. I felt that it amounted to criminial misrepresentation to suggest that the Government—or, more particularly, the management and staff of British Coal—would consciously risk the lives of men working below ground by cutting safety provision.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: I would not trust them further than I could throw them.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: That is a gross remark to make about the management of British Coal. It is unworthy of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Cummings: At least he is a miner.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras is not much of a miner in my book. Perhaps the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Cummings) will tell us just how many mines his hon. Friend has gone down to find out what he rabbits on about from the Front Bench week after week.

The remarks that were made this morning on Radio 4 were not only unworthy of a Member of Parliament—they lowered party politics to the level of the gutter—but were certainly unworthy of someone who seeks to become Secretary of State in, heaven forbid, an incoming Labour Government.

Mr. Lofthouse: I entirely agree with what the hon. Gentleman said about safety. I do not know of any colliery manager, deputy or workman who would deliberately plan to send people to work in unsafe conditions. As I have said, however, because of the recent drive to increase productivity and thus lower the prices of coal—in order to maintain the market—roadways in mines are being protected by roofbolts rather than arched girders. The chief inspector of mines has told the Select Committee on Energy twice that arched girders are safest. The use of roofbolts has led to men being injured and even killed. I am not saying that the managers want to create unsafe conditions; they are being forced to do so by the economics of the coal industry.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I accept that the hon. Gentleman's experience is much greater than mine, but I find it hard to believe that the Health and Safety Executive would allow the use of a technique that had not been tried and proven, at least in another country. I cannot believe that an untried system that was considered dubious would be permitted.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is not an ex-miner, but I know that he will spend an enormous amount of time in following up what the hon. Gentleman has said. If it turns out that the new technique is indeed unsafe, I am sure that my right hon. Friend will be the first to say that he wants to hear more about it.

Mr. Lofthouse: The system that I described is American. The safety there is four times worse than ours, and that statistic is based on recorded accidents in only 40 per cent. of unionised mines.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I am in no position to challenge what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Constituents of mine have been using the roofbolting technique at Littleton colliery, just outside Cannock. I have discussed it with those responsible, as I did not understand how the system worked. If it had not been safe, it would not have been introduced into the United Kingdom—from Australia, incidentally, rather than the United States—and the men would not be using it. None of my constituents have made any representations to me about its safety.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He has drawn attention to the fact that it might have been Australia rather than the United States. It is a great shame, on a matter so important, that, when my hon. Friend tried to place information before the House, the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse), who raised the matter, started gasbagging to his neighbours as though it did not really matter. That was outrageous.

We have to acknowledge the role that gas can play, is playing and certainly must play, as well as the environmental benefits that flow from it. Gas must have a reasonable share of the future energy market. The Labour party cannot talk about coal to one audience and about environmentally safe energy to another.

Renewables must also have a share of the energy market. If my mailbag is anything to go by, people are complaining that the Government are not forcing the pace fast enough on renewables so that there can be an even quicker rundown in the use of fossil fuels.

The Labour party is inconsistent. None of us can avoid recognising the adverse effect that the burning of fossil fuels has on the environment. Although all these alternatives are coming on to the market, I am certain that British Coal understands and can meet all the challenges. All it is asking for is that it should be given the time and the resources to fulfil its essential role in the future mix of energy generation and to ease the social consequences of the changes that will take place over the coming decades.

British Coal has shown that it can be competitive. Its productivity post-Scargill has proved that. Contrary to Opposition claims, no generator in his right mind would want to rely over-heavily on imported coal. Security of supply, at a known contracted price, is absolutely essential if the generators are to fulfil their contracts with their distributors. British Coal would be even more viable and would have an even more secure future if United Kingdom coal, the lowest-cost coal in Europe, were competing on an equal level with Germany and Belgium, which still heavily subsidise their coal industries. The European Commissioners either turn a blind eye or are unable to enforce their rules and regulations.

The Bill deals with the possible funds that will be needed up to 1996 to handle all these complexities and changes, but let us not forget that there is more to British Coal than just taking the stuff out of the ground—although I acknowledge that that is its prime purpose.

Looking ahead, let us not forget some of the current research that is being undertaken by British Coal. It should be on the record. We have had many debates about the industry in the past few years, but rarely have we talked about the research work undertaken by British Coal into advance clean coal technology, small and advanced power generating systems, heating development, waste utilisation, atmospheric pollution, low CO_2 power generation and options for its abatement, the coal science of nox formation and mineral behaviour, and liquid fuels. All these research projects are in the long-term interests of the nation. It would be mad to ignore all these potential gains for the long-term future of what is an almost inexhaustible home-based fuel.

Most of the heat and anger generated today relates to whether or not the 1908 Act should or should not be repealed, but let us understand what that Act was all about. The 1908 Act set a limit on the amount of time that a mineworker could be underground. Those of us who never were mineworkers may not be aware that a different limit was set for deputies. No limit was set for management. I assume that management go underground and spend a fair amount of time there, but, I repeat, no limit was set for them.

When I intervened during the speech of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, I said that no reference to safety is to be found in the 1908 Act, or in any subsequent amendment to that Act. I admit that I have not read all the Hansard reports of the debates, so it is perfectly true that there may be a reference to safety in Hansard. However, safety was not the purpose of that Act. Opposition Members know that it is what is contained in an Act that counts, not the speeches that were made in support of it.

The present limit for mineworkers is 7·5 hours. That is made up of a seven-hour period that can be extended at the manager's discretion by half an hour. Opposition Members must tell us whether that is the absolute maximum that they are looking for. Is that what they say is provided for in the 1908 Act? Is that what is fussing the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras?

The 1908 Act sets a strict limit not on hours of work but on the hours that may be spent underground, whether or not the mineworker can properly be judged to be working. It has already been acknowledged that travelling time is included as part of working time. Someone pointed out to me today that miners can travel in an underground train in conditions that are somewhat better than those enjoyed by the average south-east commuter. It was also pointed out that at least miners have a reserved seat.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): The 1908 Act dealt with health and safety. The hon. Gentleman, however, referred to miners travelling on a train. If he had ever worked underground, he would know that, when miners leave their paddy train, they have to walk a mile or a mile and a half to reach the coal seam. The hon. Gentleman should also remember that he has never smelt the stale air underground after seven hours there, and should take into account the fact that the stale air that miners breathe after seven hours underground, even though it is safe from the point of view of the regulations, makes them feel tired.

It is at that point that the safety factor is essential. One can have all the safety regulations in the world, but if a person in middle management is also tired after that time, the problem is made even worse. That is why the hours worked are seven and a quarter, plus winding time.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I very much respect the hon. Gentleman's views, and I do not dispute what he says. He believes that the 1908 Act was a health and safety measure, but his hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) said, from a sedentary position, that it was not—that it was the other way round. There is total confusion on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Cummings: It is the hon. Gentleman who is confused.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: It is vital to set out how long a person should work underground. I do not wish the safety risks to be increased. All I am saying is that none of the papers that I have read, or the Act that I have perused, remotely addresses the safety factor. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras may believe that the 1908 Act was a health and safety measure, but most people acknowledge that the Act that addresses health and safety is the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974. Section 2(1) says:

> "It shall be the duty of every employer to ensure, so far as is reasonably practicable, the health, safety and welfare at work of all his employees."

That is the position now, and even if the 1908 Act is repealed, that will continue. We will not have diminished that statement one iota.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras stands accused of introducing safety as a smokescreen. He is trying to play on emotions that should not be played upon in the House. If the hon. Gentleman's real objections are founded on a desire in some way to prevent or frustrate privatisation, he should have said so. Productivity is just as vital in a nationalised industry as in a private-sector industry. Nothing will have changed.

If the British miner cannot get his industry in a condition to compete four square with the rest of the world, we are in trouble, and the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras should make up his mind about what he wants. If he is saying that he would rather have no deep-mining industry than one that is thriving in the private sector, let him say so. That seems to be the message from the Opposition Front Bench. I do not believe that the knee-jerk reactions of Opposition Members remotely address the real purpose of the Bill, which is to ensure that British Coal has a future. Conservative Members will ensure its future this year, next year and for a long time to come.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I join in the tributes paid to my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) on his maiden speech. It was agreeable, amusing and knowledgeable and his politics are rooted strongly in the locality that he represents. He will be able to see, as was everyone else, how warmly his speech was received. He brings one other quality to bear and that is the role of education in politics and the need to tell people what is happening and why it is happening. That is one thing that we can do in the House tonight.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth, I represent a mining constituency. When I came to Chesterfield in 1984 a quarter of all the jobs in that great centre of the north Derbyshire coalfield were dependent on coal. If the Rothschild report is carried through, the entire north Derbyshire coalfield will close. There will be only four pits in Nottinghamshire and those who defended the Union of Democratic Mineworkers throughout the strike will learn how foolish it was for any miners to put their confidence in the Government.

I speak with some interest in the matter, apart from the fact that, for five years in all, I had the privilege of being Minister of Power and Secretary of State for Energy. Although we shall be defeated in the Lobby tonight, I can try to explain to people who listen to the debate or read Hansard what the Government are really doing. They are deliberately financing a further rundown in the mining industry at the expense of the safety of miners and their working conditions in the hope that profit can be made for private owners by a small number of pits with the rest of the coal being imported or coming from opencast mining.

I was astounded at the suggestion that the 1908 Act had nothing to do with safety. Does anyone honestly believe that if we abandoned all controls on pilots flying jet aircraft and said that they could fly for 24 hours a day, it would have no effect on safety? Does anyone honestly believe that if an industry becomes more technological, we need fewer safety requirements? After all, a man who is tired and carrying a pick and shovel cannot do much to affect the safety of others. However, with the high investment underground today, a tired miner can do enormous damage to the pit and to other workers. If the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) does not understand that exhaustion is a danger in a high-tech industry, he does not understand very much at all.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Benn: I am not giving way because many miners want to speak. I shall use my brief speech to explain to people who read the debate what the Government are doing. The hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) will have plenty of opportunity to speak because very few Conservative Members are interested in the industry and many are not here to listen to the debate.

One reason why privatisation is advocated now is that the pits were re-equipped with public money and now that they are available for privatisation a lot of profit will be made from them for somebody. As my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson)—shortly to be my right hon. Friend—said, the money is not for investment but to finance redundancies. Another hon. Member intervened to say that some of the money is probably to be used to end the concessionary coal. That is widely suspected. To repeal the 1908 Act is to return to Victorian conditions. It is no good mentioning the European directive, because even if it is introduced—other Ministers do not want it—it provides a lower level of safety than the 1908 Act and would be no substitute.

I want to look at this policy in the light of the policy that has been pursued by the Conservative party since 1979 and before. The first policy for the mining industry was prepared by the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley) in preparation for the great miners' strike of 1984-85. Coal was stocked, police were recruited, the riot squads were trained and the Association of Chief Police Officers was prepared for the task given to it. I shall come to the question of Orgreave in a moment. I was on the platform with Arthur Scargill at the Durham miners gala in 1983 when he warned that 70 pits were on the hit list. It was dismissed completely. In June 1984 Mr. Ian MacGregor wrote a letter to every miner, a copy of which I have. It said:

"I have been accused of planning to butcher the industry . . . I have no such intention or desire . . . This is a strike which should never have happened. It is based on very serious misrepresentation and distortion of the facts . . . Your leaders have told you that the Coal Board is out to butcher the coal industry; that we plan to do away with 70,000 jobs; that we plan to close down around 86 pits, leaving only 100 working collieries. If these things were true, I would not blame miners for getting angry or for being deeply worried, but these things are absolutely untrue. I state that categorically and solemnly. You have been deliberately misled."

That was the chairman of the Coal Board who had been appointed by the then Prime Minister to butcher the industry. A total of 109 pits were closed, 70,000 jobs were lost and many of the people on the dole who we hear about now in the monthly figures are unemployed miners. Communities have been destroyed. In one ward in Chesterfield which is in a mining area, unemployment is above 25 per cent. Coal imports have been deliberately encouraged to undermine the strength of the British mining industry. When I became Secretary of State for Industry in 1974, I discovered that the previous Conservative Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), had instructed the generating board to import Australian coal. When it arrived it was so costly that it was more expensive than British coal. The generating board sold the Australian coal at a loss to Electricité de France. My hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) remembers the story well.

People talk about the Coal Board not wanting to endanger the health and safety of miners. However, if we import coal from South Africa and Colombia, where conditions are appalling, and tell our own miners to meet the price, we are telling them to lower their working conditions to the level of conditions and wages in South Africa and Colombia. There is no fair competition in the import of coal.

Opencast mining is the final insult to mining areas. They lose their pits and then their environment is destroyed. It is disgraceful to talk about being environmentally conscious and dealing with the sulphur in coal while allowing the present level of opencast mining. Desulphurisation techniques have been known for years and with scrubbing plants it would be possible to use coal with no risk.

The Government speak as though they have just discovered that gas is cheaper. We always knew that it was and there has never been any dispute about it. The question was whether it was sensible to burn gas. The Rothschild report says that there is no prospect of exporting coal, but we could export the gas and then burn our coal. It is a deliberate strategy.

The argument is that the Government are only following market forces. What a lie! Nuclear power is three times the cost of coal. Market forces? When shall we hear Conservative Ministers say that the nuclear industry will survive if it can compete with the cost of South African coal? No market forces are involved here. It has been emerging for some time that the cost of nuclear power is three times the cost of the pits that are being closed on economic grounds. There is a statutory requirement that the generators should use a certain amount of nuclear power, but there is no statutory requirement that they should use coal.

Let us consider agriculture. Do Tory Ministers ever say to farmers that if they cannot compete with the foreign price of food, the Government will close the farms? Of course they do not say that. They tax foreign food up to the level at which British and Community farmers can produce food.

One should not leave out of the account the cost of closures because it would have taken 15 years of running a so-called uneconomic pit to have lost as much as is lost by closing the pit. One still has to pay for subsidence and pensions. The cost of the strike was £5 billion or more. One might add to the calculation the fact that the Yorkshire police had to pay £400,000 to people whom they had wrongly charged with riot at Orgreave. That was the proof of the policy of the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley).

This has been a political strategy from the beginning. I have never believed a word that Conservative Ministers have said about their regretful adoption of market forces and about how they would love to help the industry. That has never been the case. After 1926, 1972, and 1974, this Government decided to break the power of the National Union of Mineworkers. It gives me some satisfaction that the Prime Minister who took on Arthur Scargill was slung out by her own party, whereas Arthur Scargill is still the president of the National Union of Mineworkers. Why is that? The reason is that he told the miners the truth. He said from the beginning that the industry would be butchered. The Government are butchering the industry and they did butcher the industry, so it is somewhat pleasing to me that Arthur Scargill still enjoys the confidence of the miners.

We know what will happen with privatisation. Enormous profits will be made. The East Midlands electricity board—I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras for furnishing the figures—paid £7 million to the City to be sold off. Its shares have gone up by 88 per cent. and its directors have had a 225 per cent. wage increase. The chairman now gets £3,500 a week. That is what privatisation is about. It is about lowering the wages and the health and safety standards of the people who do the work and about boosting the profits of the speculators. If the Conservative party had the honesty to say that that is why they are doing it, we could at least believe them, but they tell us all the time that everything is due to market forces.

If we are to make sense of the difficult decisions of energy policy, we must have a national energy policy. We shall have to phase out nuclear power because it is not cheap, it is not safe and it is not peaceful. We shall have to stop the coal imports and no one should tell me that we cannot stop them. We could stop them by saying that imported coal had to be produced under the same conditions under which coal in Britain is produced. We could keep coal imports out by saying that miners in the exporting countries should have the same wages and the same conditions. We shall have to stop or limit opencast. We shall have to put money into flue gas desulphurisation. We shall have to try to export coal. Our coal is far cheaper than European coal, so why do not the Government, who talk about the level playing field, do something about it? Why do they hire Rothschilds to say that there is no prospect for the profitable export of coal? We should also go for energy conservation and alternative energy.

The wealth of this country was built on coal. The prosperity of our industrial society was built on coal and on the products derived from coal, such as chemicals. This country's future depends on coal because, when the oil runs out, there is 1,000 years of coal under our territory —if one includes coal under the North sea. A policy that was designed, politically, to butcher the coal industry and to punish the National Union of Mineworkers is not just a betrayal of the industry, but a betrayal of the national interest. That issue will remove one or two Conservative Members when the election comes and will bring to power a Government who will put coal back in its proper place as the heart of our energy policy.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): I offer my congratulations to the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) on his excellent maiden speech.

I am sorely tempted to pick up some of the points made by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), but I will refer only to one. He implied that concessionary coal would be in danger after any future privatisation. His hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) could correct him, because he received an answer in the past few days which confirmed that the same amount of concessionary coal finance will continue to be paid.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): I have not intervened because I hope to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker. I hope that, when the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) refers to my question, he will inform the House about my second question. The Secretary of State replied that it was for British Coal to decide whether it wanted to buy out concessionary coal. That was an important answer.

Mr. Hannam: It was made clear that the concession would continue. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made it clear that whoever controlled British coal —whether British Coal or a privatised company—would still have that obligation. That point should be made clear.

I recall attending many Coal Industry Bill debates over the years and being a member of many Coal Industry Bill Committees. I do not recall one Coal Industry Bill that did not present a large increase in funding for the coal industry during the 20-odd years during which I have been involved. Throughout those two decades, the industry has experienced two contrasting scenarios. In the 1970s, money was provided to fight the battle of trying to maintain an artificially high level of production of coal, which resulted in artificially high levels of electricity generation from coal. Coal Industry Bills reflected the huge subsidies that were needed for that policy.

In the 1980s, a different scenario evolved. The coal industry slipped down quite dramatically to its present size, and at the same time it improved its productivity threefold over the average of the 1960s and the 1970s. The 1970s and the 1980s were contrasting decades for the coal industry. No Government in history have been as committed to Britain's coal industry as the present Government. Since 1979, they have invested more in British Coal than all the Governments since 1945 put together. There has been more than £7 billion of investment in the industry, and a further £17 billion in grant aid has been made available. That is the equivalent of £2 million in British Coal every working day since the Conservatives came to office.

The response from the miners has been superb. In 1985, the average miner produced 571 tonnes of coal each year. The figure has now soared to 1,187 tonnes per miner per year. It is right that we all pay tribute to the determination of the miners to keep their industry afloat in ever more difficult times.

We all know that the peak of pit closures occurred not during Conservative periods in office, but during Labour periods in office—from 1964 to 1970 and from 1974 to 1979—when 295 pits were closed down. Since 1979, there have been just 140 closures—less than half Labour's level over the same time span.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Is my hon. Friend aware that more pits were closed when the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) was Minister than were closed under almost any other Minister? The redundancy arrangements offered to miners under his pit closure programme were far less generous than those offered by this Conservative Government over the past 12 years.

Mr. Hannam: My hon. Friend's point is relevant to the Bill. We have heard of the prospect of the coal industry contracting but becoming more competitive all the time. The Government have not only provided massive investment for the industry—more than all other Governments since the war put together—but written off debts and put British Coal on a solid financial footing. They have also tackled the long-standing problem of mining subsidence.

The Bill will continue the commitment to provide generous grant support for the process of restructuring. That continued support has enabled British Coal to achieve its vital restructuring without a single compulsory redundancy. I find it hard to believe that anyone could vote against the Bill on the grounds of the increased resources and the amount made available for redundancy payments and retraining costs.

Having said that, I agree that the debate offers the House a chance to consider the future of the industry. Regardless of any future privatisation plans, which I do not believe bear on the Bill, the tough challenges facing coal production throughout the world mean that difficult decisions and changes still have to be made. We are still in that process.

We have read the Rothschild report, or at least a leaked copy which has been circulating. It projects a dramatic fall in demand for coal in the United Kingdom from 90 million tonnes in 1990-91 to about 65 million tonnes in 1994-95 and to about 60 million tonnes by 2000. The report forecasts a reduction in deep-mined coal of about 65 million tonnes from about 58 collieries at present, to 25 million to 30 million tonnes from about 20 collieries in 1993-94. The report also predicted a rather dramatic further fall to about 14 collieries thereafter.

I have spoken to some energy experts about the report. Their general view is that, if the expansion of gas generation of electricity continues at its present level and if the generators import up to a third of their reduced coal demand, the Rothschild report's forecasts could come true. However, I am not so sure. I feel strongly—I have talked to a number of energy experts—that, after the initial burst of increased use of gas and oil and after the stepping up of coal imports, there will be a medium-term levelling out as prices of gas from the new gas technologies become less competitive.

I also believe that, as imports of coal on the world market increase, that will influence the world price of coal. I do not believe that the scenario projected by the Rothschild report as the ultimate and most serious scenario is necessarily the one that will happen.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I appreciate what the hon. Gentleman says about the Rothschild report, but in view of its status, is not it strange that the Secretary of State did not even mention it in his speech?

Mr. Hannam: I am not responsible for what my right hon. Friend said, but he painted a clear picture of the coal industry as it will be affected by the Bill. The Rothschild report has not been published. It is a leaked document, and it would be wrong to expect my right hon. Friend to comment on it. I am talking about the future of the coal industry, and I hope that the Minister will be able to enlighten us on how he sees the coal industry developing, because that is an important issue.

Traditionally, coal has always been a main source of fuel for our power generators, but during the past 20 years —under Governments of both parties—much diversification has taken place. Renewables, nuclear energy and gas now play a key role. I believe that we shall always have a substantial market for coal in this country. I take seriously the point about the potential for the exports of coal. That will increasingly come into focus in the coming years.

[Mr. Hannam]

However, our aim should be to ensure that, when we talk about a market for coal, we mean a market for British coal, competitively and efficiently mined. A privatised coal industry will have the best chance of achieving such a target, but in the meantime I am concerned that morale and confidence are being sapped by the uncertainty.

Unfortunately, at the moment, as contracts are being negotiated and likely to be completed by 1993-94, and with world prices of coal not yet affected by any major jump in imports, I understand that it is very difficult for the Minister or for the Secretary of State to make any projection about the future level of coal demand except in the most general terms. However, I hope that the Minister will be able to agree to some extent with my premise that, in view of factors such as those I have mentioned—an increase in the costs of gas generation after a flush of stations are completed, an increase in coal import costs and improvements in environmental protection technology—there must be a strong chance of our coal industry achieving even greater productivity under privatisation, thereby attaining a median level—not the Rothschild bottom level—of deep-mined production much closer to 40 million or 50 million tonnes. That is what I believe could happen, rather than the frightening lower level forecast by Rothschild.

Mr. Meale: The hon. Member talked about morale in the industry and the importance of maintaining it, but there is another aspect. Does he not believe that the introduction of the Bill, which would increase the hours worked underground, would involve offering bigger redundancy packages, and therefore more job losses in mining areas, and would therefore seriously undermine the morale of mining communities?

Mr. Hannam: The hon. Gentleman's interpretation of the Bill's intention is wrong. It has no such aims, but takes account of the changes likely to occur because of the European Community, and it prepares the ground for any legislative changes.

I return to the point that I was making about a healthier future for the coal industry than that which is generally supposed. The Rothschild report states that a 10 per cent. across-the-board cut in costs for deep-mined coal would create 10 million tonnes more than the central reference case that it set out. Last year, British coal's productivity rose by 9 per cent., and this year it stands 12 per cent. higher. Therefore, a 10 per cent. rise during the two to three years when the contracts come into place is eminently feasible.

According to the National Association of Colliery Managers, with which I had a meeting last week, the present contracts with the electricity generators which are due to expire in March 1993—one of the crucial dates—give a price for British Coal of £1·80 per standard unit of gigajoule. At current world prices and exchange rates, imported coal delivered at the coast would cost about £1·30 per standard unit.

The 50p gap is undoubtedly too wide to close immediately in 1993-94. Unless a European carbon tax is imposed which would blow all our calculations sky high, a staged reduction in price—possibly in two tranches of 10 per cent.—could be achieved by the industry. Colliery managers believe that that could be done in the next few years. How that is achieved will depend on the view taken by generators, the Government and the industry about the long-term security of supply and the balance of payments needs, but it must be considered carefully as we approach another era of restructuring in the coal industry.

Where do the Opposition stand? We have read reports in the Evening Standard of meetings that have taken place or that are proposed between coal-mining Back-Bench Members of Parliament and the Leader of the Opposition. Clearly they get no satisfaction from the fact that their party has a cohesive policy for the coal sector. The Labour party talks about maintaining the present size of the industry. Everyone knows that, in view of the new gas generators being built, that will be impossible—that is the reality of the market.

We hear of restrictions on coal imports, but such a protectionist policy would be unacceptable to GATT and to the European Community. The Labour party talks of forcing generators to burn coal irrespective of cost and to phase out nuclear power. That must run counter to their green party image, as it would create more carbon dioxide and sulphur dioxide, therefore making it impossible to reach their target of stabilising carbon dioxide emissions at the 1990 level by 2000. It would also mean a return to heavy subsidies which, as Germany is learning to its cost, are unacceptable to the European Community. The German coal industry is having belatedly to follow the restructuring path that we have been painfully following. The Germans plan to axe 30,000 jobs and to reduce national output from 70,000 tonnes to 55,000 tonnes over the next few years.

The policies proposed by the Labour party add up to a sham attempt to fool miners and electricity customers that they can have their cake and eat it. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has put the arguments fairly and squarely to the Opposition spokesman, who, as usual, replied with a lot of wind power but no facts.

I support the Bill because I see it as a further sign of the Government's support for a competitive coal industry. I do not pretend that the path ahead over the next few years will be easy for our miners, but there is a good future for coal as an integral part of our energy scene. I hope that, as the present period of uncertainty over contracts comes to an end, our miners will be given the chance to rise to the challenges ahead, as they have done during the past few years.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): I have to remind the House that speeches between now and 8.50 should be limited to 10 minutes.

6.59 pm

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): Perhaps we should say that we are really discussing the coal industry (privatisation) Bill, phase two. The Bill is getting the industry ready for privatisation.

I pay tribute to the first-class speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright). He replaces a first-class lad. I might mention that George left owing me a bottle of wine, so I hope my hon. Friend will remember that.

The Bill refers to restructuring, redundancies, and the repeal of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1908. Indirectly, the Government are giving away taxpayers' money. By giving it to the Coal Board, they intend to send it back to their friends in the City. One needs only to look back through the great privatisation sales to realise who has made the profits from them—not the little shareholders dabbling in a few hundred shares but the big City finance chiefs. Of course, one expects that from the Government.

Let me get the record straight. The hon. Members for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) and for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) referred to coal imports. We played a small role in fighting the importation Bill, and there were no crocodile tears then. When I asked those two hon. Members to try to cajole their hon. Friends into our Lobby, they disappeared. I would not want Nottinghamshire miners to be misled by their crocodile tears now.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), because the Rothschild report reveals the Government's true intentions. The tragedy is that the Government will not for once stand up and tell people exactly what they intend for the industry and the country. They have faithfully followed the market forces philosophy since 1979, and the Bill goes the same way. It does nothing for the industry and nothing for the long-term interests of the country. It demonstrates the economics of the cat house. The Government had better go back to the cat house and find out what economics should be about.

Like King Canute, the chairman of British Coal seems to stand on the beach and allow all the privatisation and all the coal imports that the old Central Electricity Generating Board wanted and the two new generating bodies appear to want, while he does nothing. Yet he has a large salary. I do not understand why. The industry for which he is supposed to fight is declining each week, let alone each year. But does the chairman's salary decline? It does not. Does Hobart house decline? No.

Restructuring is taking place in coalfields throughout the country, bringing savings from the vast reductions in manpower, yet we still have Hobart house, that ivory tower. When will that be subject to restructuring? Why has British Coal not moved to Doncaster—to Coal house St. George's, in Thorne road? The concept of nationalisation has gone. King Canute and the rest of his cohorts on the board do not wish to get involved in trying to save the industry.

The closure of pits and the annihilation of coalfields means the dereliction of pit villages. Regrettably, the Government are not providing the alternative jobs that are so vital to mining communities. It is time that they reconsidered their market forces philosophy.

The sums mentioned in the Bill do not represent the true cost that the country will have to pay. We must realise that the taxpayer will have to pay at least £200 million more each year because of the rundowns and job losses in the coal industry, and the resulting state benefits. My estimate is a little conservative. The cost will probably be a lot higher. Jobs connected with the mining industry will also be lost if the Bill is passed, and that will increase the £200 million tremendously. The Government have no long-term employment policies, only a policy of continued unemployment.

The Government also fail to take into account the Bill's likely impact on our overseas balance of payments. Because of the reduction of mined coal in this country, there will be a need to import coal and that will affect our balance of payments—apparently we have not solved the export problem. The Government do not seem to have considered the import-export problem or our balance of payments at all. The market forces philosophy works only from day to day.

When the cartels have total control—as the Government appear to want—the country will start to pay the price that the cartels expect. The poor old taxpayer and consumer will have to pick up the bill for the Government's bad industrial policies. No wonder we are in such a mess.

Why are we repealing the 1908 Act? I listened intently to the Secretary of State, but I did not hear him say the word that would answer that question. The word is "privatisation". I wish that the Government would stop trying to kid people.

The former Prime Minister wanted us to go back to Victorian values. I do not want a return to those Victorian values—women worked down the mines then, and they would still be doing so under Conservative legislation. Perhaps children will be next. Before anyone starts laughing he should consider the social policies that the Conservative party has adopted since 1979. This legislation is designed to increase the number of hours worked underground, but the Government cannot have their cake and eat it. They screamed their refusal to implement the social charter, and they are wholly opposed to the minimum wage. The Government should stick this Bill somewhere I cannot mention, and we should vote it down this evening.

7.10 pm

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): In an indifferent speech the Secretary of State aroused suspicions about the 1908 Act. He has only himself to blame. He did not tell us much about the directive; he merely gave us some Euro-gobbledegook about the directive applying immediately to British Coal but not to the private sections of the industry. It would have been more sensible to bring the directive to the Floor of the House, once it is agreed, in legislation that would, if necessary, repeal the 1908 Act. That will have to be done anyway. Perhaps the Secretary of State did not brief himself properly. He certainly did not quell our suspicions; on the contrary, he further aroused them by the manner in which he handled the repeal of the 1908 legislation.

The right hon. Gentleman gave us the impression—indeed, he said—that gas was cheaper than coal. Perhaps it is, but the revenue costs of running a gas-fired power station and a coal-fired power station are roughly similar. Even in terms of running costs, coal is competitive with gas at today's prices. The difference lies in the capital costs of constructing power stations. This Bill will subsidise redundancies and the creation of new jobs at the expense of mining jobs. Often those new jobs are created by British Coal Enterprise in the service sector. Many of them are part-time. But why not subsidise new clean coal-fired power stations to preserve jobs in the coal industry which create wealth and maintain a decent standard of living for those in it? It is not a question of subsidy or no subsidy; it is a question of where subsidies are most sensibly deployed.

Dr. Kim Howells: My right hon. Friend is highlighting one of the central hypocrisies of the claim that gas will solve all our environmental problems. Gas-fired stations are being bolted together because that is cheaper than retrofitting the desulphurisation systems of the coal-fired power stations which might use this great fuel.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend is right. Coal stands up well in any like-with-like comparison.

I am one of a dwindling band of Members who represent constituencies that still have at least one publicly owned deep mine. My constituency, together with Carmarthen, covers the entire anthracite coalfield in Britain and one of my purposes in speaking tonight is to speak up for that coalfield, which tends to get ignored.

I recently wrote a letter to the new chairman—I also wrote one to the former chairman—of British Coal. I suggested that British Coal set up a small mines company to develop and mine the anthracite in west Wales.

Dr. Kim Howells: A good idea.

Mr. Davies: It certainly is. Anthracite is still in demand even for domestic purposes. People cannot get enough of it, particularly if it is anthracite of the best quality. It is also a clean coal. We have heard a great deal about the environment; everything that is burned creates carbon dioxide, but anthracite has a low sulphur content. The dust from it can be used in the new-technology clean-coal power stations.

The Welsh anthracite field is the only one west of Poland, so I thought that there would be a tremendous market for it from here all the way to Poland, the more so since 1992 is on the way. The east Germans have had problems with brown coal pollution, so in my naivety I thought that there would be a splendid market for this splendid product. As for imports, the Chinese tried and failed, the Vietnamese have occasionally tried but have not got far and perhaps the South Africans will try. But we can compete with the imports if and when they come. The problems that arise in respect of soft coal and bituminous coal do not arise with anthracite.

In my constituency there is some activity among the small private mine operators. Planning applications are being sent in to the county council asking for permission to extend or construct small mines. So the market seems to think that there is profit to be made—hence my belief that my idea for a British coal operation was in tune with market forces.

Such a venture would not cost much. The mechanisation does not need much money spent on it. Our two main assets are the coal itself and the skills of the miners. I was not asking for enormous investment in the new venture. Unsurprisingly, however, the answer was no. It was not a reasoned no or an analytical no: it was a British Coal no. I have been in the House for 20 years, so I and other long-serving Members know what a British Coal no is. It is a no pregnant with the inflexibility and lack of imagination that have characterised the senior management of British Coal for so long—factors that have contributed to the sad state of the coal industry today.

I was told that demand for anthracite was falling. The next paragraph of the letter directed me to the headquarters of the opencast executive in south Wales. After 20 years here I know about that executive, too. I was told that its members might talk to me. That executive wants to gouge out more parts of my constituency. Eighty per cent. of the anthracite produced in Britain, and hence in my constituency, is produced by the opencast executive; only 20 per cent. by small mines.

We are told that opencast coal is cheaper to produce. I do not know if that is true. It is certainly not cheaper for the environment or in terms of noise, or dust in the atmosphere, or even the gases that come up from opencast mining. New research suggests that methane and other gases are released by opencast mining. They are not released by deep mines, slant mines or drift mines. Opencast mines are not cheaper, either, in respect of the sterilisation of the coal. The sterilised coal is below the coal that the opencast machinery can reach. Why not impose on opencast companies the condition that they must construct concrete tunnels so as to reduce the costs of getting at the coal which cannot be reached by machines? Overall, I do not believe that opencast mining is any cheaper.

In the past we have tolerated opencast mining in west Wales because we have accepted the argument—perhaps we should not have—that profits from it are used to maintain the deep mines. That loyalty is disappearing and it will disappear even further if British Coal and the opencast executive are privatised. There is no more loyalty. In future, we will fight every planning application in west Wales to extend opencast mining. We believe that the balance of 80 per cent. to 20 per cent. is wrong. That balance must be redeemed, reduced in favour of deep mining, slant mining and the proper mining of anthracite. I cannot believe that British Coal or the Government will achieve that. However, I am confident that my right hon. and hon. Friends will do it.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I want first to apologise for the fact that I have not been here for all the debate and for that reason, if for no other, I will try to be relatively brief because other hon. Members wish to speak.

My constituency is about as far away from the coal mining areas as it is possible to get. It shares a border with the English channel and its immediate acquaintance with mining relates to clay mining. People from my part of the world who know their ancestry will be aware that the clay miners reckon that they are as hard a bunch of men as there could ever be. They would not in any sense take second place to coal miners. It would be a bad mistake for me to carry that particular idea forward in the Chamber tonight, so I will not do it.

In the relatively few years that I have spent in this place, I have noticed the increasing tendency of people who write to me to be concerned about the environment. Twenty years ago the words "ecology" and "environment" were probably not used in the normal course of conversation. These days they are the main topic of conversation.

Ever since 1983 I have noticed that when people write to me about environmental matters, their contributions have become relatively better informed and more subtle. It is clear from my postbag that, while at one time it was thought the debate was that nuclear fuel was dirty and therefore by implication everything else was clean, people are beginning to realise that, inevitably in life, sometimes things are not that easy.

One cannot simply say that nuclear fuel will always be dangerous. Increasingly people now understand the polluting effects of fossil fuels. One needs only consider the horror stories from eastern Europe to understand how dangerous and devastating fossil fuel pollution can be. It would be impossible to calculate the damage that this country has suffered from the burning of fossil fuels since the industrial revolution. However, I believe that that damage is incalculable, vast and grave.

When we consider what is in this country's long-term interests, when we consider the advantages of fuel resources available to us and when we consider how fortunate we are to have such stocks of fossil fuels, even if we consider the damage to communities when traditional industries can no longer manage, the one ingredient that we cannot ignore is the environmental bill which must be paid.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that his postbag is full of letters from people lobbying him to support nuclear power? That is not my experience nor, I would imagine, the experience of the majority of hon. Members. The opposite is usually the case. The environmentalists lobby against nuclear power. The hon. Gentleman appears to be lobbying for it.

Mr. Nicholls: I partly agree with the hon. Gentleman. However, when I consider my postbag in 1983, the environmental views were straightforward. Nuclear power was bad and, by implication, any other form of power was good.

Nowadays, when people write to hon. Members, they do not write to say that they are pleased about something; they write in to complain. They write in to complain about the nuclear power industry. However, it is my experience —one that the hon. Gentleman may not share in his part of the world—that there is a growing realisation that life is not quite that simple. Even those who believe that nuclear power is ultimately a polluting industry now realise that the argument is not quite so straightforward. In a sense, one gets ought for nought. People realise that there is a price to be paid for fossil fuels as well. That is a welcome development because, although it makes the argument more difficult, it shows that people are beginning to realise that there is a subtlety in the argument which perhaps did not exist before.

I hope that when my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Energy replies to the debate, he will consider the implications for the environment. So often our debates in this place polarise and Conservative Members defend their communities while Opposition Members defend theirs. I come from an agricultural community and I can understand how the care for one's community sometimes overrides all economic logic. One need not apologise for that as it is a simple fact of life. At times I have to tell farmers that, like it or not, an economic price must be paid which may be too great for the preservation of a lifestyle which they and their forefathers enjoyed. Opposition Members must be aware that a balance must be struck and a price must be paid. That price may be too great from an environmental point of view. I do not say that flippantly or lightheartedly, nor do I take any comfort from saying it.

There seem to be contradictions in Labour's position on pollution and what it means in terms of fossil fuel which simply cannot be resolved. We have heard that coal is good and clean and that point was emphasised by the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). However, it is not clean or cheap. As I understand it, Labour wants to discourage the use of gas in power generation. That can be achieved only by burning more fossil fuels and by increasing the amount of coal that is used. An environmental price must be paid for that.

Unusually these days we are all communautaire——

Mr. Skinner indicated dissent.

Mr. Nicholls: Well, apart from those who are completely prehistoric. These days we try to be more communautaire than thou. No doubt the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) would say, "En passant".

As I understand our responsibilities and obligations in Europe, we no longer have the freedom of movement that we might want in terms of banning imports. The days when we could defend good old British bulldog industry by slamming on trade tariffs and erecting a barrier against the rest of the world have gone. Will it be possible in the context of our presence in the European Economic Community for us to restrict coal imports? I doubt whether that will be the case. As I understand our obligations in Europe and in GATT, even if restriction was a good idea—and we could debate that if we had to—that will not happen again. I cannot see how that aspect of Labour party policy can be squared.

If it were possible to diminish the use of gas, to increase British coal production and to erect trade and tariff barriers to ensure that we cannot import foreign coal, what would the consequences be for those who want to use the power that is generated? Understandably we hear a great deal about how increases in the very staples of life bite on those who can very often least afford those increases. The consequences of erecting barriers—even if we could do that—to produce and use fuel at a price that we could achieve only if we erected those barriers would have a direct effect on the cost of power.

It is easy to debate in this House and reveal inherent contradictions between one side and the other and to make simplistic points about how one side must be right and the other wrong. I do not do that in this debate.

The Labour party is utterly impaled on the horns of a dilemma from which it cannot escape. On the one hand, Labour Members know where their roots are and they know how much they matter to them desperately. On the other hand, they know that the price of preserving their communities in the way that they want will be too high for their own country to have to pay.

The words of the Green party are not usually cited by Conservative Members to justify their own position. I cannot think of many times when I have been able to say that the Green party is very much on our side in this matter. The Green party has said that the Labour party's position is "wobbly, ineffectual and dictated by the unions."

That view was quoted in the Daily Mail in September last year. At the end of the day, those who pay the piper must call the tune.

[Mr. Nicholls]

There is a price to be paid for not realising that the days of production of coal at the expense of all other power fuels are over. We need to know more about that price. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to help us on that point tonight.

7.30 pm

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): In his maiden speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) demonstrated great knowledge and ability. Hon. Members will be glad to hear him speak again. The most significant aspect of my hon. Friend's speech was the reference to his predecessor, George Buckley. His comments will certainly endear him to his hon. Friends.

As the debate rages on, the Government will surely not attempt to deny that the moneys provided in the Bill will be regarded by thousands of miners as the prelude to the Government's plan to privatise the coal industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) referred to the speed with which the Government introduced the Bill and his comments add credence to my view. It would be weak for the Government to deny it, because the ink of the Queen's Speech is hardly dry, and it stated that the Government will "continue to prepare for the privatisation of the . . . British Coal Corporation."

All hon. Members are guilty of using flowery language. I am certainly as guilty as everyone else. However, certain language to which I take exception is used when the Tory party tries to defend the privatisation of the coal industry. I read—I do not know whether it came from the Department of Energy or from Conservative central office; I suspect that it was the latter—that privatisation of the coal industry will drive a stake through the heart of Dracula, the leader of the NUM. What a way for a party to defend its proposals. Yes, a "stake" is involved—the jobs of 30,000 to 50,000 miners.

The Government must be reminded that the average age of the labour force in the coal mining industry is about 30 years. The prospect of being flung on to the scrap heap in a period of rising unemployment is daunting for young men with wives, children and mortgages. The dangled prospect of £30,000 is not much if one is trapped in the dole queue in an area where employment prospects are practically nil.

That point enables me to raise with the Minister the matter of aid to mining areas, which was also referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth. Hedley Salt, chairman of the Coalfield Communities Council, wrote to me on the subject of RECHAR and additionality. Much-needed economic generation is taking place in Germany, Belgium, Spain and France because RECHAR money has been made available to them. However, the United Kingdom Government will not honour the regulations that they agreed. The RECHAR programme is covered by the same European Commission regulations as the structure funds in general. I repeat that the Government agreed those regulations. We hear talk nowadays about being good Europeans. The Commissioner will not release the funds unless the United Kingdom agrees, as Germany, Belgium, Spain and France have done. It is stated that the moneys have to be additional to any funding by a member country which qualifies for assistance—hence the word "additionality", which is associated with funding.

I am advised by the Coalfield Communities Campaign that RECHAR moneys—£100 million—allocated to United Kingdom coalfields in December 1989 have still to reach the United Kingdom. Therefore, it is urgent that the Minister's Department and the Government honour what they agreed, or that money and many other benefits will be lost to the United Kingdom.

I now refer to the proposals regarding the repeal of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1908. The Secretary of State did not provide a good defence of the Government's proposition. I wish that I had time to go into the matter in more detail, because the proposals in the Bill are seriously flawed. It is no use any hon. Member saying that the length of miners' hours has nothing to do with safety. That argument was demolished in speech after speech by my hon. Friends. The 1908 Act currently limits the shift length for underground miners to seven and a half hours.

The 1908 Act was introduced and subsequently amended because of the realisation of the dangers caused by excessive working hours in the mining industry. As well as providing legislative protection, it underpins the collective agreement which provides for a basic shift of seven and a quarter hours plus winding time for underground workers and eight hours for surface workers. It is a disgrace that the Government's proposition was incorporated in the Bill without any consultation with the unions. The only consultation that the Government had was with civil servants. Some of my best friends are civil servants, but what the hell do civil servants know about working in the mining industry?

The clear view of both miners and my hon. Friends is that the proposed abolition of the 1908 Act is to pave the way for privatisation by deregulating vital safety provisions and allowing the employer to introduce an extended normal working day in the guise of a flexible shift. What upsets and angers my hon. Friends is that the Department of Energy is praying in aid the proposed European Community directive on working time as a justification for that change. I wish that I could go into the matter in more detail. The Government's attitude is two-faced—they are also devoting all their energies to preventing the directive from coming into force. The directive is based on minimum standards—but I am caught out by the time, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am much obliged to the hon. Gentleman.

7.40 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I begin by welcoming the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) to the House. I say that on behalf of the party he beat as opposed to the one that he put into third place—the Conservative party, which was marginalised in that by-election. I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman's choice of best cricketer in the world, because I am a Glamorgan supporter, or with his preference for league rather than union rugby, because I am a Welshman by background. However, I am sure that, if he can add support for those sports to his campaigning on behalf of his electorate in west Yorkshire, he will serve his people well. I wish him well in that job.

It is obvious from the speeches of the hon. Members for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) and for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) and from that of the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) that underlying today's debate is a debate on Britain's energy policy. We would not have needed much of today's debate if we had a proper energy policy. One of the frustrations of being in opposition for so long to what is, in effect, a minority Government is having to watch this country go on for such a long time without any energy policy.

If we had a rational energy policy, we could ensure not only that coal had a role to play now, but that it could continue to play an important role in the future. The hon. Member for Teignbridge cannot argue simply that nuclear power is cleaner and environmentally more safe and that it should therefore always take precedence over coal, because we can do things to coal that would make it environmentally far more acceptable. In addition, nuclear power is potentially far more dangerous to the world than any activity in a colliery.

I should like to make a couple of points about the Bill's two substantive provisions before turning to its hidden agenda. My hon. Friends and I will vote against the Bill on Second Reading because——

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Only the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hughes: No, it will not only be me. My colleagues and I will vote against the Bill, and not for any obscure reason. We do not believe that its two main provisions have a necessary part in this year's legislative programme unless they are intended to enable the privatisation of British Coal next year if the Tories are still in power. That argument is self-evident from the words and figures.

The Bill's first provision is to extend the power of the Secretary of State to make grants to the British Coal Corporation beyond the 1987 legislation. The figures are clear, and the Library note confirms them. The Secretary of State's capacity to make grants is at present limited to £1,500 million. The table provided in the Library note projects that we shall not come up against the upper ceiling of the present capacity in either this or the next financial year. It is true that we have had to continue to increase the amount of money that is paid by the Government—by the taxpayer—for restructuring the industry, but we will not reach the ceiling either this year or next year. We could address the issue of whether we need to raise capacity just as well next year as this year.

I have not heard a single argument—there was not a sentence in the Secretary of State's speech—to suggest that the upper limit will be reached in the coming year. It will not be reached as a result of any programmed present redundancies, or by any new contracts with the generating industries, because they will not be renewed until early 1993. Therefore, I can see no immediate obvious or even superficial justification for the provisions.

The same argument applies to the repeal of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1908. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) had some difficulty about attributing this and therefore did not say that that eminent legislation was passed by a Liberal Government. At that time, Winston Churchill was a Liberal Minister. I am glad that he finds such favour with the Opposition.

Apart from the fact that the 1908 legislation was commendable and is still valid, it is unnecessary to repeal it, because the European Community directive is intended to establish minimum standards. Let us assume that the directive is fully supported by the Government, who do not wish to amend one jot or comma of it and who are willing to sign up to its immediate implementation. The directive does not impose any stricter standards than the 1908 Act.

That legislation is a tougher regulatory measure governing hours of work than the current European Community directive. The last draft of the directive that was considered by the European Parliament refers to a normal minimum of eight hours' work. That is made clear in the Library note and is generally known. For historical reasons, to which many hon. Members have referred, the 1908 Act has a lower minimum. If one wished to do so, one could sign up for the directive while keeping the 1908 legislation in force.

There must therefore be another reason for the Government's proposals, and it was not honest or honourable of the Secretary of State to pretend otherwise. He said that he would not introduce his power to repeal the 1908 Act until the directive was in force, but it is not necessary entirely to repeal the legislation when the directive comes into force, because they are compatible. Under the European Community legislation, one could have tougher standards in national law without any difficulty. One could not have more standards, but there is no argument on that.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) tried to get himself out of a large hole——

Mr. Dobson: Out of a pit.

Mr. Hughes: Indeed, out of a pit.

I was amazed that the hon. Member for Nottingham, South could believe that the provisions have nothing to do with safety. One need only read the 1908 debate—as I have done—to see clearly that the Liberal Government addressed that question. To complement the quotation from Winston Churchill's reply to the debate on the then Coal Mines (Eight Hours) Bill that was given by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, I should like to draw the House's attention to other words of Winston Churchill in the same speech, which are as self-evidently true today as they were then.

"We have reminded the hon. Gentleman of it often; but why should cheapness of production always be achieved at the expense of the human factor? The hon. Gentleman spoke with anxiety of the possibility of a rise in miners' wages as a consequence of this Bill. Has he considered the relation of miners' wages to the selling prices of coal?"

At that time, miners' wages were only 60 per cent. of the selling price of coal. It is very often possible to have better wages and cheaper production costs. It does not necessarily follow that decent wages and working conditions with fewer hours mean a higher cost to the consumer.

The peroration was typically Churchillian. He said that, in 1847, Parliament

"trusted the broad generous instincts of common sense; they drew a good, bold line; and we to-day enjoy a more gentle, more humane, more skilful, more sober, and more civilised population the blessings of which have followed their acts." —[Official Report, 6 July 1908; Vol. 191, c. 1332-34.]

Winston Churchill's argument was based on health, welfare and scientific considerations, and aimed to support the work force. Although I have never worked as a miner,

[Mr. Hughes]

I was brought up in south Wales and have been down pits there and in the east midlands coalfield. I am aware of the conditions in which miners work. The air, the cramped conditions, the sometimes incredible heat in the pits and the importance of the job require that those working there be given special protection by legislation. I challenge any hon. Member to say that those who provide one of the most fundamental sources of Britain's ability to earn its way in the world by supplying our energy needs should not be afforded proper legislation by this House. The Secretary of State's argument was no defence.

Like the debate, the Rothschild report conceals the hidden agenda, or does so until it is leaked. The agenda is hidden in both senses of the word. The Rothschild report was hidden because it was a secret and we could not see it, and the legislative agenda is hidden because the Government in fact have a clear view about privatisation. I and my colleagues who have had this portfolio have argued consistently over the years that our national coal assets should belong to the Crown, that these rights such as those for oil and gas should belong to the Crown, and that the Government should give licences rather than that there should be a private monopoly, which is what the Government presently propose.

Only in that way will we continue to sustain a competitive coal industry. Only in that way will we avoid the outcome of which the right hon. Member for Llanelli warned us—more and more opencast mining, to the detriment of our environment and the industry which has served us well.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): I declare an interest as a consultant to the Confederation of United Kingdom Coal Producers. As is customary in these regular debates on the increase in funds for British Coal, I shall also take the opportunity to expand on the problems facing the coal industry. It is always a feature of these debates that we listen to the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) who rewrites history to a certain extent. For sheer brass-neck gall, it is usually a virtuoso performance.

The Bill is certainly short but it involves a substantial amount of money. It is the latest example of the Government's massive commitment to the British coal industry since 1979. Since that year about £24,000 million has been invested in coal by the Government. That investment has produced modern equipment which, as we have heard, has led to a much safer record in pits. It has led to a massive programme of alternative jobs through British Coal Enterprise Ltd. and to the most generous redundancy terms. I submit that that is an unparalleled record of commitment.

As both Conservative and Opposition Members have said, the industry has responded to that investment. Since the end of the strike productivity has increased by 100 per cent. and is continuing to climb. That compares favourably with the 2·5 per cent. increase in productivity achieved under the Labour Governments from 1961 to 1979, although I recognise that in that period there was a Conservative Government.

We have also seen the industry cut its unit costs by 40 per cent. The 1990-91 results show that it has made the first profit for 13 years. That is no mean achievement. My hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) referred to the enormous increase in the amount of coal produced per man. I am proud that my constituents who work at Littleton colliery in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) continue to produce record amounts of coal. They are currently ahead of their target of 27,000 tonnes a week. I salute the contribution that my constituents have made at a difficult time.

The figures that I have given show that the industry has enjoyed favoured status. There have been great demands on Government spending and everyone in the coal industry and the coal communities should recognise and acknowledge the priority that the Government have given it. That is a real priority, not the phoney type of priority that we get from Labour Front Bench spokesmen. It is no wonder that the miners of Britain know that the Conservative party is the miners' friend.

British Coal has made advances and a new attitude is permeating its management. At long last the nationalised industry is recognising that the United Kingdom private sector, which is extremely active abroad, has something to offer us here. The private sector already employs some 40,000 people and has capital equipment valued at about £2,500 million tied up in the winning and processing of coal in the United Kingdom.

Of course, the private sector has always been responsible for the winning of opencast coal, but in recent years a refreshing new approach has begun to appear elsewhere. In the past three years or so British Coal has invited the private sector to tender for a variety of work such as surface plant hire, road haulage, some development and maintenance work and the washing and processing of coal at the pithead. That growing partnership between the public and private sectors must be in the interests of the modern British coal industry. But much more can continue to be done.

I welcome the opportunity that my right hon. and hon. Friends are taking to repeal the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1908. It has been instructive to listen to the debate today. As I understand it, the regulations have been broken for years on end. If the matter is of such importance to safety—none of us puts safety other than first—and miners are so at risk, why did not any Labour Government prosecute? Why are not the trade unions beating a path to the door not of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State but of the Opposition Front Bench spokesman, based in his coal mine of Holborn and St. Pancras, asking him to demand that the Government enforce the Act?

I suspect that Labour Members' opposition to repealing the Act is an example of the Labour party being rooted in not 1948 but 1908. Today's management and unions want to get on with producing an effective and efficient coal industry. If their safety was being impaired, the unions at least would be demanding that the Act be enforced.

Other things could be done and I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Minister is not taking the opportunity to do them in the Bill. I should like to see the limit on the number of men allowed to work underground lifted altogether. When my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) was Under-Secretary of State for Energy, I was his parliamentary private secretary. I was delighted that we lifted the limit of 30 men to 150. It seems that that limit could be dispensed with altogether. That would offer the realistic prospect of the private sector working mines which British Coal considers unworkable.

Our overriding concern must be not for the producer but for the consumer. We need to ensure that industry and the householder have the cheapest possible supply of energy. Competition in power generation, so derided by socialists as Conservative party dogma, is making that a reality. That competition has brought pressure on British Coal to keep its costs under control and it is doing so. My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) highlighted the need for power generators to secure long-term contracts for coal in the same way as gas contracts have been made. I understand his point. Concern for the consumer must be paramount but if the generators believe that they can screw down British Coal with the threat of imports, they would do well to consider the consequences of refusing indigenous British Coal.

First, the world market in coal is small and a large uptake by the United Kingdom could result in a sudden large increase in price. Secondly, long lines of supply could be disrupted in times of crisis. Thirdly, coal mines which have been closed would be expensive if not impossible to reopen. The generators would be at the mercy of overseas suppliers who have alternative forms of supply.

Mr. Dobson: Market forces.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman says, from a sedentary position, that that is market forces. I am pointing out to the generators what market forces could do to them if they were not cognisant of the need to take advantage of long-term contracts with British Coal.

The Labour party has offered nothing constructive at any point in the debate. Indeed, it knows that since it was in government the industry has been contracting and a continuing degree of contraction is inevitable. We have had contradiction after contradiction from Labour Members. They profess anxiety about unemployment. I do not doubt that that anxiety is genuine. But everyone knows how difficult conditions are in the coal mines, although with modern equipment they are far less difficult than before.

What does the Labour party want? Does it want 200,000 to work in those difficult conditions or does it want a modern, efficient industry in which the minimum number of people are subjected to work in those intolerable conditions? My constituents in Staffordshire would much prefer to work in a clean environment than to have to work with all the risks which exist even today in the coal industry.

There was a contradiction of attitudes when we debated the Coal Mining Subsidence Bill, as it then was. The measure was enacted in 1990. The Opposition spent all the time that was available to them seeking to impose yet more intolerable burdens on British Coal. When doing that they said that they were supporting the interests of the coal industry.

What is the Opposition's view on the size of the industry? If they want to maintain it at about its present size, how will they ensure that that happens? Would they restrict coal imports and break EC rules? Would they ban the use of gas, when stations are being built and the gas is already contracted for? Will they phase out nuclear power and increase CO_2 emissions? The Labour party seems to want to have it both ways. It wants to portray itself as green as the Benches upon which Labour Members sit, yet it wants to protect and cosset an industry that is perhaps not the greenest in the world.

8.1 pm

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) will forgive me, I hope, if I do not take up his remarks. He may be among those Conservative Members who think that we should not perceive clause 1 as controversial. As it extends the period of finance beyond the date on which the contracts with the generators cease, we can perceive that there is likely to be an act of folly. As my right hon. and hon. Friends have said, it is clear that clause 1 has been designed with a view to shedding many jobs and closing many pits.

The Minister will say that clause 1 is designed to provide for redundant miners. He will argue that they should be treated decently, and so they should. However, in providing funds for redundant miners, there is far too little regard for the economic and social consequences that befall the coalfield areas. There is the effect upon the community, the cost of physical restoration and the scale of employment need. I read in my local newspaper today that in the past few years 4,500 jobs have been lost in heavy industry. There is a buoyant note from the Department of Employment to the effect that 3,200 jobs have been created for ladies working part-time. There is no conception of the effect of the reduction of income and the weakening of economic capacity. There is little conception of the effect on young people who have seen the reality of employment starvation.

Happily, the Government will not be in power for very long now. They will not be allowed to see the coal industry diminish to a level at which enormous imports are unavoidable, imports that show that they have no thought for the morrow and the effect of their actions on the balance of payments.

It would not be so bad if we saw a real drive for increases in export achievements. I suggest to Conservative Members that they read the early-day motion that I tabled yesterday, which shows the effect of the rather short-sighted policy of the electricity supply industry. It has introduced enormous additional pricing. The Minister is aware of this, because he has received representations from the trade union movement. Powerful and logical arguments were advanced to him not long ago. The Government appear not to appreciate, know of or care about the effect of enormous price increases on the hitherto successful and exporting engineering steel industry, which has had to curb production. Apparently the Government would rather see people watching imported television soap operas than see Britain create the wealth that it needs, or the overseas earnings that will be required to pay for the coal that the Government wish to import.

I represent the National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers. It is an organisation with a long title but it is a most necessary body whose members are fulfilling a necessary and statutory role. It is regrettable—indeed, deplorable—that the Secretary of State should have embarked upon the preparation of clause 2 without consulting those with experience. He should have consulted those in the mining industry who have a duty to care, and not only the Health and Safety Commission. He should have gone beyond the leaders of British Coal, who have been queueing up to see changes in regulations and who have been bitterly critical of those who have said that people in the Department of Energy and at Hobart house want to dismantle the coal mine safety regulations.

[Mr. Peter Hardy]

The Department has had to have drawn to its attention the rock on which its privateering vessel would have wrecked itself—the rock of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. After spending four or five years pressing behind the scenes and arguing behind closed doors for the dismantling of the safety structure, the removal of the colliery deputy and the scrapping of the statutory priority for safety, it found that it would not be able to take that approach because of the provisions that are set out in the 1974 Act.

The 1974 Act requires the improvement or maintenance of existing standards, so the Government, in a rather furtive and deceitful way, have sought to make use of a draft directive. They have sought to allow it—I misquote Kipling—to be twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools.

Labour Members, however, are not fools, and nor are the members of NACODS. We and they know why the Bill has been introduced. It is designed to assist privatisation. That is the Government's intention. They have no other purpose. Despite the claims of Conservative Members, the Government do not wish to save miners. They have no love for them. Conservative candidates like miners if they have them in the constituencies that they are contesting during elections. Conservative Governments do not like miners because they continue to support the Labour party.

Think of what we have seen. The Government's claimed affection for the mining industry over the past few years has known no bounds. I can see from my home the Dearne valley, where pits have vanished—Corton Wood, Wath, Manvers and Kilnhurst, for example. We have seen all the evidence of Conservative care—the destruction of the economy and the loss of jobs—in the name of profit. Some of those who wanted to see the privatisation of the coal industry will not take a long view. Like those who run some of the public utilities, their salaries are so inordinate that they need hold a job for only two or three years. They are not obliged to look ahead, but the House must do so.

Safety is important. The 1908 legislation is important, because conditions underground may be worse now than they were 83 years ago. There is more machinery, more isolation, a great deal more noise and much more tension. Conservative Members should not seek to create conditions in which men can be compelled to work underground for more than eight hours, and that would be the consequence of clause 2.

The Government must act consistently. I gave notice to the right hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson), a former Secretary of State for Energy, that I proposed to make the following point this evening. On 7 November 1988, I asked the then Secretary of State whether he would give an assurance to the House that, as the Government had no mandate to privatise the mining industry, they would not do so, and would take no significant steps to prepare that course. The then Secretary of State said:

"I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that he seeks. There will be no attempt at partial or back-door privatisation in the Parliament."

My hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) then intervened to talk about safety. He asked for an assurance that there would be no deterioration in safety standards, and the then Secretary of State replied:

"I can tell the hon. Gentleman that there will be no lessening of the regulations governing mine safety."—[Official Report, 7 November 1988: Vol. 140, c. 3.]

The Bill is a complete betrayal of the pledge or assurance that was given on 7 November 1988, and there has been no explanation or justification for the Government's change of mind. Do they think that we do not remember what Ministers say about important matters such as the future of the coal industry? We have had deceit and betrayal and now we have the insult of the Government's introduction of the Bill. By all means let us have money for redundant miners, but let us have justice for mining communities and a great deal more common sense in the House.

8.10 pm

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): The House must understand what the Bill actually means. So far, those who have spoken have told us what they think it means. Clause 1 increases the grant from £1,500 million to £3,000 million. It is a pay-off for the miners for the closure of 30 pits and the loss of at least 30,000 jobs. That will be the effect for the coalfield communities, about whom many hon. Members have spoken.

The Government talk glibly about how wonderful coal is. Britain has proven reserves for 300 years. Indeed, there is more coal than that, but those reserves are not proven. Nevertheless, I have received tonight, fresh from the Library's research department, figures for imports of coal which show that if they continue at their present rate for the next few months, Britain will have imported 20 million tonnes of foreign coal this year. That is four and a half times the 1983 level.

I ask the Government to be honest. Is it their intention to close down our industry and bring in foreign coal? There is an increasing reliance on foreign coal from countries such as South Africa, Australia and Colombia. We have heard about the sorts of conditions in which the miners of those countries work. Joe Gormley said in the 1960s and the 1970s that the Arabs would not always live in tents. There will be a day when the South African and Colombian miners will not live in tin huts. The Government should remember that when pushing through a Bill to increase coal imports from those countries.

There has been a big increase in opencast mining. We hear a great deal from Conservative Members about the environment. They should come to my county of Northumberland, which is the country's largest producer of opencast coal. It is devastated by coal hills—and if that is not environmentally unsound, I do not know what is.

We should be concerned about miners' jobs. It costs £8,900 a year to keep one miner on the dole. That is an enormous figure when he could have been digging coal. Of course, the Government do not want the miners to dig coal. They want to have only a few pits where they can get their grubby hands on the profits. What about the families of the miners? What about the children? What about the lads in Newcastle and Oxford who we see on television saying that they have no jobs and no hope? Once, we had the pits and the shipyards, but they are gone because the Government have destroyed those industries and jobs and have left the people without hope. The riots during the past few weeks have been laid at the doors of the young people, but they have been left without hope of a job. They simply have an employment training scheme that gives them the dole plus £10. I do not know how the Government can say that it is a wonderful training scheme.

What about the safety issues and the hours that miners work? I looked up the Second Reading debate of the 1908 Act and I found a wonderful sentiment—that a man should work eight hours, sleep eight hours, and do what he pleases for eight hours—and that is 24 hours in a day. That is a good and genuine sentiment. Ken Moses, the technical director of British Coal—whatever that means—said that he did not think that there was anything very hard about working 10 hours or more underground. He has never worked underground. He has certainly never worked 10 hours underground day after day, week after week.

Many hon. Members have referred to safety in the mines. I have 27 years' experience of working in the mines, 14 of them on the coal face operating a machine. I have worked in a modern industry with new technology and it is very difficult. When the 1908 Act went on to the statute book, miners used shovels and picks. I have worked in conditions where I could not see my hands in front of me because of the dust from the machines, even though they had dust suppressors. I worked in the mines when the water was coming in and I was soaked for hours on end. The Bill will make miners work in wet conditions, with stones coming away from the roof, for 10 hours a day.

Mr. Cummings: Twelve hours.

Mr. Campbell: My hon. Friend is right.

I am appalled that the Government have introduced this Bill without even having a word with the unions, and in particular the deputies union, which is responsible for safety. The Government did not even ask the unions and the miners what they thought about 10-hour shifts without the right safety conditions.

Mr. Christopher Hawkins (High Peak): I accept that there must be some time limit, on safety grounds. What if the men were happy to work four nine-hour shifts rather than five seven and a half hour shifts, and the unions agreed to that? Currently, that is illegal. Is not that nonsense?

Mr. Campbell: If that is what the hon. Gentleman thinks, let us go and meet the miners and talk to them.

Most accidents happen at the end of a shift. The records show that miners are more likely to be hurt at the end of their shift than at the beginning. Currently, they work seven and a half hours. It is a tiring job in an environment which is not comparable with normal working conditions. It is in the bowels of the earth and anything could happen. I have worked in the mines for 27 years and I have seen everything. My hair has stood up on my head with fright at some of the conditions. The Government are now asking the miners to work even longer in those conditions. They have not even tried to think about the consequences. If they were honest and if they were truly trying to do something worth while for the industry, they would ask the miners whether they wanted to work 10 hours, whether they wanted a week off, and so on. The Government have not met the miners or the union representatives to ask them what they want. They have not even asked the mines inspectorate what it thinks about the safety issues.

I hope that the Bill falls tonight, but I regret that it probably will not. I just hope that, when it becomes law, it will not result in a large increase in injury and death in the mines.

8.18 pm

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I was unable to be in the Chamber for the early part of the debate. I listened with great interest to the speeches and especially that of the hon. Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell). He said that he had spent 27 years in the mining industry. I have no direct experience of the mining industry, but I spent many years in an industry close to it and also in an area close to the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I worked for a company that was then known as C. A. Parsons, and which is now NEI Parsons on Tyneside. I was a design engineer working on steam turbines, with the object of improving their efficiency. We went to great lengths to increase their efficiency by a fraction of a per cent. The benefit of doing that was that lower costs would be incurred in mining coal for the generation of electricity.

That seems to highlight the dilemma facing Labour Members. The hon. Member for Blyth Valley described graphically the difficulties and dangers of the industry. The ideal would be to get coal out of the ground without anyone having to go underground at all. That would be better for all of us. But the dilemma then is what would happen to those who have spent their lives in the industry. I do not accept that they would all have to go on the dole and cost the country £8,900 per annum each.

In the past 10 years, the number of jobs in the industry has declined from about 200,000 to 100,000, but those people are not all on the dole. Many have found other work. The number of people in employment in Britain has risen by 1 million during that period. One must look at the matter in the round and see how the industry can be run with the smallest number of people under the ground. The more efficient the industry is, the more efficient other industries are which depend on coal mining. If we can reduce the cost of electricity, that will increase the number of jobs in manufacturing industry and all other sorts of industry.

Keeping costs down is also important for people who depend on electricity to heat their houses. I have been appalled at the cost of heating a number of homes in my constituency. Many people still rely on the old-fashioned red bar to heat their homes and the cost of electricity is important. Anything that we can do to reduce the cost of electricity is very much to the advantage of people who depend on electricity to heat their homes.

Therefore, we have the dilemma that if we try to protect the industry for the sake of the jobs that exist now, it could be at the cost of other jobs and at the cost of the standard of living of people who cannot afford to pay the high prices which would result. I find Labour's policy confusing. It is one of protectionism. It pretends to be environmentally friendly while not being so at all.

I remember some time ago taking part in a debate with the late Allan Roberts in the Granada television studios in Manchester when we both appeared on the front benches in a mock chamber in the studio. I compared Labour's policies with those of a dirty dinosaur, going round dropping slag heaps and not taking advantage of environmental improvements.

[Mr. Peter Thurnham]

One of the last jobs on which I worked when I was at Parsons was the Drax power station commissioned when the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) was Secretary of State for Energy. He failed to ensure the installation of flue gas desulphurisation equipment at that power station and it is having to be put in now by this Government at considerably greater cost. It is much more expensive to retrofit such equipment. Plenty of evidence was available at the time that that equipment should have been fitted, but if the Labour Government did not want to do something or recogni[illegible]g that was to the disadvantage of the mining industry, they turned their back on it, closed their eyes and pretended that the problem did not exist. [Interruption.] That is perfectly true. When the order was placed for the Drax power station, there was no provision for flue gas equipment and it is this Government who are spending the money to put the problem right. That exposes the inadequacies of the Labour party's energy policies.

The mining industry is not now active in my constituency, but there are plenty of signs of it. The old miners' hall in Bolton is a fine building and I am pleased to say that it has now provided a new home for the chamber of commerce, which moved in a month or two ago. I am pleased to see the building being put to such good use. There are still plenty of relics of the old industry about. Gullick Dobson near Bolton is a major employer manufacturing mining equipment.

Some signs of the old industry create problems. Considerable environmental costs in subsidence and weak buildings often do not show up until later. The pump house, just off Tonge Moor road in my constituency, has experienced massive difficulties because an old mine shaft was discovered to be in a different place from where it was thought to be and the new building had to be modified, at massive cost to the owners. That has affected their ability to carry on the business. Another fine new building recently put up, Ashton house, was about to be taken over by a Government Department for offices when it was found that further structural foundation work would have to be done because of the old mining works there. Therefore, the industry has hidden costs and the important thing is to recognise them.

I cannot understand the Labour party's attitude when it highlights the dangers and difficulties of the job and then says that we should distort the economic side so that more people should go underground than would otherwise be the case. We should not be afraid of privatisation because that will show the true economics; what is truly valuable. It can make sense for men to go underground and do a difficult and dangerous job only if it is profitable. Profit is not a dirty word; it shows whether an activity is worth while. If wealth is not created for the country, why send people down into the depths of the earth to do such a difficult and dangerous job? It is most important that all industries should create wealth. Unless they do so, how can we run the health service? How can we find money for the welfare state and for all the benefits that we want? If the mining industry is not profitable, for goodness sake do not let us send men underground working in difficult and dangerous conditions.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the nuclear industry is not profitable, yet the Government prop it up with thousands of millions of pounds in grants a year?

Mr. Thurnham: The nuclear industry should be profitable. It may not be profitable because in many cases the wrong decisions were made about the type of power stations to build. I have no doubt that if one took advantage of the latest designs available, it would be possible to construct a profitable nuclear power station; environmentally, they are much cleaner. It might be sensible to look at gas as the fuel to burn, but it will not be there for ever and we must consider a balance of provision.

I am grateful to have had the opportunity to speak. It is right that we should be introducing the Bill, but I am concerned at the massive sums of money that we have written off in the industry. If it is a worth while industry, contributing to the wealth of the country, we should be able to invest in it without having to write off such monumental sums as £5,000 million. Therefore, let us look forward to a profitable industry with as few people working underground in dangerous conditions as possible, while creating wealth for themselves, the industry and Britain.

Mr. John Cummings (Easington): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) on a magnificent maiden speech. I closely identify with his endearing remarks about his predecessor, a dear friend of us all and a good colleague.

I find no joy in taking part in this debate. The prince of darkness, the new area director in the north east, through deception and duplicity, has today announced the closure of Murton colliery where I used to work, with a loss of 1,000 jobs in an area with 20 per cent. unemployment. That pit has made £5·2 million profit since 1987.

There will be many troubled spirits as a result of the Bill but the Londonderrys and the Joiceys will be dancing a fandango this evening in the knowledge that the Bill is likely to become law and reverse the actions achieved by the sweat and blood of my predecessors who, for several generations, have introduced enlightened legislation since the 1908 Act. For longer shifts there will be a price to pay in human suffering, agony, and great distress.

In my maiden speech, I said that I was a sixth-generation child of the mining industry, and looked back with great tenderness on the hardships and efforts of my predecessors in Murton colliery. I know a man of 80 years of age, who after 51 years working in the industry is wracked with pain and extremely distressed. He is my father. After 51 years, his state of health is distressing to behold. He worked seven days a week, and at times 12 hours a day, out of choice, to provide for his wife and family.

However, at least my father had that choice. He could have used the legislation and told his colliery manager, "No—I am working seven and three quarter hours plus my winding time." If the regulations are changed, miners will not have that choice. Management will determine the length of shift. I foresee a legion of gentlemen such as my father in years to come.

Mr. Hood: If my hon. Friend's father had chosen to work beyond seven and three quarter hours plus his winding time, he would have been paid overtime. The Bill's purpose is not to pay more overtime but to get miners to work longer hours for the same or less pay.

Mr. Cummings: My hon. Friend is correct.

The hon. Member for High Peak (Mr. Hawkins) asked whether miners want a nine-hour day or a 40-hour week. We cannot answer that question because there has been neither consultation nor conciliation in respect of the Bill. For a proud industry with a first-class record of consultation and conciliation prior to 1974, it is disgraceful that the Bill has been brought to the House in the way that it has.

As to the closure of Murton colliery that was announced today, I refer to the output of its last five coal faces. E102 was worked with partial extraction and was profitable with 29 weeks of production. E110 was worked with partial extraction, and was profitable for 24 weeks. E112 gave 30 weeks production of partial extraction, and was also profitable. E104 was worked with partial extraction for 16 weeks and was profitable. The cumulative profits of those five coal faces since 1987 totalled £5·2 million.

The deceit arises because coal face E115 was worked with full extraction at the insistence of management, but against the better judgment of unions and of miners who had worked that seam for decades. The consequences were total disaster, losses, and today's announcement of the colliery's closure.

Mr. Skinner: It stinks.

Mr. Cummings: It stinks to high heaven.

Until six months ago, there were four collieries in my constituency—Dowdon, Vane Tempest, Easington and Murton—sharing common pumping costs of £4 million. Dowdon went, and that cost was shared between three collieries. If Murton goes, it will have to be shared between two collieries. As sure as night follows day, we are looking at the imminent closure of Vane Tempest and Easington.

The prince of darkness arrived in July, with a salary in excess of £70,000 a year, but with not one idea or positive suggestion to make the industry viable and contribute to the national economy. He was brought into the area to destroy it. He is destroying not just the area but the community.

Anyone who walks through the village of Murton—where my family has worked since 1842—will see a finely-woven tapestry of social history and commitment. Generations before the state thought about providing homes for the elderly, the people of Murton were doing so out of their own pay packets. There are 26 acres of welfare ground, cricket pitches, tennis courts, bowling greens, and football grounds, paid for out of pay packets and pockets at the pick point. Murton also has a 50 m Olympic-sized swimming pool—the only one of its kind between Leeds and Edinburgh—all provided for by the people of the community themselves.

When the colliery closes, I fear that we will see the death of that community and of its various welfare systems. That closure will affect other businesses in the area. Mineworkers who took redundancy and invested in small firms beholden to business coming from British Coal are finding that their investments are being wiped out.

Many statesmen and Ministers want to make a name for themselves. I suggest that the name of the Secretary of State for Energy in 1991 will be engraved in the hearts and minds of the people of Murton, for it was he who murdered Murton, and that will not be forgotten.

8.36 pm

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) on his maiden speech. I was particularly pleased with the comments on his predecessor, George Buckley, with whom I shared digs in 1987.

I oppose the Bill, because it will further the privatisation and contraction of the coal industry by closing collieries and increasing redundancy among mineworkers. These days, redundancy schemes are not voluntary, simply because there is not a sufficient number of collieries to which mineworkers can transfer.

The Bill will also buy out concessionary coal entitlements and introduce longer working hours by repealing the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1908. The Department of Energy is introducing a measure that relates more to health and safety than energy, but it has no powers of enforcement in respect of health and safety or employment legislation. The Bill seems to have been hijacked as a way of repealing the 1908 Act.

That the Government have no idea of safety measures has been shown tonight by the speeches of Conservative Members. We have seen already measures that will allow women to work underground again. That was done not for the sake of equality, because only certain qualified women will be allowed to work underground. As my hon. Friends have said, it is only a matter of time before children are sent back down the mines.

The extra grant that the Bill provides is for redundancies after 1993. As we know, the new contracts to be negotiated next year will come into force after 1993 and will cover much reduced coal tonnages. Despite all the pleading by British Coal and the Government about commercial confidentiality and the rest, we know that those contracts will involve substantially lower tonnages. Imports will increase by as much as 30 million tonnes.

Mention has been made of the greenhouse effect and environmental implications, but the same amount of CO_2 and greenhouse effect gases are given off by imported coal as from British coal. We should consider also the situation in other countries. America has increased its coal burn to 1 billion tonnes, and China to much the same level. It is no use pointing the finger at British Coal and accusing the industry of being responsible for the greenhouse effect and global warming.

After 1993, there will be another wave of closures. British Coal's chairman has already said that his industry will contract to meet the lower tonnages, rather than fighting to take a larger share of the market. According to the Rothschild report, about 14 collieries will be left by the end of the century.

Some of the money will go towards buying out concessionary fuel entitlements. The Government have said that those entitlements will be safe; yes, they will, because some are protected by statute. That, however, will not stop the Government offering pensioners money in exchange for their entitlement. We have already seen the problems that occurred earlier this year with social security payments. The concessionary coal liabilities do not make the industry particularly attractive to the City—and there are also industrial deafness and subsidence liabilities. How will the Government deal with those problems without earmarking funds?

In 1986, the Nottinghamshire area director, Albert Wheeler, introduced what is now known as the Wheeler plan, which brought flexible working to the industry. Since then, the industry has been considering ways of introducing flexible working hours over a seven-day cycle. British Coal and the National Union of Mineworkers have undertaken studies, whose results are now available, to show how a shift system could be introduced. The NUM's proposals provided more machine-available time than those of British Coal.

In a press release that accompanied the Bill, the Government observed:

"In practice the 1908 Act has little relevance to the modern coal industry since it reflects the working conditions, practices and technology of a bygone age."

That is deliberately misleading. The 1908 Act simply underpins the collective agreement that sets mineworkers' hours; it does not mention seven and a quarter hours plus winding time, which appears in the five-day-week agreement. That agreement was signed on 18 April 1947, and revised in December 1960. It was revised again in the Mines and Quarries Act 1954.

The five-day-week agreement is still in force. Even if the 1908 Act were repealed today, the agreement would have to be addressed, because it sets out hours of work. How will the Government amend that provision? In his latest Green Paper, the Secretary of State for Employment suggests that collective agreements should have legislative force. Will the five-day-week agreement retain legislative force? Will the Government allow negotiations to take place between the NUM and British Coal with the aim of amending the agreement, or will its repeal simply be imposed on the industry as wage agreements have been over the past few years?

Morale in the industry is at rock bottom. Not many mineworkers care what happens to it. Recently, a colliery manager called all the men into the canteen and told them that, if productivity did not improve, he would recommend closure. To a man, they stood up and cheered: they could not wait.

Other misleading statements have been made about the 1908 Act. It is not good enough to say that the Act relates only to hours of work. It was originally intended to protect mineworkers from the effects of long hours working underground; as hon. Members have pointed out, nowadays those long hours are compounded by the time that it takes to travel distances of up to 40 to 50 miles a day to get to and from the colliery.

Some hon. Members have referred to what was said in the House when the 1908 Bill was moved. Introducing the Bill, Herbert Gladstone said:

"There is the constant anxiety due to the incessant watchfulness necessary on the part of every responsible man in the pit."

He also referred to

"the darkness, the loneliness, the danger, the discomfort of working continuously in a high temperature."—[Official Report, 22 June 1908; Vol. 190, c. 1355-56.]

As my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) has pointed out, there is also the dust and the water.

This year, the Select Committee on Energy produced a report that described roof bolting as not the safest method of providing support underground. Many of the points made in 1908 are still relevant today. There is still darkness, and certainly there is still loneliness. In 1908, 1 million men were employed in the industry, but now there are only about 70,000; the loneliness must be much worse than it was then. There are still high temperatures as well, and, once underground, the men must remain there until they are wound out of the colliery.

The aim of the repeal of the 1908 Act is to increase productivity through a greater use of machinery over a six or seven-day cycle. That has nothing to do with the European directive. Over the past five years, productivity has increased by about 100 per cent., but all that the mineworkers have in return for that are lower wages containing a larger incentive-based element, and agreements that have simply been imposed on them.

Can the Government actually repeal the 1908 Act by this method? Article 16 of the directive allows national legislation to remain, and the Act is relevant to the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974.

8.47 pm

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): I enjoyed the speech of the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Cummings). While I may not agree with many of his views, none the less I respect the strength and sincerity with which he advanced them. The House is all the better for hearing views that are based on such vast experience. I have served with the hon. Gentleman on the Select Committee on the Environment and I am only sorry that he is not in the Chamber now.

I welcome the Bill. The Conservative party's record of support for the mining industry over the past 10 years is second to none. No one could possibly say that a considerable amount has not been spent on the industry since 1979, with the amount spent between 1948 and 1979. My hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) mentioned that earlier.

Opposition Members should remember that electricity can be generated by other methods. I sometimes think that they overdo the case for coal. I believe in a balanced form of electricity generation and an even-handed environmental and economic approach.

I welcome the developments in the coal industry involving low—nox burners, fluid bed dissolvers and flue gas desulphurisation to cut sulphur dioxide emissions. None the less, in environmental terms there are still problems with CO_2 emissions and there are increasing problems over the disposal of coal ash and gypsum. Those two aspects of generating electricity by coal will become more important and more worrying. We cannot continue to fill landfill sites with substances that are the by-products of generating electricity by coal.

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) talked about nuclear power, one of the alternatives to coal. One reason for speaking in the debate is that it is important to introduce a sense of balance. There are no coal mines in or near my constituency, but the north-west relies very much on the jobs of those in the nuclear industry to support local prosperity. The right hon. Gentleman said that the nuclear industry is not safe, cheap or peaceful. However, when he was Minister of Technology he had a considerable amount to do with the nuclear programme. It is a little odd that he should say that now. When he was in office he promoted no end of nuclear power industry projects.

It is also relevant that the right hon. Gentleman did not mention the word "environment" when referring to the nuclear industry. Earlier speakers pointed out that in the past the nuclear industry was considered to have a damaging effect on the environment and that the spotlight was hardly ever directed on the coal industry. During the past few years the nuclear power industry has spent a great deal of money ensuring that nuclear power stations are as safe as possible. Apart from the front-end costs and the capital building programme, there are also the back-end costs of decommissioning. Many of those costs were not in the past—and it is unlikely that this will happen in the future—included in the cost of coal for electricity generation. We hear nothing about the costs of landfill, ash, gypsum and CO_2 emissions.

I ask the Government to ensure that when the different methods of electricity generation are considered they should be assessed on what is often referred to these days as a level playing field. We must take into account the back-end costs of producing electricity by coal in just the same way as we take those same costs into account when we assess the cost of producing electricity by nuclear means.

Mr. Hood: Is the hon. Gentleman giving the same consideration to the ring fencing of nuclear power?

Mr. Mans: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the costs of nuclear power are higher than coal?

Mr. Hood: Yes.

Mr. Mans: The reason why that appears to be the case is that the back-end costs of generating electricity from coal are not included in the financial calculations. When one looks at the generation of power from coal, where are the costs of subsidence and of the extra devices that have to be fitted to generating stations, as well as the cost of disposing of ash and gypsum and the overall cost of CO_2? Costs are not assessed on the same basis. If they were, I should go further down the road with the hon. Gentleman.

The Opposition's policy on electricity generation appears to be leading in one direction only—towards the increased use of coal to produce electricity. Alongside that policy, however, some members of the shadow Cabinet have an environment policy which is to stabilise CO_2 emissions by the year 2000. Again and again Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen have pilloried this Government for suggesting that that target is impossible and for going instead for the year 2005.

The Opposition's policy is clearly inconsistent. To pacify the coal lobby they insist that more electricity should be generated using coal. To pacify the environment lobby they say that they intend to stabilise CO_2 emissions by the year 2000. The hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) suggested that that is not a problem for this country; it is everybody's problem. He suggested that there was no need to look at CO_2 emissions from power stations in this country. I submit, however, that there is every need to do so and to get the equation right. If the Labour party wants more coal to be burnt in electricity stations, it will have to say that it cannot possibly meet its target, or the Government's target, of stabilising CO_2 emissions by either 2000 or 2005.

The Bill will put the coal industry on a firmer financial footing. I support the help that has been given to the industry in the past. All that I ask is that when the energy needs of our country are examined, the different methods of generating electricity should be assessed in a way that means that we can compare the relative costs in social, economic and environmental terms.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Three hon. Members have been seeking to catch my eye for some time. I hope, with a little co-operation and good will, that they will all be able to speak before the wind-up starts at 9.20.

8.56 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) on his excellent maiden speech. He has great knowledge of the mining communities where he has lived for most of his life. I feel sure that we shall hear much more from him, especially in debates of this nature.

I do not understand why this two-clause Bill is necessary. Why do we want to repeal the 1908 Act? A recent Department of Energy press release claimed that the new EC working time directive would necessitate the repeal of the 1908 Act. That must be one of the most hypocritical statements ever made by a British Government. They are fighting tooth and nail to stop the directive being approved. I understand that attempts are to be made next month to find a common position. I understand that that common position will be considered by the European Parliament and the Council of Ministers before a final decision is made.

Leaving aside the dubious political argument, the legal argument that the European directive would require repeal of the 1908 Act is manifestly absurd. If that is the case that the Department and the Secretary of State are making for the repeal of the Act, it does not hold water. The directive, like all others about health and safety at work, is intended merely to be minimum legislation and is not intended to replace more advantageous legislation within member states.

I have been looking at some of the early articles of the framework directive which governs all other directives, including those on working time. I have a directive dated 29 June 1989 which states:

> "This directive shall be without prejudice to existing or future national or Community provisions which are more favourable to the protection of the safety and health of workers at work."

Therefore, the argument that the European directive would mean an end to the 1908 Act is legally questionable. Were the 1908 Act still in force on 1 January 1993 when the directive is intended to come into place, the provisions of the framework Act and possibly the working time directive would prevent its abolition. Why do we need to repeal it? Why do the Government need to use the excuse—if that is what it is—of the European directive? I hope that the Minister will be able to tell me if I am wrong, and prove it. I shall be surprised if he can. The Government's great haste in rushing the Bill through may be because they want to wipe the 1908 Act from the statute book before January 1993 so that they are not caught by the provisions.

The second part of the Bill makes provision for a large amount of money. That really means providing for the privatisation of the coal industry. The Government have made it clear that that is their intention and the large amount of money is to enable them to see that through.

Since 1984, the Select Committee on Energy has repeatedly produced reports on the coal mining industry. The 1986 report said that never again should the Government allow the industry to be run down so rapidly that it created the social consequences that we saw up to 1986-87. We now find ourselves with the Rothschild report. It seems obvious that if, God forbid, we were to see the return of a Conservative Government, the industry would be privatised. However, before the privatisation programme, the industry would be cut down to the size suggested by Rothschild.

The big problem is that the Government have allowed the industry and the mining communities to be savaged but there has been very little assistance to enable those communities to recover or create alternative employment. In my area, the Wakefield metropolitan district council area, 28,000 jobs have been lost since 1985. There has not been one farthing of Government support, Government grant or European grant to help the communities recover. My constituency now has only one pit and if Rothschild has his way, it is on its way out, together with many more. There were eight pits in my area prior to the 1984 strike. The Prince of Wales called coal from the area Pontefract gold, but if Rothschild has his way, there will not be any. One can imagine the social problems that have been created.

Apart from those considerations, it is irresponsible of the Government to run down the coal industry and to sterilise billions of tonnes of coal. I was surprised to hear the Secretary of State say this afternoon that British Coal had informed him that the closure of the pits did not mean that billions of tonnes of coal would be sterilised. That was a strange remark. Only yesterday, I got a report from British Coal in which it replied to the Select Committee's report on clean coal technology and the future of the coal industry. The report made it clear that millions of tonnes of coal would be sterilised. How irresponsible is it to allow a major industry and a major source of our energy supply to be run down, and to allow the coal to be sterilised for ever? If the Rothschild report is right, capacity will go down to 30 million tonnes which would meet only half the country's demand for the generation of energy.

We may have to rely for half our coal on imports. When we cannot meet our demand, for how long will imports be cheaper than British coal? The children in the primary schools in my constituency can give the answer to that question. It is the height of irresponsibility to throw away our good fortune in having a colossal energy source under our feet and to sterilise it simply because of the political dogma followed since 1984. That is the problem that we face and I hope that, even at this late stage, the Government will have second thoughts.

The repeal of the 1908 Act threatens safety. Despite the genuine efforts of the miners and the management to maintain the markets, men are now being put in positions more dangerous than any since the coal industry was in private ownership. That is not scaremongering. I assure Conservative Members that that is the case, and that men are in danger and are being killed as a result of British Coal's policy.

9.6 pm

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): I echo the congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) on his maiden speech this evening. I also associate myself with his kind remarks about his predecessor, my good friend and colleague George Buckley. George was an especially good friend although, for 20 years, we lived 30 miles apart and never met. He was active in the Yorkshire coalfield while I was active in the Nottinghamshire coalfield. I met George only when I came here, and it was a pleasure for me to meet such a good and conscientious man of the people. I do not envy his successor, because he has a hard job in trying to follow him. George may have been small in stature, but he was a giant of a man to all who knew him.

The Bill is a preparation for privatisation. During the run-up to the general election, the Government do not want to hear the word "privatisation", but that is what is in store for the coal industry—or is it? I believe that there is a third option.

I and my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) have twice met the new chairman of British Coal. Reference was made to the high wages that the new chairman earns. On his appointment, the wages were increased from £90,000 a year—which he thought was a poor salary—to £220,000 a year. I remember that my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian challenged the Prime Minister to comment on the increase, and he answered that the chairman must be worth that salary. The Government must have thought that he was worth the money when they gave him the job and they must value his advice.

The truth is that the new chairman of British Coal has told the Secretary of State that he cannot privatise the coal industry in its present state and that the Rothschild report may understate what is really in store for the coal industry.

The industry may be run down to 12 or 14 pits, and there may be no interest from the private sector, because long-term contracts may not be negotiated, especially in view of the amount of imported coal. The imported coal is heavily subsidised, as we have said many times in the House. If the matter is left to an incoming Tory Government—God help us all if they are re-elected—the choice will be whether to keep a public coal industry or to close it. The third option is the elimination of the coal industry, and we should not overlook that possibility.

I was a miner for 23 years before coming to the House. I was a union representative for 14 years, and I know a lot about the industry and how important the legislation to protect the hours of working is to miners. When I was a union official, most—if not most, a good part—of the serious or fatal accidents that occurred at my pit involved men who were working excessive hours. I am talking not about someone working in an office for a couple of hours but about men working 3,000 ft underground in heat of up to 120 deg, who must swallow salt tablets to stop themselves fainting during their shifts. I remember when I worked at Ollerton colliery in the constituency of the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) that the management had to use haulage bogeys to take fresh water to the miners, who were drinking it faster than it could be ferried to them.

It is bad enough when people are asked to work long hours. In the coal industry, people are now working not two hours' overtime or nine or 10-hour shifts but 12 or 14 hours or sometimes more per shift. The legislation is not intended to legalise what already happens in the industry. It is not intended to legitimise the longer working day in the present industry. It is to accommodate the six or seven-day working week. As I said earlier, that is the thin end of the wedge which brings us closer to the day of ruin.

The former Prime Minister used to talk about Victorian values, and some of my hon. Friends have mentioned them this evening. Victorian days involved 12-hour shifts and six or seven-day weeks, and we are certainly returning to those arrangements. Women are now eligible to work down the pits under previous legislation, but there is protection for kids, for the 16-year-olds who come into the industry. There has always been protection to prevent them from working long hours and being exploited and bullied. The repeal which we are considering will open the way for the exploitation of young kids. We are being led back to Victorian times.

Mr. Jack Thompson (Wansbeck): One element—that of the private mines—has not been mentioned this evening. I understand from the figures given to me by British Coal that more than 1,600 men are employed in private mines. We know that safety standards in private mines are absolutely abysmal and well below those of British Coal. Those miners are open to even more exploitation than the employees of British Coal.

Mr. Hood: My hon. Friend makes a valuable point. The safety record in the private sector is worse, because it reflects the fact that those in the private sector are already forced to work longer hours. Miners in the private licensed mines used to receive a few extra pounds for each shift to entice skilled workers away from the coal industry. Now British Coal is getting rid of miners and private enterprise has too much manpower, so it is lowering wages. Miners now work in the licensed mines for less than they were paid in British Coal's mines. That has been happening for some time, but the Secretary of State and the Minister should know that.

I am conscious of the time, so I say only that it will be a sad day if the Government are allowed to change the legislation, not only for the miners and their communities or for those who, directly or indirectly, are involved in or seek employment in the industry, but for the whole of society. We have treasured our coal. I do not want to rely on quotations from Nye Bevan, but he was right when he said that we were a country built on coal. That is certainly the case, but the Government are walking away from that fact by encouraging imports of coal to destroy the fabric of our communities. The mining communities have been hammered enough. The Government govern not by consent or even by diktat but by spite—spite against the mining communities.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I shall be brief, because I understand that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) wishes to speak. I look upon him as the authentic voice of the Labour party, and I want him to be heard. I respect his views, although I do not agree with them.

I welcome the opportunity to speak. The Government have clearly shown during their 12 years in office that, whatever the Opposition may say, one does not spend £2 million of taxpayers' money every working day with the objective of closing something down. The Government's objective was to make the industry more efficient, to bring it into the latter part of the 20th century and to make it possible for British mines to produce competitively. All that has been achieved. People with a genuine interest in mining will welcome that.

Coal must still form an essential part of our energy policy. So long as there is coal in the United Kingdom that can be extracted efficiently from the ground, I see no day when we could envisage an energy policy that did not embrace coal. That would be nonsense.

The Bill will produce the finance necessary to allow the mines to operate efficiently and effectively, and will give the people who work in them the opportunity to feel that they are part of an industry no longer hooked on public subsidy. Whatever one's views on public subsidy, the plain fact is that people involved with industries that receive public subsidies always know it and they have that awful feeling that other people are supporting them. That is not true today in many areas that previously had public subsidies.

I do not say that in order to condemn the people who work in those industries. I have tremendous admiration for anyone who has spent a lifetime in the mining industry, especially at the coalface. I have a genuine respect for people who live their lives in that way. Their unique quality is demonstrated in many ways, not least their loyalty and service to the Crown in times of need. Mining communities have always proved admirable in that way.

I see that the clock is moving on, so I shall leave much of what I wanted to say until another day, and let the hon. Member for Bolsover speak.

9.17 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) talked about subsidies, and that leads me straight to the idea which has sometimes been muttered during the debate—that the mines should not have a subsidy. Yet most mines are interspersed with farming communities. There are a lot of fields, then a pit village, a pit tip and another dozen fields. The farmers get the subsidies, but the miners are supposed to get none.

The real trouble is that we hand over £18 a week for every family in Britain—a total of £14,000 million—through the common agricultural policy. The farmers live cheek by jowl with the pits that are shutting down. Some small farmers say, "We are not getting the money either," and they are right. The tin-pot agricultural policy over there in the Common Market has sent the money to the German farmers and all the rest.

A load of hypocrisy is talked on the subject, and the business about the hours adds more. The Government say, "We are not having any social charter. Get it out of the road. We will not be infected by it." Then, when an idea about making miners in pits work up to 48 hours comes along, the Government, with all their hypocrisy, say, "Oh, yes, we shall have to implement that Common Market directive—in order to make the miners work longer."

There is more hypocrisy to do with imports. The figures for this year show that £20 million-worth of coal will be imported to Britain by the end of December—the equivalent of closing 20 average-sized pits and getting rid of between 20,000 and 25,000 miners by throwing them on the scrap heap. They will then have to get money from the dole or the Benefits Agency, which will cost taxpayers a great deal more on top of the £25 billion that the state is already paying out for the unemployed. That is the economics of the madhouse.

What is more, 20 million tonnes of imported coal means another £1,000 million added to the balance of payments deficit. The Tory Cabinet comprises so-called business men. Nineteen former Tory Cabinet members enjoy 59 directorships between them. Theirs is the party of big business, yet the Cabinet, littered with all these people with all their business acumen, is making Britain bankrupt because of Ministers' desire to shut pits.

We are on solid ground when we say that we will oppose this Bill. When we get into government, as we shall some time early next year, we will tell the Common Market to stuff its directive on hours. We will make sure, too, that imports are reduced to the same levels as they were under the Labour Government. If we do that, we will save jobs for the miners and make this country richer as a result.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) on a magnificent maiden speech and I agree with him and others who have praised his predecessor, George Buckley, who was a good colleague of ours.

The Secretary of State's ringing declaration that this Bill has nothing to do with privatisation is an example of the double-speak that the Tories use when they start talking about the British coal industry. The Bill clearly belongs to a continuous line of Government action and legislation aimed at the so-called ultimate privatisation of British Coal. As the Queen's Speech put it, the Government

"will continue to prepare for the privatisation of . . . the British Coal Corporation."

One of the barriers to what the Government would regard as a successful sale is the amount of regulation covering coal mining activities. That is why the abolition of the 1908 Act was sprung on us, on British Coal's management and on the work force. The Government have done this despite repeated warnings from the Energy Select Committee and from elsewhere that such moves should take place only after full consultation and agreement with the unions. I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie), who spent many years on both sides of the Dispatch Box defending the interests of the nation and the British mining industry, pointed that out in his speech.

A former Secretary of State for Energy, the right hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Walker), on being asked about a change in the hours of work legislation by the Energy Select Committee in 1986, said that "if it had gone through all its processes. If the unions and the Health and Safety Commission all said it was okay", it would be all right. This Secretary of State does not feel the need to go through such a consultation process. He wants to keep the Government's proposals for the future of the industry a deep and dark secret—and so they remained until the Rothschild report saw the light of day a few weeks ago.

The Secretary of State may try to dodge the issue but tonight he is asking us to allow him and British Coal to pay for the top-of-the-range redundancy levels which the interim report from Rothschild urges as a necessary prerequisite for privatisation——

Sir William Clark (Croydon, West): Who wrote this?

Mr. Barron: I did. The report is not part of a plot hatched by the Opposition to make the Government look bad. It is part of the Government's plot to trade mineworkers' jobs and one of the nation's most valuable assets for a fast buck. That looks bad not just because the Government commissioned the report, but because they refuse to address its contents. All the ducking and weaving since the report was made public has convinced no one.

The report has informed the contents of the Bill, so will the Secretary of State or the Under-Secretary tell us whether the Government are going to reject the advice in the Rothschild report about the future size of the coal industry? Are the Government prepared for the industrial coal market to disappear, something that is implicit in the Rothschild report? If, as we have been told, that is only one of the options, the Minister should tell us what the other options are. If he does not, the uncertainty of the past few months—which has become worse in the past three weeks—will continue to hang over the coal industry.

The Secretary of State said that one of his justifications for further cuts in the coal mining industry is the growth of environmentally-friendly gas generation which we are led to believe is cheap. My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) disputed that in terms of the cost of gas and he had every reason to do so. The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) referred to that as well.

The debate about the price of generating electricity with gas is one of the most ill-informed debates to enter this place. As evidence of that, I want to refer to comments of Mr. Colin Webster, the marketing director of National Power. He is hardly someone who has made friendly remarks about the coal industry of late. He presented a paper on 5 April in which he stated:

"I am bound to conclude that looked at from the perspective of the economics of heat and power, it makes no sense to replace existing coal-fired plant with CCGTs unless gas prices are lower than today's."

That is not the coal lobby talking—that is the view of senior people in National Power who know exactly what is happening in terms of electricity generation in this country. That removes the Government's mask which they have worn over the past few months as they have tried to pursue the idea of cheap gas. That was simply another attack on the British coal industry.

If the Government sanction all the deals on gas burn that have been agreed to in principle, we will witness the transfer of 40 per cent. of power station coal consumption to gas. Recent information has shown that all but a few of those plants will produce power at a total cost above that of British coal at present prices. Some could be between 15 per cent. and 30 per cent. higher. Even retrofitting of flue gas desulphurisation at the big coal stations would not make them more expensive than some gas burn. That part of the power generation market will be closed to competition for 15 years because that is the length of some of the gas contracts that have been signed.

At the press conference when the Bill was published, the Secretary of State said that cuts in the mining industry are part of a plan for the reduction of carbon dioxide emissions. Those comments were quoted in The Observer the following Sunday. Reducing carbon dioxide emissions to required levels will not be achieved by ceasing to mine coal in Britain.

No one would disagree about the need for a plan. However, what plan was the Secretary of State talking about in front of the journalists? Under pressure he simply blurted out a few words, but nothing follows from them. He made no mention today of a plan about what the Government are going to do about carbon dioxide emissions. They seem to think that bringing foreign coal into this country and burning it in place of British coal will do something to limit carbon dioxide emissions. What nonsense.

At least the Under-Secretary of State for Energy, the hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), is trying to be sensible. With regard to a carbon tax he said at Energy Questions on Monday that if that "were done unilaterally ahead of the rest of the world, it could put British industry at a severe disadvantage."—[Official Report, 11 November 1991; Vol. 198, c. 766.]

He was absolutely right. He should not introduce such arguments when we know what the Government are after —attacking the British coal industry.

The Bill and the Rothschild report, with their prospects for the closure of 30 collieries in England and Wales, do nothing to reduce the amount of carbon dioxide that we produce. They merely pave the way for an increasing proportion of those emissions to come from the burning of imported coal. We need a plan, but we need a sensible plan —one that Britain and the rest of the world can agree. The Government obviously do not have such a plan, or it would have been mentioned today. The Government's prime motivation is to carry out an act of revenge on coal miners and coal mining communities.

These days, the Government pretend to care about the environment. However, they use it as a weapon to bash the coal industry. If only they had had the sense to invest in cleaning up our power stations, as the Germans have done, we would not watch electricity industry representatives and Ministers rushing around trying to find cheap fixes to meet their European obligations. If only the Government had concentrated more resources on the development of clean coal generators, we would not be light years behind the United States, Japan and other coal-producing countries in Europe. They profess wholehearted support for clean coal technology, but, by forcing British Coal to search for private sector money, the potentially world-beating topping cycle developments at Grimethorpe have been delayed and delayed.

Why is it that the first and second phases of planned underground gasification demonstration plants are to be made in Spain and Belgium? It is because those Governments have been arguing for coal utilisation while our Government have sat on their hands wanting to take a swipe at miners and their communities. The next Labour Government will look after the future of that great national asset. Whenever the Government want to call a general election, that is what we will do.

Some Conservative Members have made their last speeches in a Second Reading debate on coal. We have enjoyed them. The Secretary of State for Energy, on the Monday of the Labour party annual conference, phoned a few national newspaper editors to talk the Conservative party out of a general election this month. The following Tuesday, the chairman of the Tory party stood up at the Tory party conference and said, "We are going to wipe out Labour at the next general election." They cannot both be right. They did not want an election on 7 November. Instead, there are two fewer Members on the Conservative Benches than there were in July. Conservative Members know what is in store for them when they have the guts to call the general election. Opposition Members cannot wait to take the majority off them.

An integral part of Labour's plan to look after the coal industry will be the adoption of European proposals for the coal industry. Clearly, decisions reached in the forums of the European Community have affected and will increasingly affect our energy industries with the advent of the single-energy market. In the past, I have argued that using the spot price of coal on the world market as a benchmark for comparison with the British coal industry is simplistic and short-sighted. Recent discussions within the European Community endorse that view.

A current Commission-approved discussion paper that the Secretary of State must know about on state aid for the coal industry states that there is an urgent need to define the reference price for European coal. That is, a price that would establish an acceptable ceiling on production costs, taking account of the regulatory effect on the world market and a premium for security of supply. The reason for that is that the spot market varies with the dollar exchange rate and, for a long time, has been affected by the dumping of coal into Europe—something about which British Coal has complained to the Commission. We still never hear Ministers support the anti-dumping case. The reference price would allow aid for a long-term market to be established.

When the Council of Energy Ministers meets with those proposals before it, Opposition Members and the British coal industry would like to know what attitude Britain's representatives will adopt. Will they support the proposals that would provide for the coal industry's future? Will the Secretary of State bat for the British coal industry in the way that the German Government bat for theirs? It seems perverse that the expensively subsidised and more expensive German deep-mined coal industry has not suffered the rigours through which our coal industry has been put. The agreement that has been reached——

Mr. Hannam: The agreement is just about to be reached.

Mr. Barron: The hon. Member for Exeter may say that an agreement is about to be reached, but agreement has been reached this week. It will reduce our production by 15 million tonnes between now and the year 2005.

Mr. Hannam: No, the year 2000.

Mr. Barron: No, it is the year 2005 when the figure will be 15 million tonnes. The British Government have been practising euthanasia on the British coal industry and the Rothschild report is about to take that even further. Its proposals will make what has happened up to now look like a day out at the seaside.

It seems odd that the coal pfennig has been given the green light by Brussels when we have been continually led to believe that state aid for our coal industry would not be allowed. Industries in Europe, however, will receive state aid until the year 2005. That is not good enough. Nobody could believe that the Government do anything for the British coal industry because they are absent from the debate and have not done anything to help our plight.

[Mr. Barron]

The Secretary of State and his Back Benchers talk about how the Government have supported the coal industry. That is yet more Tory doublespeak for a decade that has seen the Government inspire a decline in coal production from 120 million tonnes per annum to 91 million tonnes; for a decline in employment from 223,000 jobs to 74,000 jobs and for the closure of more than two thirds of our collieries. If that is support for an industry, I should not like to be part of an industry that the Government were against.

Thurcroft colliery in my constituency is now threatened with closure because of a short-term geological problem, yet it has 20 million tonnes of workable low-sulphur reserves. If the colliery were allowed to overcome that problem, it could soon continue to earn the money that it has earned ever since the pit was sunk earlier this century. However, the Government are intent on that pit closure by which the nation will lose that asset of 20 million tonnes of coal.

My hon. Friend the Member for Easington (Mr. Cummings) referred graphically to Murton colliery in the north-east and spoke about what it means to a community to lose 600 jobs. That is what is threatened at Thurcroft at the moment.

Even when the Government have closed the pits, their vendetta against our communities continues. What other complexion can we put on their refusal to conform to the EEC regulations on RECHAR? What reason can there be other than the Tory party's vendetta against our coal mining communities?

The Secretary of State said that British Coal's market has been in decline for decades. That was certainly the case until the early 1980s, but British miners then started to lose their jobs to imports. That is what the Government want to continue to happen to miners even after all that they have been through to achieve their productivity increases of 100 per cent. in the past six years. Despite that, the Government want to take away thousands more jobs by importing coal.

The Secretary of State also said that the restructuring grant limit is "not determined by any view of the future of the industry."

I hope that I have quoted the right hon. Gentleman correctly. However, only last year in discussions on the level of restructuring grants, I was told by the then Under-Secretary of State that that was

"linked to expected redundancies. It is for British Coal to decide what manpower it requires ... However the Government need to make some estimate of the number of redundancies in order to seek the necessary estimate provision for restructuring grant."

Everyone knows that the Bill is part of the privatisation process. The Government and their Back-Benchers know it. We know it, miners and their families know it, and the country knows it. That is why we shall oppose the Bill in the Lobby tonight.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): The debate has been characterised by deep-seated differences of opinion, but it has been recognised on both sides of the House that the British coal industry faces formidable challenges. That was certainly recognised by the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) in his maiden speech. He made it clear that he will represent the industry in his own way. I disagreed with much of what he had to say, but I welcome him to the House from this Bench and look forward to debating these issues with him on many occasions.

We can certainly agree that coal sales are dominated today by the contracts between the generating companies and British Coal. The contracts specify both prices and volume—70 million tonnes this year, falling to 65 million tonnes next year. They have been cleared by the European Commission because they were transitional contracts. They expire in March 1993. Thereafter, the market will not be easy. Several large gas-fired electricity generating stations will begin to operate and that will inevitably take away a proportion of the market.

Just as natural gas displaced some of the coal and coal gas in the domestic market during the 1960s, so gas-fired stations will affect electricity generation in the 1990s. That is inescapable. But despite those structural changes, there will continue to be a large market for coal. Like Opposition Members, we want to see British Coal secure as much of that market as possible.

Negotiations for contracts after 1993 have not started, so we do not yet know the tonnages or the volumes. However, we know that the volumes will depend on the efforts of the managers and mineworkers in responding to those opportunities. Any Government and any industry in the public or private sector has to face those challenges in not only Britain but other countries.

Mr. Barron: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I wish to make one more point. The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) mentioned Germany in his closing remarks. The German coal industry has been held out as something of a model by Opposition Members. It has recently announced a likely 30,000 job losses in the years ahead, on top of the 26,000 or so redundancies made during the past three years. The restructuring that we are seeing is mirrored on the continent.

Mr. Barron: The Minister mentioned volumes. Will he or the Secretary of State reject the volumes mentioned in the Rothschild report—25 million tonnes deep-mined and 15 million tonnes opencast?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: As the hon. Gentleman has referred to the Rothschild report, let me make it crystal clear that we have appointed advisers, including Rothschilds, to analyse options for privatisation of the industry. As part of that, it considered a range of possible developments in the energy sector. No decisions on the timing or form of privatisation will be taken until after the general election. Those decisions will be taken by the Government, not advisers. Rothschilds and the other advisers have absolutely no role in decisions on the future of individual collieries.

It is perhaps characteristic of the hon. Members for Rother Valley and for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) that they take the most pessimistic scenario and present it as fact. We are determined to ensure the development of the largest possible economic coal industry that the market can support. We are confident that when the new contracts are negotiated the industry will respond to keep the lion's share of that market throughout the 1990s and beyond. Productivity improvements over the past five years, admittedly from a very low base, have been highly impressive. Moreover, the industry is beginning to lose the industrial image that it once had of a strike-torn and unreliable supplier. I am confident that that, too, will help in the years ahead.

Mr. Benn rose——

Mr. Hardy rose——

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Both the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Gentleman made speeches. I ask them to forgive me for not taking interventions.

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): Will the Minister give way? I have not spoken in the debate.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Yes.

Mr. Ashton: The Government have encouraged the Union of Democratic Mineworkers to consider buying into any sort of privatised industry. If the Government are re-elected—God forbid—is it not a fact that privatisation would come in 1992 and that in 1993 contracts for the supply of coal to the power stations would be awarded? With massive imports, the Union of Democratic Mineworkers would not be able to match the price of that coal and would have to advise its members to take wage cuts to meet the contracts. Is not that the reality?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Absolutely not. We believe that the best chance of keeping out imports is to improve the efficiency and productivity of the industry. We believe also that that will be best done in the private sector. That is why in due course we shall be making proposals to do just that.

I recognise that there will not be an easy transition. That is why we are introducing the Bill and why clause 1 extends the overall limit on the payment of restructuring grant by a further £1·5 billion. I remind the House that since 1979 the Government have approved over £7·5 billion of new investment and have provided for grant aid of about £17 billion to the industry. That has been provided by the Government—by the taxpayer—and is a measure of the Government's commitment to the industry. We are continuing to invest in it at a rate of over £1 million for every working day.

Restructuring grant represents a specific commitment by the Government to the work force. The money supports British Coal's costs of redundancy, transfers between collieries, retraining for jobs outside the industry and the excellent work of British Coal Enterprise. The money helps BCE to carry out a range of initiatives, including the provision of soft loans for new businesses, managed workshops for new businesses, low-cost premises for expanding businesses, training for ex-mineworkers and job shops. I listened carefully to my hon. Friends, and especially my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart), when they set out their ideas for extending and expanding the work that I have described in the affected areas. We shall consider their proposals carefully.

Restructuring grant has been paid by the Government since 1987. It has been raised in progressive stages to the present limit of £1,500 million. The grant provides support for 90 per cent. of the costs of the corporation when it pays redundancy sums to mineworkers. It allows the corporation to pay its mineworkers lump sums of up to £37,000 on leaving the industry, which is generous by any standards. That is why Labour should be supporting the Bill instead of criticising it. If we are to continue the high levels of payment to those affected by restructuring, the Bill is essential. If we are to continue the retraining and employment schemes, we need the Bill.

The Labour party should know about the cost of restructuring because it did so itself when in government. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, between 1964 and 1970 it was a Labour Government who shut nearly 280 collieries. As a result, 170,000 men lost their jobs in the mining industry during those years. In that period, however, there were not the generous redundancy terms or the restructuring payments that are now available.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Minister accept that the flaw in his argument is that no figure is projected for the next financial year which will take the amount needed over the present limits agreed under the 1987 legislation? We do not need to increase the limits for at least another 18 months.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We do not yet know the precise figures required—that is up to British Coal. It controls individual collieries and it will decide the sums required. It is a restructuring grant paid to British Coal, to fund up to 90 per cent. of the sums that may be required when British Coal shuts collieries as part of its restructuring exercise.

Mr. Allen McKay: In the finances that are being made available, is there anything to continue the concessionary fuel arrangements? If privatisation occurs, will the Government guarantee everything that currently exists, will that be left to the private owners, or will the miners be sold down the river?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am happy to give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that entitlement to concessionary coal will be preserved. I am happy to put that on the record once again.

If Labour Members oppose the Bill, they and the miners will know that the redundancy terms on offer—which are generous by any standards—the transfer payments available for those wishing to move to other pits, the retraining help, and the managed workshops are all being provided by a Conservative Government, despite opposition from the Labour party. They know that all that would be put at risk if there were the prospect of a Labour Government. Frankly, it is not an adequate response for Labour Members to pretend that they can somehow keep the market for coal at its present level.

The hon. Member for Rother Valley referred to a national plan for energy. He did not tell us what was in that plan, other than mentioning something called a reference price. He did not tell us what the reference was. He avoided any of the hard decisions that would have to be made if he wanted to stabilise the industry at about its current size, as promised by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras. The hard decisions——

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I shall not give way as I am responding specifically to the hon. Gentleman's speech.

Will the Labour party shut down the new gas-fired generating stations, break those contracts and lay off the men? Will it restrict the use of the electricity interconnectors to France and Scotland? Will it ignore the European single market and GATT by restricting coal imports? If so, that is hardly in line with Labour's new-found enthusiasm for the European single market and free trade. Without facing at least some of those hard choices, Labour's promises remain, quite simply, empty phrases.

We have heard from Opposition Members a wholly misleading account of clause 2. The 1908 Act is an obsolete restriction that is not appropriate for modern mining methods. It has been overtaken by local practices and informal agreements—and that has been the case since mechanisation of the industry began in the 1950s. If it is true, as alleged by Labour Members, that the 1908 Act is so essential for safety today, why did not the previous Labour Government enforce it? I wish that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) had dealt with that point in his speech, because he was the Energy Minister when the letter of the Act was being breached. He did nothing about it then, so how can the Opposition claim that the Act is pivotal to safety in today's mines?

Repeal of the 1908 Act will not jeopardise safety—we would not let that happen. The coal industry has a good safety record and it has a strong safety culture reflecting the accumulated wisdom of the management, the work force and the mines inspectorate. The Act plays no part in the safety regime. Therefore, we intend to repeal the Act when alternative regulations governing working times are in place. That does not affect our commitment to safety and it has nothing to do with privatisation. For Opposition Members to suggest otherwise shows that they have either not understood the Bill or are trying to bolster a weak case with irrelevant scares.

Hon. Members from both sides of the House have commented on the environment.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At 10 o'clock when the Division bell goes, the House will have been sitting for seven and a half hours, from prayers through questions, statements and this debate. Is not that a long enough period for miners to be working down the pit? Some of us will believe that we have done a good job during that period.

Mr. Speaker: That has nothing to do with me.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friends have made the good point that the Labour party is posing as the party of carbon dioxide reductions while at the same time it wants to force electricity generators to burn more coal, phase out the nuclear industry and, in its phrase, to "deter" the generators from using gas for power generation. That is a neat package for increasing the output of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere.

But when talking to a different audience at a different time, the Labour party poses as the green party, committing itself to the tough and demanding target of cutting carbon dioxide emissions to 1990 levels by the year 2000. That is a glaring and continuing contradiction between its energy and environmental policies, and it cannot disguise the fact.

However, I shall at least admit that that contradiction does not exist on the Liberal Democrat Bench. I have been examining the Liberal Democrats' environmental document called, "Costing the Earth". They want—I suppose that there is some merit in honesty—an immediate energy tax with the highest rate on coal specifically designed to switch fuel use away from coal. Their energy tax is targeted at coal reduction.

I then looked at the section of the report headed "Economic Impact" where there was nothing at all about the damage to the coal industry. It was not even mentioned. That is how it dismisses the coal industry. There may be some honesty there, but please do not let us hear from the Liberal Democrats that, if they vote against the Bill this evening, they have anything constructive to offer either existing coal miners or those displaced by restructuring.

This evening we have seen the old familiar Labour party of intervention, protectionism and high prices. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) for reminding us of that in the last speech from the Opposition Back Benches. What we do not know is how it squares those beliefs with its later beliefs in market forces, the EC and industrial efficiency. I shall leave that to be worked out by the political analysts.

I am concerned about the practical effect of the Labour party's opposition to the Bill, which would be to hamper or prevent the necessary restructuring of the coal industry which we all know to be necessary. The Bill will allow British Coal continued and necessary access to restructuring grant. Without that, British Coal will be unable to continue the present level of redundancy pay or the redeployment, retraining or job placement schemes that it supports.

The Bill also empowers the Secretary of State to repeal an obsolete and out-of-date Act of Parliament from 1908 which threatens the industry's productivity and the earnings of its work force. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

Bill read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Have you had any intimation from the Government that they might wish to make a statement on what has been said this evening on the wire: that Mr. Marlin Fitzwater, on behalf of the American President, is to consult the British Prime Minister about a response to what has happened in relation to the Libyan findings and that apparently he does not rule out a military response? Some of us, especially those who have recently been to Libya, think that war solves nothing. We are conscious that 5,500 of our fellow countrymen work in Libya and we wonder whether we can have a statement before any rash action is taken. We should at least wait until a trial takes place.

Mr. Speaker: Having not seen the tape this evening, I am not aware of this matter. I am sure that what has been said will have been heard by those on the Government Front Bench.

COAL INDUSTRY BILL [Money]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Coal Industry Bill, it is expedient to authorise any increase in the sums payable out of money provided by Parliament which is attributable to—

(a) increasing to £2,500 million, with power to increase by order to £3,000 million, the limit imposed on the aggregate amount of grants made under section 3 of the Coal Industry Act 1987, or

(b) enabling such grants to be made in respect of costs falling to be charged to accounts in respect of financial years ending after March 1993 but not later than March 1996.—[Mr. Wood.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

Public Health

That the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) (Paralytic Shellfish Poisoning) (No. 12) Order 1991 (S.I., 1991, No. 2077), dated 13th September 1991, a copy of which was laid before this House on 16th September, in the last Session of Parliament, be approved.—[Mr. Wood.]

PETITION

Tobacco Advertising

10.15 pm

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on behalf of Yorkshire Action on Smoking and Health. It calls upon the Government to sign the EEC directive to ban tobacco advertising. There is clear evidence of a relationship between tobacco advertising and the likelihood of children starting to smoke.

To lie upon the Table.

Brewing Industry

10.16 pm

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Wood.]

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): I declare an interest in this matter, as I am the parliamentary adviser to the National Licensed Victuallers Association. I am pleased to have an opportunity to draw the House's attention once again to the upheaval that has taken place in the brewing industry and the licensed trade since the beer orders of December 1989.

There can hardly ever have been a piece of legislation that has so utterly failed to achieve its stated objectives. We were told that the orders were introduced with the intention of increasing competition, thus providing more choice for customers and holding down prices. In fact, competition has been reduced, prices have rocketed, thousands of public house tenants have been forced out of the trade and thousands more have felt that they have no reasonable option other than to accept the terms being imposed upon them by the brewers and accept long leases at enormously increased rents, with full responsibility for repairs. The brewers have decided to destroy the traditional tenancy system. It is on its way out.

It must be understood that the brewers' actions have not been forced upon them by the legislation. The beer orders did not require them to do anything of this sort. In that connection, I should like to quote from a letter that the Secretary of State wrote to the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) who was concerned—rightly so—about a letter that a tenant in his constituency had received from Grand Metropolitan Estates. The Secretary of State wrote:

"I can assure you that the action the company has taken has not been forced on it by any of the measures the Government has introduced following the MMC's report on the brewing industry."

The Secretary of State went on to say that he was concerned that the letter from Grand Metropolitan Estates tried to imply that the orders had forced the company into the action it was taking against the tenant. The Secretary of State was right. The orders did not require such action to be taken. I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Selby for allowing me to quote from the letter.

In discussions with me, representatives of all the major brewing companies have admitted that the orders did not force them to take those actions against the tenants. I have been told that the companies were merely prompted by the orders to "review" their commercial strategy. Whitbread and Bass have both used that expression. What they mean by "reviewing" their commercial strategy is that, because they will have to dispose of 11,000 tied houses, they are determined to squeeze every penny they can out of those that remain. The way in which they do that is to abolish the old tenancies and to introduce long leases under which full repairing responsibility is placed on the tenants. On top of that, they introduce massive rent increases.

In your constituency, Mr. Speaker, the case of Mr. David Harper of the Clifton Arms is typical. I have spoken to your constituent and he is happy that I should cite his case, because it demonstrates the way in which things are happening. In Mr. Harper's case, less than two years ago, his rent was doubled from £12,000 to £24,000. The amount was then increased by another £2,000 because it was related to the retail prices index—I do not know why. Now his landlord, the Allied Brewery group, has invited him to accept a 10-year lease at a starting price of £36,000 a year. Before he can even accept the lease, he is required to put the place into good repair, which may cost him another £30,000. Such things are happening all over the country.

Many public houses have been grossly neglected for years by their owners, yet the owners now demand that the tenants pay all the cost of putting the public houses into good order. In some cases, the costs are enormous. I know of at least one case in which the cost is likely to be £80,000, which is a measure of the neglect by the brewers of their own properties.

I have details here of scores of cases, but as I cannot take up the time of the House in referring to all of them, I will pick one or two examples. There is a Whitbread house, the Kings Arms, in Temple Sowerby near Penrith. The present rent is just under £12,000, but the proposed rent is £22,000. The capital cost of the repairs which the tenant must pay before he can even have the lease is £10,000. There is a Whitbread house, the Seven Stars, in the Wirral. The present rent is just under £15,000, but the rent now being demanded is £35,000.

There is the Black Bull at Birstall in West Yorkshire, which I know. It is a nice, small public house for which the rent is £16,120. The owners now want £30,000. It is impossible for the business at that pub to be increased to such an extent, because it is a very small house. There is a John Smith house called The George at Stanningley near Leeds. John Smith is now part of Courage, although Courage is now called Fosters. The present rent there is just under £14,000, but the proposed rent is £33,000.

One of the worst cases is that of the Broadway hotel at Dunscroft in Doncaster. It is again a Courage house, for which the present rent is £18,000. The company now seeks a rent of £42,000. That is happening all over the country and the tenants will be required to accept all the costs of repairs.

Earlier this year, the Secretary of State met the representatives of all the major brewery companies, having received a deputation from the National Licensed Victuallers Association. To his great credit, he persuaded the brewery companies to accept the principle of independent arbitration. I thought that we were making progress. Unfortunately, matters are not quite as simple as some of us thought they were. Bass, for example, requires a tenant to put down a deposit of £1,000 before he can even contemplate arbitration. In many cases, the arbitrator may be appointed only from a list of people approved by the brewer. Many of them usually earn their living by carrying out valuations on behalf of brewery companies. The most astonishing thing—indeed, it is almost unbelievable—is that tenants are required to sign a lease before the rent has been fixed. What type of arrangement is that? In normal commercial life, no one would dream of doing such a thing. It is not surprising that, in those circumstances, very few tenants are invoking the arbitration procedures.

I asked Grand Met how it justified the rent increases being imposed. As many hon. Members know, Grand Met is no longer a brewer, as it has transferred all its breweries to Courage, or Fosters, as it is now called. Grand Met is essentially a pub-owning company, apart from its other interests. When I asked Grand Met how it could justify the high rent increases, I was told that tenants could easily afford them because tenants would now receive all the proceeds from the amusement machines instead of sharing them with the brewers, although they still have to pay a high licence fee and rent.

I was told that the tenants would also make more profit from guest beers. How are they to do that? Grand Met said that tenants could negotiate a discount of £30 or £40 a barrel. I said that, as brewers never sell beer at a loss, why did not the brewers knock £30 or £40 off the price of a barrel to the tenants of their tied houses in the first place? I did not receive an answer, but the sum involved would have been about 10p a pint, which could be taken off the retail price and still leave brewers with a profit.

I also asked Grand Met what percentage of its tenants had left the trade completely since the beer orders were introduced less than two years ago. The answer was 40 per cent. My inquiries suggest that roughly the same figure applies to all major companies in this country. That is appalling. The tenants gain great skill and experience over the years in serving the public and in running their public houses. They have disappeared from the scene, but I am sure that that is not what the Government intended.

Meanwhile, the concentration of ownership has continued apace. When the MMC's report was published, the four biggest brewery companies had 58 per cent. of the market. They now have 70 per cent. of the market, and the proposed merger between Allied and Carlsberg will push that figure even higher.

The latest scheme devised by Bass to circumvent the beer orders—the intention, not the letter, of the orders—is to sell 372 public houses to a company called Enterprise Inns, which has immediately signed a contract with Bass to supply Bass beers to all those public houses. Nothing has changed—they are as tied as before, but they are now excluded from the beer orders, so that they have no guest beers.

I am repeatedly told that all the fuss is being caused by a vociferous minority of licensees. No one can persuade me that the 3,000 licensees who went to Blackpool to take part in a protest march during the week of the Conservative conference are all mindless militants. They are ordinary, decent licensees who want to continue to do their job of serving the public. They see their livelihoods put at risk and the traditional tenancy system disappearing. That is what concerns them.

Despite what I have said, I am not especially critical of the brewers. They operate in a hard commercial environment. They are looking after their commercial interests, but unfortunately they are doing so at the expense of the tenants and customers, the very people who are supposed to benefit from the legislation. That is the paradox that the Government will not acknowledge and that is why I must criticise them. I do not criticise them for getting it wrong in the first place. Anyone can make a mistake. I criticise them for refusing to accept that they made a mistake and for refusing to take any action to put matters right, when it was patently obvious that everything was going disastrously wrong.

In another measure, the Government extended the Landlord and Tenant Act protection to the licensed trade but they would not bring it in immediately—it had to be implemented some time in the future. Protection that does not come into effect until half the people whom it is supposed to protect have already disappeared from the scene is hollow protection indeed.

Many hon. Members believe that the Secretary of State should immediately instruct the Director General of Fair Trading to review the position urgently and in detail, so that we can discover whether there is still some possibility of saving something from this awful mess. He should not wait until 1993, which is the present proposal. By then, all the damge will have been done.

I am reminded of the famous poem, by Robert Southey, about the battle of Blenheim, when little Peterkin asks:

"But what good came of it at last?"

Old Kaspar replies:

"'Why that I cannot tell,' said he,
'But' twas a famous victory.'"

Almost two years after the beer orders went through the House, we are entitled to ask the Minister what good came of them at last. The Government certainly cannot claim that it was a famous victory. The customers are definitely no better off. Tenants have suffered great distress; many thousands of them have been forced out of their homes and businesses. The brewers, who spent millions of pounds campaigning against this legislation, have shot it to pieces.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I had applied for an Adjournment debate on this subject, but I realised that the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) had a prior right, representing as he does the NLVA.

I have today won a concession from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, in as much as he is going to give a delegation from the Southampton and district licensed victuallers an opportunity to see him at the Department to talk over some of these matters. Worthy servants of the brewers are being turned out of their livelihoods and homes by these draconian rents, set in the main by estate agents who have no concept of the harm that will be done to these people.

I thank the Secretary of State for this concession, and I am sure that, with good will on the part of the Government, we can arrive at a successful outcome.

10.32 pm

The Minister for Corporate Affairs (Mr. John Redwood): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) for raising this important subject. He has tirelessly put the views of the National Licensed Victuallers Association to the Government during the course of these discussions and changes.

The hon. Gentleman suggests that the orders have failed, but the main order, to break the tie, is not yet in effect, so it is premature to say that the proposal has failed to introduce competition. We must wait and see what its impact is before making that judgment.

To review the position before this judgment can be made would be far from helpful. It would create a great deal of additional uncertainty for tenants, customers and all in the brewing industry. Perhaps, on reflection, the hon. Gentleman will agree that that could make matters worse. It would certainly encourage the brewers to look again at their commercial strategy. The hon. Gentleman was critical of the way they had done that as a result of the orders while the review was under way. It would be wrong to encourage such a move before it is possible to form a view on how the orders have worked out in practice.

I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman pointed out that the closure of pubs, which was a common feature of the industry before the orders were thought of, has nothing to do with the Government's policy or the MMC inquiry.

If a pub is closed, that is a commercial judgment by the publican and the brewer depending on the relationship between them. It is usually by the brewer. That commercial judgment is made on the basis of the pub and its location. Hundreds of pubs closed before the orders and, unfortunately, some pubs are closing now. Closing a pub does not help a brewer to comply with the important brewing order; it is essential that the House understands that, as many hon. Members have problems involving pubs, and they need to answer that point, which shows that the brewing order is not the cause of the pub closure.

The hon. Member for Rotherham made some interesting points about independent arbitration. The Secretary of State and I have worked hard in discussions with the brewers to get improvements in the way in which they treat their tenants. One of the important points was to get the offer of independent arbitration where all else has failed. I will certainly consider the points that the hon. Gentleman made when I read Hansard and consider the ways in which it may be possible to dilute or circumvent the effect of independent arbitration in the way that the hon. Gentleman suggested.

The Government are committed to pursuing a vigorous competition policy in the brewing industry and elsewhere. We will continue to look closely at mergers in the brewing industry which fall for consideration under the fair trading legislation. Although the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report did not think that concentration in brewing was a problem, the authorities do not wish to see undue erosion of competition in brewing, and that will obviously inform our assessments and judgments in future transactions.

There has been little change in the combined market share of the six national brewers owning more than 2,000 pubs since February 1989. The increase in concentration of the big four, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, is entirely due to the Grant Met-Courage pubs-for-breweries deal. Those transactions were considered fully by the MMC. The number of pubs freed from ties as a result of the undertakings required by the Secretary of State will be much greater than would have been required under the orders. It was the tie which the MMC thought created all the problems. That explains the judgment in that case.

I do not accept that recent acquisitions of regional brewers and closures of breweries are the result of the beer orders. Regional brewers are not affected directly by them. The industry has long been characterised by mergers between brewers, closures of breweries and sales of public houses. The decisions of regional brewers such as Boddingtons and Greenalls to cease brewing were commercial ones taken by the managements of those companies and they were not forced on them by any of the Government's measures.

An important way of encouraging vigorous competition in the brewing industry is to give regional brewers the chance to expand. The beer orders do just that. Regional brewers have opportunities to acquire further premises from the national brewers, and they can sell their beers to a greater number of "free outlets" after November 1992. Regional brewers such as Morlands, Greene King and Wolverhampton and Dudley have already seized the opportunity to expand their estates.

The guest beer provision also provides opportunities. The Publican on 17 June reported:

"the guest ale tidal wave is swelling, as many national tenants prepare to take a non-brewery tied beer".

The Morning Advertiser of 24 September reported on an in-depth survey that it had carried out into the effects of the guest beer provision. This found that some 40 per cent. of the tenanted pubs of the national brewers were now offering guest beers. That figure could well increase significantly. The survey found that Wadworths, Youngs, Fullers, Marstons and Adnams among the regionals had all done particularly well from the provision, accounting together for nearly 30 per cent. of the guest beer market.

Several new micro-brewers have sprung up. The Morning Advertiser of 30 October reported the story of Jim Botur, who spent his redundancy money from Matthew Brown on starting his own independent brewery. He said:

"We have received a lot of support from both free trade customers and tenants who are now able to stock a guest beer in their pubs. We were confident that the new Beer Orders would give us the opportunity we needed."

The hon. Gentleman referred to recent increases in the price of beer which, I agree, have been large. As the brewers do not have to comply with the main measure of the orders until 1 November 1992, it is too soon to judge what impact the orders will have on prices. I notice that the steepest price rises in past years have been in pubs tied to the national brewers. The beer orders target precisely those brewers, by ordering a reduction in their tied estates by 11,000 outlets. Customers will have more choice of outlet and beer. They can shop around if some prices rise too far. We have asked the Director General of Fair Trading to review the orders in late 1993, when their effectiveness can be properly assessed.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): Apart from what the customer may or may not find with the price of beer, is it not the case that what the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) has described would not have taken place if the beer orders had not been passed by the House?

Mr. Redwood: I am not sure whether that is true. We can never be sure, because those events took place. However, there were changes under way in the brewing industry before the beer orders were drafted and put to the House. We saw leading brewers thinking about segregating property from brewing, and we saw one major brewer thinking about introducing new styles of lease, which is the main burden of the hon. Gentleman's criticisms. One can argue that there were changes under way in the brewing industry before the beer orders came along. I am not sure whether all those changes are the result of the beer orders or the threat of the beer orders.

I and the Secretary of State are worried about the notices to quit that some brewers have issued to many of their tenants. The major brewers do not have to evict tenants to comply with the requirement that they release pubs from ties by 1 November 1992. Closure of a pub does not help them to comply with the orders in any way. Most of the notices have been issued to allow the brewers to renegotiate existing agreements; few will result in eviction.

The Secretary of State and I have urged the brewers concerned to keep the number of notices sent out to an absolute minimum, and to make their purpose clear to tenants. The timing of notices was determined by the fact that all tenants will be protected by the Landlord and Tenant (Licensed Premises) Act 1990 by July 1992 as a result of the legislation that we enacted last year at the tenants' request. I remember seeing a delegation from the tenants at that time. The Government moved swiftly to meet their requirement to introduce the landlord and tenant legislation.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does my hon. Friend agree that, in certain cases, it has been extremely difficult for some smaller pubs to be able to pay the amount of money that some of the brewers have been asking them to pay?

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): It is impossible.

Mr. Cash: It is a simple point, but it has caused certain distress.

Mr. Redwood: I know that tenants are worried by the extent of the price rises for their rents that the brewers are suggesting.

Mr. Winterton: Are you?

Mr. Redwood: But that will be determined by the marketplace. There will be independent review in cases where agreement cannot be reached. Of course I would like tenants to have realistic rent demands and then have successful businesses on the back of them, and I hope that the rent demands will turn out to be realistic in relation to the actual security of tenure offered under the new style of lease and in relation to the business opportunities offered under that style of lease as well. The hon. Gentleman fairly pointed out that there is a larger range of business opportunities available under the new leases, and that, of course, will be reflected in the rent charged under those lease arrangements.

The longer-term leases which many brewers are insisting should replace existing tenancy agreements represent a different kind of lease with a different rental price on them. Over the summer, the Secretary of State and I met to encourage them to adopt best practices in dealings with their tenants. At our prompting, all the major brewers have now agreed to allow independent arbitration or assessment of rent in difficult cases where agreement cannot be reached. They have accepted the need to be flexible towards tenants who would have real difficulties in taking on a long-term lease, treating those nearing retirement with special consideration. That flexibility might involve the offer of a short-term agreement or a long-term lease with an appropriate break clause. The brewers have also agreed to consider offering compensation to such tenants in exceptional circumstances on a case-by-case basis.

The Secretary of State, in the letter he sent to all hon. Members, said that it would be unrealistic to expect the removal of all differences between brewers and their tenants. We have been encouraged to hear from the president of the National Licensed Victuallers Association that he has seen some softening in the brewers' approach since our meetings with them. I understand the NLVA's continuing fears, but I am glad that its most recent letter to the Secretary of State began by saying:

"the reaction of the national brewers to the recent series of meetings held with yourself and John Redwood MP would initially seem to be both positive and encouraging".

I shall, of course, continue to watch the situation closely and will read all the comments that have been made tonight, including those made from sedentary positions in support of the hon. Member for Rotherham. I shall also do all that I can to ensure that brewers behave responsibly towards their tenants. However, I am convinced that a further review of the industry at this stage would only create additional uncertainty, which would not be in the interests of the industry, the tenants or the customers.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

Citizens Charter

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

9.36 am

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Francis Maude): I am glad to have the opportunity to debate in the House today the White Paper which we published in July this year entitled "The Citizen's Charter". The citizens charter is simply the most comprehensive programme ever launched by any Government anywhere to improve public services. It will cover all the public services, including Government Departments and agencies, local authorities, hospitals, schools, courts, railways, buses the Post Office and the utilities, such as gas, electricity, water and telecommunications. No part of the public service will remain untouched and the citizens charter will improve the life of every citizen in the land.

For too long, it has seemed to us, involving the citizen in how public services should be provided has been seen as an optional extra. It is important that we should question that. All public services are paid for by individual citizens, either directly or through their taxes. In return, citizens are entitled to expect high-quality services which are responsive to their needs and provided efficiently at reasonable cost. Certain essential services such as health and education should be available from the public sector irrespective of the citizen's means.

The citizens charter is all about achieving what I have described. It starts by recognising that the best way to improve standards of services is to increase competition. In a free market, where the consumer has choice, competing firms must strive to satisfy their customers or they will not prosper. Where there is limited choice or competition, as in many public services, individual citizens cannot as easily make their voices heard or their views count. Often, they simply cannot make the ultimate consumer's choice, which is to vote with their cash and their feet and go to someone else for the service.

Wherever possible, we need to increase choice and competition. Where that is not possible, we need to develop other ways of ensuring good standards of service —for example, through regulatory bodies which have real powers and responsibilities. As promised in the citizens charter, we shall shortly publish a White Paper which encourages and makes possible a much more open attitude to the buying of services in the public sector.

The citizens charter sets out principles that will govern the way in which every public sector organisation treats those who use their services. It builds on what is best in the public service. The first principle is standards. Each organisation will have to publish explicit standards on what it will offer to its customers. Standards should not be hidden away for internal use only, but should be clearly displayed at the point of service delivery. They should include a commitment to prompt and effective action. That will be expressed perhaps in terms of target response, waiting time and accuracy in carrying out the service, and always in terms of courtesy and helpfulness from staff. The standards should improve as the service becomes more efficient. Every year, we expect public service standards to be ratcheted up.

Another important principle of the charter is openness. There should be no secrecy about how the service is delivered, how much it costs, who delivers it and whether it is meeting the standards set for it. The days of faceless, nameless bureaucracy are gone. That is welcomed by those who work in the public service as much as by those who use it. Unless there is a real threat to personal safety, all those who deal directly with the public should wear a name badge and give their name on the telephone and in letters. Even now, visitors crossing the hallowed threshold of the Treasury are met by an individual wearing a name badge.

Information is another vital principle to enable the citizen to influence the provision of services. Again, the citizens charter builds on past achievements. For example, the days of dull, impenetrable forms that seemed designed to obscure rather than to convey information are passing. Much excellent work has been done, and the work of Government Departments and agencies has resulted in 29 awards from the Plain English campaign. This is not just about forms; it is about telling people about all the available services, explaining properly how to use them and what to do when things go wrong. It is about making services easy for people to use and telling people what to expect.

Not only should targets be published: more importantly, the results achieved against those targets should be published. They, too, should be made more straightforward for people to understand and should be provided in a comparable form. In that way, people can see how effective the organisation is against other providers or against a regional or national average. That creates strong pressure to emulate the best and so will lead to improved quality and efficiency. Quality and efficiency go firmly hand in hand. The Education (Schools) Bill, which was published last week, aims to do precisely that. In future, schools will publish more information in a comparable format, so that parents can see easily whether their child's school is up with the best.

Choice should not be just a private sector option. Wherever possible, the public sector should provide a choice of services. That choice should not be limited to "the way we have always done it" or by the organisation's view of what it should be delivering. Decisions should take account of the views of customers. Their views should be sought regularly and systematically to inform decisions about what services should be provided.

British people are sensible. They know that they cannot have everything and that on occasions they may have to wait. They will consider paying a bit more for a premium service. What they do not like is being let down. If a public sector organisation says that it will do something at a certain time, the customer wants that to happen. We should ask the people what they want and trust them to answer sensibly. I intend to commission a survey soon to find out more about what the public want from the citizens charter and what their expectations and priorities are in taking forward this work.

[Mr. Francis Maude]

Access is another important principle of the citizens charter. Services should be run to suit the convenience of customers, not of staff. Services should be easy to find and to use. That means flexible opening hours to suit local users, telephones that are answered promptly, inquiry points that are helpful, informative and efficient in directing the caller to the person best placed to help him or her, and signposts to help the citizen locate whatever he or she wants.

Inevitably, there will be times when things do not go right. When that happens, it is not a question of simply saying that money should be poured into the organisation as a remedy. One of our primary responsibilities as a Government is to the taxpayer, and we will not neglect that responsibility. When things go wrong, the citizen wants to be told fully, honestly and, preferably, there and then why it has gone wrong.

For example, most people will not mind waiting a few extra minutes in a hospital waiting room if they know that the doctor has been called away to deal with an emergency. They will not put up with simply being left without being told the reason for being apparently let down. When things go wrong, people want an apology properly expressed, and they should be entitled to one. There should be a well-publicised and readily available complaints procedure. Lessons should be learned from complaints, so that mistakes are not repeated.

People want to have the sense, when things go wrong and they complain legitimately, that the system about which they are complaining is taking some notice of what they are saying. No one wants to see money diverted from service improvement to the detriment of the existing service, but where compensation can be made to increase rather than detract from efficiency, compensating procedures should be set out.

I make no apology for setting out in such detail the charter's principles. They are important, and together they form the charter standard. How are the public to know who has adopted those principles and is improving services as a result? Organisations that can prove that they are living up to the charter standard and are providing high-quality services that put the customer first will become eligible for the Charter Mark award. This voluntary scheme will be an acknowledged and easily recognisable sign of quality. It will provide an incentive to staff and management alike to bring about a progressive improvement in the delivery and quality of their services and to provide value for money through progressive improvements in service.

Every public sector organisation that serves the public directly will be able to apply for the Charter Mark. So, too, will privatised utilities, such as the water companies or similar regulator regimes. The award will be within every organisation's reach, but not necessarily within immediate grasp. It will not be a soft or easy option. I look forward to announcing the details of the scheme before long.

The implementation of the charter is an ambitious task. It is a programme which has set a lead. No programme so ambitious or comprehensive has ever been attempted anywhere in the world. Great interest in the charter has been shown in Europe, north America, Australia and elsewhere. We are determined to implement it successfully. I pay tribute to Sir James Blythe and his fellow members of the advisory panel for their energetic and imaginative work in driving the programme forward.

The real results are the improvements that take place on the ground locally. It is in the local tax office, the local hospital and the local school that the citizen will look for improvements and judge whether the charter is a reality.

Much has already happened. The next steps programme has played an important part. In the case of the Benefits Agency, for example, more telephone calls than previously have been handled in five languages with specialist help lines, and waiting times have been reduced by half. The Employment Service achieved more than 95 per cent. accuracy in its benefits payments in 1990-91. It is integrating its local office network with benefit offices, to offer users a one-stop shop. For example, at the Driving Standards Agency, waiting times for driving tests have been reduced.

Another example of what has started to happen and will happen under the citizens charter programme is that, in the national health service, there will be fixed-time appointments for patients from April next. No patient should have to wait more than 30 minutes. We want to say a final goodbye to the old arrangement whereby 50 patients were called for appointments at 9 o'clock in the morning but many of them were not seen until well into the afternoon. That is no way to treat people. The patients charter will put an end to it.

There will also be guaranteed waiting times for NHS treatment. Each district health authority will set maximum waiting times for each specialty, and none of the maximum times can be more than two years. Once again, waiting times should come down and people should know they can expect, what standard the local provider of that service has undertaken to deliver.

All parents will receive school reports on their child's progress at least once a year. In the utilities, to take two examples, East Midlands Electricity has introduced fixed-time appointments for customers, and SEEBoard has introduced a new, simple, flat-rate compensation system for its customers.

We have also taken steps to introduce legislation, where needed, to take forward work on the charter. The Competition and Service (Utilities) Bill, published last week, will give customers a better deal by giving tougher powers to the regulators—allowing them, for example, to set guaranteed service standards for individual customers, such as fixed appointment times—no more waiting for the gas man.

The regulators will also be able to ensure that compensation is paid where those service standards are not met, that each utility has satisfactory procedures for handling customer complaints and that those procedures are published. As the utilities operate in the private sector, they are already going fast down that track of improving customer services. We want that to continue.

The Local Government Bill, published on 4 November, will require local authorities to publish information showing what standard of service they are providing and at what cost. The Audit Commission and its Scottish equivalent will have powers to report on the performance of local authorities both individually and collectively, to which all local authorities would have to respond publicly.

The Education (Schools) Bill sets up a framework to implement the main proposals of the parents charter, published in September. It will ensure regular and independent inspection of schools, and that the inspection report is made available to parents. It will empower the Secretary of State to collect and publish information about schools. That will be published annually by region and will include public examination and national curriculum test results, truancy rates and the first destinations of school leavers. That is all vital information that parents are entitled to have. Under the legislation, in future they will have it.

I shall shortly publish a White Paper entitled, "Competing for Quality" which sets out the Government's commitment to improving public services by expanding choice and competition. That is a key element of the citizens charter programme. It sets out how, in setting targets and freeing managers to buy services in open competition, public services can respond better and more efficiently to the wishes of their users. Buying services in open competition is good news for the taxpayers, who will get better value for money, and for managers and their staff, who can work together to achieve the best deal for customers. Last, but by no means least, it is good news for local businesses, giving private firms new opportunities to market their services in free and open competition.

Other legislation will be needed, too, to take forward the proposals outlined in the charter White Paper. When we are returned to government, we shall introduce legislation to give the citizen a right to challenge unlawful industrial action affecting public services, and legislation to privatise the railways and to deregulate London buses. We also plan to limit the Post Office monopoly, to establish a new regulator for postal services, and to give the Secretary of State powers to set standards and targets for the Post Office. We plan to extend delegation in the civil service and to deal with the problems of technical redundancy.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Am I to read into what the Minister says that the Government intend to put more and more services out to arm's-length agencies which are not effectively accountable to Ministers, and certainly not accountable to Members of the House? Does he not think that the citizens of Britain would be better served if Ministers were more prepared to answer the questions asked by the House, rather than avoiding them by putting everything out to agencies?

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman betrays a woeful ignorance of how the process works. I am also interested to hear the devotion of the new-style modern Liberal Democrats to old-fashioned bureaucracy.

I commend to the House the programme of putting all the executive operational parts of the public service of central Government out to executive agencies under professional chief executives who are directly accountable to Ministers who are themselves directly accountable to the House. That will provide ever-better services to the public, because they are accountable and because they have the freedom to manage. I make no apology for that programme. I am sorry to hear once again that the Liberal Democrats seem to be devoted to the process of reaction and opposition to any progressive improvement or reform.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Do we not need a Members of Parliament charter, so that, when we send letters to benefit agencies, instead of their taking ages to answer, we will begin to get some response? It is said that the citizens charter allows more information to be generally available to individuals, but less and less information is available to Members who ask questions in the House, as areas are hived off to agencies and privatised, so that the service providers are no longer democratically accountable. Democratic socialism adds parliamentary accountability and parliamentary avenues.

Mr. Maude: Once again, I say that there will be no reduction in accountability. There is an improvement in transparency, and we are moving away from the old bureaucratic culture to which the Opposition, whether Labour or Liberal Democrat, seem devoted. We can achieve much greater accountability, efficiency and effectiveness and delivering real and good services to citizens by moving in the direction of open and accountable executive agencies than by saying that the man in Whitehall knows best, and that we shall have a nice pyramid of bureaucracy in which everyone is concerned about what happens inside the organisation, but fewer people are concerned with what happens when the service is delivered to the citizen.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (Wanstead and Woodford): One of the agencies that serves my constituency is the social security office at Wentworth house. I have to admit that, even before that office became an agency, it was extremely good, and answered my letters within seven days. Its benefit service was exceptional. Since becoming an agency it has got even better. Payments now go out within four days of a request being received. That means that the office deals with the paper work, the calculation, checking and the provision of a cheque within four days. That is staggering. The carping from Labour Members should be put down to sour grapes, because this is something that they did not think of for themselves.

Mr. Maude: My hon. Friend's experience of the improved service provided by the new agencies reflects similar, widespread experience. I make no apology for saying that the Government propose to press ahead full steam with the process of transferring services—the operational parts of central Government—to executive agencies.

It is not for me to speculate on the motivation behind the Opposition and Liberal Democrat resistance to this excellent process. Perhaps it is not so much sour grapes as simply the fact that they are stuck in the mud. They are devoted to adhering blindly to the old way of doing things. They suffer from a straightforward reluctance to look to the future to see what can be done to make things better.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): The comments from the two socialists are insulting to those who work in the new agencies. Those workers are already aware of the progress that has been made and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) has said, they know that a better service is being delivered. However, the Opposition parties want to try to turn the clock back to a system that did not work as well.

Mr. Maude: My hon. Friend is right. Those who have had dealings with the new agencies are aware that the managers and staff find it far more satisfactory to work for an agency whose sole purpose is to deliver high-quality service to the customer with as much efficiency as possible. Those who work in the public services are beginning to rediscover pride in what they do, and the Opposition should support that.

[Mr. Maude]

The programme of reform will last for a decade—it is not an overnight miracle. There are a number of things we need to do to drive it forward. We must ensure that pay throughout the public services becomes increasingly dependent upon performance and the delivery of service to the customer. Pay review bodies will take that into account when considering future pay claims. We want a much clearer link between rewards and performance. The process is already yielding results, and I believe that there are many more to come.

We have been pleased with the response that we have received from commentators and from those who work within, or use, the public services. We have had a sour, griping, sneering and mean response to our initiative from two quarters alone—the Labour party and the Liberal Democrats.

I can understand why the Labour party is so opposed to the initiative, because the citizens charter puts people first. They are put ahead of politicians, councillors, bureaucrats and the producers, and ahead of Labour's vested interests—ahead of Bickerstaffe's big battalions.

I have some questions for the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), and I hope that he will take the opportunity of this full day's debate to provide the House with the answers that it is eagerly awaiting.

Does the Labour party support our commitment to extend competition and to provide greater choice for the users of services, or does the Labour party want a Soviet system of no choice for the citizen? If the Labour party supports the idea of choice for the citizen, why has it opposed every reform to extend choice that the Government have initiated in the past 12 years?

Why did it oppose, root and branch, the right to buy for council tenants? Why did it oppose our school reforms that have given parents greater power to choose what they want for their children? Why did it oppose our NHS reforms to provide greater power for patients and greater choice? Why did the Labour party oppose our deregulation of the bus services, which has provided greater choice for the customer? Why did it oppose the introduction of competition into telecommunications?

Mr. Harry Barnes: That is all easy to answer. Give us the hard stuff.

Mr. Maude: The House is interested to know the answers. If the Labour party proposes to justify its opposition to those excellent reforms, let us hear which of them it proposes to reverse.

Mr. Barnes: The Minister appears to suggest that we have had 12 years of preparation for the citizens charter and that all the principles that have been propounded during that time will be capped by the charter. If so, the people will understand what that charter means—it is just the load of rubbish with which the Government have been involved in the past 12 years.

Mr. Maude: It is nice to hear a coherent argument, put with eloquence and elegent rhetoric. The House wants to know the answer. Does the Labour party support choice or not?

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Real choice.

Mr. Maude: That sounds like the voice of the old Soviet Union—go to the Gum store and have a choice of something or nothing. That is not what the Government propose to offer the people of this country.

We expect to hear the answers from the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. Does the Labour party support the extension of choice and competition in the public services? Will the Labour party support the Education (Schools) Bill that will provide more of the information that parents want so that they can exercise their choice in a more informed manner?

Will the Labour party support the Local Government Bill that will enable the Audit Commission to identify those authorities that provide good services at good cost and with efficiency? Will the Labour party support such transparency and openness, or will they oppose it out of the dogmatic fear that that will expose Labour councils to justified contempt?

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury) rose—

Mr. Maude: I shall finish the list of questions; then the hon. Gentleman can provide a portmanteau of answers to them all.

Will the Labour party support the waiting time guarantee scheme that we have introduced in the health service? The Opposition claim that that scheme is too little, too late, but if it is so easy to do, why on earth did the Labour Government not introduce that reform when they were in power? Do the Opposition understand that one cannot introduce a waiting time guarantee scheme without having first introduced the NHS reforms that we have put through? That scheme has provided evidence of how the NHS reforms have benefited patients in the way that patients want.

Will the Labour party support the introduction of a compensation scheme for passengers on British Rail? Do the Opposition join Jimmy Knapp in saying that that proposal is a con trick and a gimmick? Do they believe that British Rail frequently does not provide the service that people expect? Will they support the provision of compensation to those who are cheated by the system? Does the Labour party support the notion of performance-related pay, related, for example, to absenteeism and punctuality among those who work for British Rail and London Underground? Will the Labour party support that proposal or will it go along with what Jimmy Knapp lays down?

Will the Opposition support the introduction of an independent, lay element into the inspectorate of schools? Do they remain doggedly wedded to the idea of professionals cosily inspecting other professionals? Do they support our idea to introduce an independent element —a voice for the consumer—into the inspecting process? Will the Labour party support the introduction of league tables in the NHS to compare the performance of one health authority with that of another? Will it support such transparency and openness?

Mr. Chris Smith: Will the Minister give way, at last?

Mr. Maude: I shall do so if the hon. Gentleman will answer the questions.

Mr. Smith: I have risen twice to put an important point. The Financial Secretary keeps on talking about the importance of transparency and openness. How about transparency and openness in the workings of government? Why do the Government not support a freedom of information Act?

Mr. Maude: The citizens charter is all about transparency and openness. The thing that provides the greatest openness about the way in which central Government services are provided to the citizen is the next steps initiative, because that transfers the operational part of central Government to agencies.

I strongly support the principle of openness, and we shall pursue it vigorously. Does the hon. Gentleman propose to support our commitment in the patients charter to limit the waiting time for out-patient appointments to 30 minutes?

We expect answers to all those questions, but I suspect that I know what the answer will be. I was interested to see a distinguished periodical describe the Labour party the other day as the "preservative party"—dedicated to preserving all that is bad, and opposing all progress and improvement. That craven indebtedness to producer interest means that Labour Members must maintain that all public services are in perfect condition, unimprovable save by the additon of more money. That is Labour's answer to all problems—write a cheque, drawn not on our money but on other people's.

Why, if money is the answer to all our problems, are there such startling and marked differences in efficiency between different parts of the public service? Why does it cost three times as much in Southwark as in Wandsworth to empty a dustbin? Is it simply a question of money? Does Southwark need more money so that it can provide a worse service at greater cost?

Why should one hospital's administration cost three times as much per patient as another, or its operating theatre cost twice as much to run? The answer is simply that one operation is far more efficient than the other, and we need not put in more money to make the less efficient as good as the best. It must be made more efficient. If we can do that, we shall improve the public services without spending more money.

That is anathema to Labour, because it means being prepared to take on some vested interests and face some tough fights on behalf of the consumer and taxpayer. Those vested interests must be taken on, and we must win. Labour will never do that. Would the Liberals be prepared to do it?

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: It is all very well for the Minister to talk about inefficiencies in the public services. Nobody is denying that there is room for improvement and that mechanisms for improvement are worth exploring, but the Minister is throwing up a smokescreen to obscure the accountability of Government. It has been estimated that the poll tax debacle has wasted £19 billion of taxpayers' money—[Interruption.] Ministers have admitted that hundreds of millions of pounds have been wasted on it, and they can easily lose a nought here or there. In those circumstances, what satisfaction can the citizen get in calling the Government to account for their incompetence and waste of public money?

Mr. Maude: It is easy to see why even the Liberal Democrats have not appointed the hon. Gentleman their shadow Treasury spokesman. His grasp of arithmetic is slight, and he seems firmly entrenched in the world of fantasy. He has obviously thought of a figure, multiplied it by 10, doubled it and ended up with a figure from the realms of fantasy.

The hon. Gentleman dismisses talk of extra efficiency and says that, if there has been any, it has simply been a bit of extra efficiency here and there. If one hospital is two or three times more efficient than another, is that simply a little more efficiency at the margin? It represents a huge amount of extra public resource being converted into service to the customer instead of being used inefficiently.

Does the hon. Gentleman support us in trying to root out such inefficiency and ensure that every pound we take from the taxpayer and spend on his behalf on patient care is spent as well as possible? Will he now support our NHS reforms, which are devoted to providing that greater efficiency and the better care that will flow from it? I will willingly give way if he wishes to say whether he now supports that initiative to achieve those efficiency gains for the patient and the NHS.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: The Minister well knows that any hon. Member would support such steps if that degree of efficiency could be achieved. He also knows that the citizens charter obscures incompetence and inadequacies in government. If the charter is such a good idea, the Government should have introduced it 12 years ago.

Mr. Maude: I have made it clear many times that the citizens charter continues the programme of reform that we have put into place. We could not have introduced the maximum waiting time guarantee scheme without having had in place the NHS reforms that were introduced under the leadership of my right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher). The two are inextricably linked.

If Opposition Members intend to oppose, as they have consistently, doggedly and dogmatically opposed, our NHS reforms, they must be honest with the British people and admit that they oppose our plans to introduce maximum waiting time guarantees for operations. Or do they accept our plans? I fancy not.

Labour is interested only in what is spent and what is put into public services. It is never concerned with what is bought and what comes out of those services. Labour consistently tries to hide that fact, whereas we know well that it is not what one spends but what one buys that matters. That is why Labour Members fear a real citizens charter. It is why the Government will press on with the charter and our programme of reform on behalf of our citizens, so making sure that the services they get, provided by the taxpayer, improve and get ever better.

10.15 am

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): When the Prime Minister announced that the citizens charter would be the centrepiece of his governmental activity, he said that it would be nothing less than a revolution and the most comprehensive quality initiative ever launched. The Financial Secretary has also been at the hype game this morning. He talked about the largest programme ever launched anywhere to improve public services.

Mr. Maude: If the hon. Gentleman disputes that, will he point to another initiative anywhere which is more comprehensive and rigorous?

Mr. Smith: I intend to dispute it bit by bit as my speech progresses, because the Government's claims for their citizens charter must be weighed against what their proposals will achieve. Despite the great fanfare with which the charter was introduced, what has emerged is half-baked, minimalist, inadequate and in some cases positively counter-productive. It is as though an elephant has laboured long and brought forth a mouse.

The Financial Secretary asked why Labour Members were opposed to the initiative. We are not opposed to the idea. We are not opposed to the principle of ensuring that the customers and users of the public services achieve an efficient, courteous and proper delivery of service. But we believe that the Government's proposals will not take us in that direction. We are not opposed to the idea: we are opposed to what the Government are offering.

The answer to the Minister's question whether we have relented in our opposition to the so-called reforms of the past 12 years is a resounding no. Most of those reforms have produced overwhelmingly worse public services than existed previously. He asked whether we intended to oppose this year's planned legislation by the Government. We shall, because in the great majority of cases it will not produce any real extension of choice for the British people.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman appears to be doing himself and his party an injustice. Among the reforms to which the Minister referred was the right-to-buy scheme. Labour Members opposed that root and branch for a long time, until they realised how popular the scheme was with the public and then they decided to support it. So it is not true to say that Labour Members have maintained their opposition to Government proposals for change. In a number of key areas they have abandoned their opposition.

Mr. Smith: Our opposition to the right to buy when it was introduced was that it would reduce the opportunities for those who wanted to remain council tenants and for people in need of council accommodation. We were subsequently proved right on both counts.

We say now, correctly, that it is entirely right and proper that tenants should have the right to buy their council accommodation, but local authorities should have a duty to replace accommodation that is disposed of in that way. The Government have totally failed to introduce that crucial element into the system.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): That issue is of great importance in Northern Ireland, because there is a contradiction between the actions of the Conservative Government there and in England. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Northern Ireland Office will not allow council tenants in the Province to buy their houses?

Mr. Smith: The right hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. The Government refuse the right to buy not only to council tenants in Northern Ireland but to private sector tenants. There are inconsistencies in the Government's actions.

I suppose that we should be glad about two aspects of the citizens charter. The first is that the Government seem to realise that the public services matter. They have spent the past 12 years running down our public services, closing local government and depriving our citizens of a real voice. It is little wonder that we are somewhat sceptical of the sudden conversion that appears to have occurred with the Government's dawning realisation that the people believe that public services are important, want them delivered properly and want a Government who are determined to improve them. The Government realise that public demand, but cannot deliver on it.

Mr. Arbuthnot: In describing the operations of Islington council, which will be familiar to the hon. Gentleman, a recent Queen's Counsel's report said that "having the cash office staffed by the innumerate, the filing done by the dyslexic and disorganised, and reception by the surly or charmless, seems to us a recipe for administrative chaos."

Do not the Government have some justification for their attitude towards local government?

Mr. Smith: The Government cannot justify their treatment of local government over the past 12 years. Of course there are instances in local authorities under all shades of political control of services being discourteously or inadequately delivered. No one contests that. The key question that the House must address is how to achieve the necessary improvement. The Government's actions over the past 12 years and their proposals for a citizens charter will not achieve that.

Our suspicion is that the Government's conversion to the importance of public services is more of a pre-election gimmick than a change of heart.

We should also be glad—I suppose that it is a form of flattery—that the basic idea of a citizens charter was plagiarised from Labour. As long ago as 1921, Herbert Morrison wrote a pamphlet for the Labour party entitled "The Citizens' Charter", which argued rumbustiously for the role that local government could and should play in enhancing the quality of service received by the public.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is reverting to the days of Herbert Morrison. I expected him to develop and to put more meat on his earlier point about the Government's attitude to public services. One of the most sensitive and controversial public services and one which has featured in recent debates is the national health service. Can the hon. Gentleman deny that the Government's record of investment in the NHS over the past 12 years is infinitely better than that of his Government in the 1970s? Can he deny that before the citizens charter came along, reforms were proposed and, in my own constituency for one, effectively implemented for hospital trusts, which will bring better services for patients? That happened before the citizens charter was conceived.

Finally, can the hon. Gentleman deny that Labour is opposed to competitive tendering in public services and thus threatens worse services to patients and other consumers?

Mr. Smith: If the hon. Gentleman talks to patients, he will find that their perception of hospitals opting out, the internal market and the way in which the Government's so-called reforms have been implemented do not accord with the version that he just gave.

I said that Labour has for a long time been arguing for the kind of approach that the charter is supposed to represent.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: Perhaps later. I am sure that other things that I have to say will bring the hon. Gentleman to his feet.

In April 1986, when my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) launched Labour's "At Your Service" charter for better local services, he said:

"We will require every local council to set clear target standards for every service, so that the community knows exactly what they should expect. We'll require the council to publish every year a rating of performance and public satisfaction for every service, so that the community knows exactly how far the council has gone in reaching its aims. And we'll ensure that local councils consult with local people on public transport, social services, and other key issues."

It comes a little rich from the hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) when he says that the citizens charter was not something that my party had thought of. We did and put it forward—and at last the Government have woken up to the fact that something must be done.

To build on the document that we published in 1986, in April 1989 we issued our "Quality Street" proposals on the work of local government, in which we set out the kind of quality programme that we wanted to be introduced. We insisted, for example, on a system of quality audits:

"We would introduce local quality audits for council services, whether provided by the council's own staff, by voluntary organisations, the public sector, a housing association, or managed by community groups."

This year, we launched our own citizens charter setting out a series of new proposed rights—rights much more real than those that the Government seek to trumpet and which I will describe later.

The idea of having a citizens charter is right. Indeed, it is essential. However, the Government's execution of that aim is failing miserably.

I shall now examine some of the specific proposals in the Government's citizens charter and consider some of our principal criticisms of it. First, it excludes any of the Government's decision-making processes from the system of accountability. The Financial Secretary made much of the importance of transparency and openness; he stressed that several times. But the citizens charter and the Government's legislative programme contain no commitment to provide for freedom of information legislation to give our citizens the right of access to information on what the Government are up to.

Information and access to it are the absolute preconditions of power in a democracy. The Government are restricting people's right of access to that democratic power. The Government have an opportunity to reverse that. The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), who I was delighted to see was placed sixth in the private Member's Bill ballot this year, has said that he will introduce a Bill on freedom of information. If the Government's rhetoric about the citizens charter, openness and transparency is genuine, they have an opportunity to say now that they will support the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills and not use the payroll vote on a three-line Whip to vote down an eminently sensible measure, as they did previously when the hon. Member introduced a similar Bill. They could state that they were going to enforce, support and even improve the provisions of his Bill.

I challenge the Financial Secretary to say that the Government will support the Bill on freedom of information which will come before us in a couple of months. If he does, we shall have more reason to believe that the Government's devotion to openness in the processes of government is genuine. I suspect that the Government will do nothing of the sort, but unless and until legislation on freedom of information is introduced —as the Labour Government will in their first year of office—talking about citizens' rights is nothing more than windy rhetoric.

Mr. David Nicholson: If the Labour party is now so keen on freedom of information, why did not it extend that freedom and introduce a Bill on the subject when it was last in power, particularly as it was pressed by the Liberals to do so during that strange period of the Lib-Lab pact?

Mr. Smith: I suspect that, like me, the hon. Gentleman was not in the House then, but he will recall that the then Labour Government did not have a majority. Even in the days of the so-called Lib-Lab pact, they did not have an overall majority towards the end of their term and when the opportunity arose for a private Member's Bill on freedom of information, it proved impossible to enact it because the Conservative Opposition opposed the idea root and branch, as do the present Conservative Government.

Mr. Steve Norris (Epping Forest): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: No, I have given way many times and although I have considerable respect for the hon. Gentleman and his record on the issue, there is still much more for me to say. I do not wish to detain the House for too long.

Our second major criticism of the Government's citizens charter programme is that it contains no proposals for the necessary funding of any improvements to the public services that it might introduce. It is no good the Government saying that they will improve schools' performance by publishing league tables of exam results, which the Government should recognise can be misleading —although I have no objection in principle to publishing such information—when children are sitting in classrooms with leaking roofs, insufficient school books and inadequate pupil-teacher ratios. Those are the real challenges that should be addressed, but the Government are not doing so. It is no good the Government saying that there should be compensation for the late arrival of a train when, for year after year, they have under-invested in the railways and the public transport networks. Investment could have procured a better service.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): Is not the hon. Gentleman aware that since 1979 the Government have invested £12 billion in British Rail and are investing £1·5 billion this year and £2 billion next year? How much does he believe should be invested and how much would a Labour Government set aside to invest in British Rail?

Mr. Smith: Were the hon. Gentleman to take a trip to France or Germany, he would see that those countries have invested far more substantially in their public transport networks than we have and also have more sensible ways of ensuring that that investment can take place. The French railway system can raise money from the private sector in ways currently denied to British Rail.

The Government make much, and the Financial Secretary made much, of the importance of factors such as name tags, plain English awards, signposts in offices, Charter Mark awards and so on. We have no quarrel with the aim of such changes. They do not add up to a revolution, but are a necessary improvement in courtesy and efficiency with which no one could disagree. The Government have failed to realise that unless they devote the growth in our national resources to the improvement of public services, we shall not achieve the sort of improvement in quality that we want.

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman has now come to the issue that I thought would arise and which I foreshadowed in my remarks: the Labour party's remedy for any defect in public services is to pump in money. Will the hon. Gentleman come clean and say from which of the Labour party's spending pledges, which we costed in our document earlier this year, he now seeks to resile? Which of them does he now believe is wrong? Let us have a full, clear and honest answer for once.

Mr. Smith: The Government's response to public services during the past 12 years has been to starve them of resources, which is not a policy that we want to follow.

Mr. Maude rose——

Mr. Smith: The Financial Secretary must restrain himself a little; I am about to answer his important point.

The Labour party is saying to the people of this country and will continue to do so during the coming general election campaign, that citizens have a choice between a party that has said that its primary aim is to reduce the rate of direct taxation and a party—the Labour party—which has said that it will not pursue that policy. We shall devote the increased resources available to a Government through the proceeds of economic growth, year by year, to the improvement of public services. The electorate has a clear choice. It can decide whether it wants a Government who give priority to cutting taxation or a Government who give priority to improving public service. A Labour Government will be offering those improved public services.

Mr. Maude: Will the hon. Gentleman now answer my question? From which of the £35 billion worth of Labour spending pledges does he now dissent?

Mr. Tony Banks: It is a rubbish figure.

Mr. Maude: The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) says that it is a rubbish figure. Let us hear in what way it is rubbish. From which of those spending pledges—all made clearly by Labour spokesmen —do they now resile?

Mr. Chris Smith: It is a rubbish figure: Ministers sat down together to produce a global total so absurd that I do not think any sensible commentator takes it seriously.

Mr. Maude: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: I shall give way to the Minister for the last time, although I might add that he did not extend a similar courtesy to me.

Mr. Maude: I sought to intervene only to help the hon. Gentleman by giving him, once again, the opportunity to come clean with the House. He says that Ministers sought to give a global total. That is nonsense and he knows that it is nonsense. We took the pledges from what Labour spokesmen had clearly said. We then set out the specific details and made plain the method used to calculate the cost of each pledge. As the hon. Gentleman knows well, commentators have taken that total very seriously.

Mr. Smith: The Financial Secretary is really trying it on. The figures that he, his ministerial colleagues and their friends in Tory central office have come up with are completely ridiculous. The Financial Secretary knows it and the people know it. I might add in passing that it comes ill from a Government who imposed the poll tax and the cost of the poll tax on the British people to start complaining about the spending aims of other parties.

The Government have given no commitment to devote more resources to the improvement of public services. Instead, £8 million worth of taxpayers' money has been spent on glossy advertising to promote the idea of the citizens charter. That is extra spending and the money could undoubtedly have been better spent.

Our third objection to the citizens charter and the way in which the Government are going about implementing it concerns the reliance on privatisation to ensure an automatic improvement in public service. The Government seem to have failed to realise that there is bad private provision as well as bad public provision. The task should be to secure and guarantee improvements in both and not simply switch from one to the other and think that one's aim has been achieved. Take the Government's proposals for the Post Office. I very much doubt whether people living in rural areas in the regions would applaud the effects on their service of the introduction of competition and the removal of the Post Office monopoly on the delivery of mail. The principle of a universal service at a universal charge is the basic one on which the Post Office has operated for decades and it is extremely important in ensuring that, no matter how expensive it may be to deliver a particular letter, everyone, everywhere gets the same quality of service. The Government assume that the introduction of competition and an element of privatisation will somehow bring improvements. In fact, they are going in the reverse direction and their proposals are likely to make a substantial portion of the service worse.

It is worth having a careful and critical look at a number of specific aspects of the citizens charter. The Government have made much of the introduction of the Competition and Service (Utilities) Bill, which we shall be debating next week. But that Bill contains no proposal for a statutory ombudsman and no regulation of profiteering by the privatised utilities—no requirement on British Telecom to give back to the customers some of the absurd profits that it is now making. The Consumers Association says that, in introducing the Bill, the Government have missed a golden opportunity for a thorough review of the regulation of the big utilities. The Bill gives the regulators no real teeth although it should. All in all, the Government have introduced a very inadequate measure.

The Government have recently introduced the so-called patients charter. It is interesting to note that seven of the 10 so-called rights that the charter gives to patients already exist. We welcome the fact that they are being publicised, but there is not very much that is new in the charter. Most of the three new rights that the Government propose are already operated by the majority of health authorities. In the overwhelming majority of cases, for example, the aim of admission to hospital for an operation within two years is already achieved. Of course, we welcome the tightening up of such rights, but the patients charter hardly represents major progress, as the Government claim.

At the same time, the Government are pressing ahead with their proposals for changes in the national health service, such as the introduction of the internal market and the opting out of hospitals, some of which run directly counter to the provisions of the patients charter. For example, the patients charter refers to appropriate plans for discharge from hospitals, yet the Government are introducing financial systems that place hospitals under intense pressure to empty beds and to bring in new patients as rapidly as possible. How do the Government square that with the appropriate plan for discharge proposal in the citizens charter?

Let us consider the proposals for school inspections. The Financial Secretary made much of what he called a lay element in the process. What does that mean? It means that the Government plan to cut the number of Her Majesty's inspectors from 500 to about 175. Moreover, of the 175 who will be left, only 39 are earmarked by the Department of Education and Science for involvement in the quality assurance of independent inspections. In other words, the Government are establishing a privatised inspection process, but only 39 inspectors in the entire country will be designated to monitor what the private inspectors are up to. That is no guarantee of quality assurance. We shall vigorously oppose the Government's proposals on that.

Such inadequacies are to be found throughout the charter. An examination of the fine print shows that the proposals for improving motorway service areas simply mean that they will be built more quickly, less properly spaced and will make a bigger profit. There is no way of ensuring that they provide a better service to the people who use them. What has happened to the proposals for commonhold legislation and rights for leaseholders which we were told would appear in the Queen's Speech? What about the need for a fully independent investigation system for complaints against the police? The charter contains nothing to improve the present procedures.

It seems that the Government have suddenly woken up to the fact that the Department of Social Security, through its face-to-face contact with people in Benefits Agency offices, sometimes falls down in its dealings with the public. The charter says:

"Visiting benefit offices should never be a daunting or demoralising experience".

Coming from the Government, that is rather rich. Every week for the past eight years I have met constituents who find visits to DSS offices and Benefits Agency offices thoroughly demoralising and daunting. I raised the matter in the House five and a half years ago. At one particular DSS office, some of my constituents were treated as Dickensian supplicants rather than as citizens seeking to secure their rights. There are still inadequacies in the way in which the Benefits Agency treats people.

Mr. Maude: May I assume from the hon. Gentleman's indignation that he wholeheartedly supports our proposals to improve matters?

Mr. Smith: I wholeheartedly approve the Government's aim of seeking to improve matters, but I am not convinced that their specific proposal will achieve it. If the Government are serious about removing the demoralisation and the daunting nature of approaches to benefits offices, it is about time that they removed the most grotesque form of demoralisation, which is the operation of the social fund. That was dreamt up by the Prime Minister when he was a social security Minister and is the most demeaning aspect of the social security system. Reform of the way in which that operates would be a real benefit for the citizen. New name tags and nicer offices are all very well, but fundamental parts of the system need to be changed.

Mr. Arbuthnot: The hon. Gentleman has been generous in giving way. I hope that he will forgive me for saying that his approach to the citizens charter is beginning to sound a little churlish. The impressive aspect of the charter is not so much the individual actions, impressive though they are, but the fact that it will change the entire public service approach to citizens. It is not the individual programmes but the approach of the public service to citizens that matters. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be a little more welcoming than he has been so far.

Mr. Smith: I suspect that the hon. Gentleman is not living in the real world. The proposals that the citizens charter purports to contain will produce little real change in the way in which our citizens receive the services to which they are entitled.

Mr. Hugo Summerson (Walthamstow): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: No, because time is pressing and I want to make some progress.

Mr. Tony Banks: Go on, give way.

Mr. Smith: In response to the blandishments of my hon. Friend, I shall give way to the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Summerson), who used to be one of my constituents. This is the last intervention that I shall allow.

Mr. Summerson: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the charter would improve the performance of the Clerkenwell neighbourhood office in his constituency? Following a recent council by-election, the staff in that office are refusing to co-operate, not only with the local council, but with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Smith: I have said loudly that the performance of that neighbourhood office, which was the subject of some doorstep discussion before the council by-election, leaves something to be desired. Precisely the same can be said of many local authorities, whether controlled by Tories, Liberal Democrats or Labour or where no party has overall control. The citizens charter will not make much difference to the way in which those authorities deliver the services that they should deliver efficiently, promptly and courteously.

The hon. Member for Walthamstow fails to recognise that many Labour-controlled local authorities are already implementing many of the aims to which the Government are now waking up in the charter. For example, over the past three years, York city council has been implementing a citizens charter containing guaranteed levels of service. I have here a leaflet which the council has issued about street cleaning in part of the city. It lays down the exact standards of performance that are expected, the timing of street cleaning, the standards to be achieved, the rota on which the work will be done and the provisions that the residents in the area can expect to achieve from the council. York city council is a pioneer in ensuring that such a contract between the local authority and the people whom it serves will deliver the standard of service that people deserve.

Oxford has a nine-point customer contract on refuse collection which guarantees a whole series of provisions to the citizen. Milton Keynes has a customer contract which includes a guarantee to remove graffiti within specified times. The London borough of Hounslow has published a service charter on answering the telephone and responding to letters. Those are examples of Labour-controlled authorities which are getting on with doing what the Government are only talking about.

A Labour Government will seek to ensure for citizens a wide range of additional rights that the Government do not propose in their citizens charter. We shall ensure that all users of public services will have access to complaints procedures, which will include strict timetables for responding to complaints and an appeal to an independent ombudsman.

We shall ensure that, for council services where a fee is charged and for public utility customer services contracts, compensation will be paid where a service falls short of the published standards. We shall ensure that firms and public bodies that breach or fail to meet environmental standards will bear the cost of abatement and cleaning up of pollution. We shall ensure that people suffering from excessive noise pollution from factories, airports, railways and other commercial sources will be entitled to compensation for the installation of better insulation from those causing the noise nuisance.

We shall ensure that complaints against the police will be investigated by an independent police complaints authority. We shall ensure that prisoners will be given access to an independent prison ombudsman. We shall introduce a right to have misleading or inaccurate personal information held by public or private bodies corrected or erased. We shall ensure that individuals will have the right to publication of a full apology, or the award of a right to reply, where their privacy has been unreasonably invaded by the media. We shall ensure that, where there is prima facie evidence of a miscarriage of justice, an individual will be able to have his case investigated by an independent body, separate from the courts, in the last resort.

We shall strengthen the accountability of local authorities to their electors for the budgets that they set and the services that they provide by ensuring that a proportion of every council is elected each year. We shall ensure that tenants will have the option to be active partners in their housing, with the right to take over estate management if they wish. We shall ensure that the right of community health councils to be present at all health authority meetings—a right removed by the Government—will be restored. Community health councils will be encouraged to speak for all patients across the range of NHS services and will be given funding independent of the regional health authorities.

Those are just some of the measures that a Labour Government will introduce. They will provide real rights for people—rights which they can exercise to ensure that they get the quality of service that they deserve. We shall also have in place a proper system of monitoring, of satisfaction surveys, of regulation and of annual elections and we shall establish a quality commission to examine quality as well as value for money. There will be a complaints procedures and redress, to follow up the rights that we shall ensure that people have.

Above all, we shall give priority to the improvement of public services over and above the offering of tax cuts to the electorate. That is the basic choice that will be in front of people at the next election. It will be a choice between a party that offers tax cuts and a party that offers better public services. We realise that one cannot put right the damage of 12 years of neglect and deterioration with a few cosmetic gestures. We understand that, to achieve real rights for citizens and real improvements in the quality of our public services, we require a Labour Government and the people of this country will vote for one—the sooner the better.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Have you received any notification from the Government of their wish to make a statement about the extraordinary new revelations in The Guardian this morning about the bizarre and mysterious death of Robert Maxwell, a former Member of Parliament? Around the world, speculation is mounting about the theory that Mr. Maxwell may have been murdered, for the reason that dead men tell no tales. Surely the Government must soon allow a debate on Mirrorgate. Have you heard whether that will be sooner rather than later?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I have heard nothing about that, and I have had no request from a Minister to make a statement.

11.4 am

Mr. Steve Norris (Epping Forest): Listening to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) saying that it was not the Government who had thought of the citizens charter but Mr. Herbert Morrison reminded me that old habits die hard—in particular, the old habit, much beloved of socialist Governments everywhere, of rewriting history. I remember the marvellous Soviet history that concluded that the Soviet Union was responsible for the invention of television, computers and penicillin.

I would put Labour's commitment to a citizens charter roughly in that category. A citizens charter could only ever be a creature of a Conservative Government, for one cardinal and overriding reason—the Labour party is beholden, in terms of funding, finance and philosophy, to the producers, rather than the consumers, of services. That fundamental divide will put them at a permanent disadvantage in endeavours to provide quality services to the citizen.

Mr. Galloway: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Norris: I am already beset by offers to interrupt my pearls of wisdom and, in deference to my good friend, I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Galloway: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way so early in his speech. Does not the concept of a citizen imply the existence of a society? Did not the former Prime Minister memorably state that there was no such thing as society, only individuals?

Mr. Norris: Much as I would enjoy debating this matter with the hon. Gentleman, whom I might also call my hon. Friend, I do not wish to go down this path. I have always felt that the great truth of the words uttered by my right hon. Friend the former Prime Minister was that she had pierced the bubble of the omniscience of the social worker—the concept that every problem in society can be resolved by the intervention of a bureaucrat—and had identified the fact that the real core of social development is an individual's self-reliance and reliance upon the family. That was the virtue of my right hon. Friend's remark, which I wholeheartedly endorse. I am grateful to have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Dicks: Does my hon. Friend agree that the very people of whom Labour Members complain, saying that they do not give a service in Government Departments, almost always belong to unions who support the Labour party? Why does not the Labour party tell union representatives to make sure that the staff who pay their union dues provide that service? The very supporters of the Labour party provide bad services to the ordinary people.

Mr. Norris: My hon. Friend anticipates what I am going to say. Those of us in public life are aware that, whenever complaints of poor service come before us, there are always Labout Members who will blame either the absence of public funds, although they never make any reference to where the money has to come from, or the Government. It is never—or perhaps only on occasion—the fault of an individual who has not done his job conscientiously or with an adequate standard of service.

It is not always true that deficiencies in service are to blame. Governments of every political persuasion wish to spend more on an almost limitless number of service areas, but far too often—infinitely more often than Labour Members care to admit—the fault lies in the simple failure of an individual to deliver a conscientious personal commitment.

This is nowhere better exemplified than in the treatment that some consultants in the NHS offered those who had to visit them as out-patients. It is now common knowledge that there were consultants—were, because the Government have done something about the problem—who simply said, "I am a very important man. My time is extremely valuable, and I am not going to be kept waiting here while people like patients take up five or 10 minutes when I shall not be earning at a rate that would put the salary of Members of Parliament to shame. Instead of inviting my patients to see me at 10-minute intervals—generally I offer them each 10 minutes of my time—I shall invite the lot to attend at 9 o'clock in the morning. When we get to 12 o'clock, some of them will have waited for three hours. That is their problem. I am a very busy man who has to go and earn a lot of money in the private hospital next door." That sort of personal approach to the individual citizen is, more than anything else, likely to outrage the individual citizen who is being treated by the national health service.

Where does the fault lie that produces that outrage? First, it is clear that putting the National Union of Public Employees, the National and Local Government Officers Association and the Confederation of Health Service Employees back in the driving seat will never solve the problem. The Labour party's reliance on producers rather than consumers will constantly bedevil its attempts to convince the British people that it is serious on these issues.

Differences in quality standards, to which my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary referred, involve issues that are too serious for us to ignore. There are palpable differences between the quality of service that is offered at individual hospitals. The same can be said of individual schools. Differences in the quality of service of local authorities is evident, and London is a marvellous example.

Let us take Lambeth and Wandsworth. I shall not embarrass Labour Members by reminding the House in detail that there is no community charge in Wandsworth because the authority is such a good manager of its moneys, while a huge charge is levied in Lambeth, which unfortunately I have to pay. The difference between the quality of service that is offered by the two authorities is obvious on reaching the boundary between the two. The black sacks full of fetid rubbish that are to be seen in Lambeth do not meet the eye on entering Wandsworth. That is despite the fact that I am paying hundreds of pounds a year for the privilege of a so-called collection service.

Mr. Tony Banks: I have ridden in the hon. Gentleman's car, which is so large that it enters Wandsworth as soon as it enters the boundary of Lambeth. I agree with the hon. Gentleman's remarks about consultants getting everyone to attend between 9 o'clock and 10 o'clock, for example, and then keeping them waiting. He is right when he says that that should be stopped. He then said that that system is created by the National Union of Public Employees and the Confederation of Health Service Employees. Of course, no consultants are members of organisations such as NUPE and COHSE, so the hon. Gentleman should not try to run the two things together.

Mr. Norris: I shall make some concessions to the hon. Gentleman. First, I concede that not many consultants are members of NUPE or COHSE. He is right about that. Secondly, I have an extremely large car. He is right about that as well. However, the hon. Gentleman has never shown any reluctance to enter my car. I happen to pass his house on the way to my own. I extend to the hon. Gentleman an open invitation to join me on any subsequent occasion. I promise him the same standard of service in my car as that which he would expect to be provided by a Conservative borough, or even a Conservative taxi service operated by myself.

When we talk about a citizens charter and standards of public service, we must decide whether they are merely advertising hype and a complete waste of public money, or whether they are worthwhile objectives. We often refer to our mail bags, and hon. Members sometimes comment that over the past six months they have received only one or two letters about Europe, a subject which consumes the House beyond any other. I imagine that, if we added up all the letters that set out complaints about individual examples of poor public service, the total would outnumber those that we receive on weightier national issues by tens or hundreds to one.

There are some items that I regard as headlines in the citizens charter and sadly I find myself in conflict with the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. The hon. Gentleman suggests that the identification of public servants by means of name badges is merely a bit of show, an unimportant piece of advertising hype. I suggest that the reality is fundamentally different.

Over generations, it has been possible for public servants to hide behind the cloak of anonymity. They have been able to offer an utterly inadequate personal service to individual customers and clients of whichever agency they represent. I am surprised that Opposition Members are not prepared to be more open about this. There have been some in the public service who have refused to answer their telephones. There are those who turn files over and are not prepared to act upon them. There are some who give dismissive answers to those who are not good at writing or reading.

I welcome the appearance in the Chamber of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office. I know that he was keen to listen to every word that I intended to say on these matters. My hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) and I "share" a Benefits Agency office at Wentworth house in Ilford, which is run by the excellent Miss Alice O'Carroll. I endorse entirely what my hon. Friend has said: Miss O'Carroll and her excellent staff have grasped wholeheartedly the idea of service delivery. They are now offering an infinitely higher standard of service in practical ways. For example, they have introduced a fast-track counter. It means that it is no longer necessary to stand in line for three quarters of an hour, for example, merely to ask which form should be completed. Simple reorganisation has eradicated delays of that sort.

It may be said that the example that I have given is extremely obvious, and that it is not necessary to introduce a citizens charter to make improvements of that sort. I doubt that. Without the impetus of the specific commitment of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to improving the quality of basic services, I doubt whether we would have seen simple but desperately important measures taken in the public service, at no cost to the public purse. Such actions have done so much to improve the standard of service that is offered to the individual citizen.

Mr. Arbuthnot: The new fast-track counter at Wentworth house has dramatically changed the lives of those who enter it. As my hon. Friend has said, they no longer have to queue with those who will take a great deal of time to collect their benefits or whatever. I am grateful to him for stressing that the improvement cost nothing. It is not right for those in the Labour party to say that an absence of funds is holding back the public service.

Mr. Norris: That is an extremely important point. I well remember, from spending years in local government, being a member of an education committee. The committee examined the way in which individual head teachers regarded the maintenance of standards in their schools. Some heads insisted that those standards should be maintained, and some did not. The evidence was before our eyes. The period between the cyclical redecoration of the school was not the only factor. The important factor was whether the head teacher and his staff were committed to maintaining the fabric of their school. There was no difference between the costs of individual schools, but the differences between the schools were obvious.

The citizens charter is a fundamental underpinning of commitment to quality of service. It is clear that quality of service does not necessarily depend on an open cheque book. The citizens charter is one of the most important contributions that we shall make to life in Britain in the 1990s and beyond.

I shall make some specific comments about the charter, and I hope that they will be of value and might be shared by some of my colleagues. First, I extend a considerable welcome to the steps that the charter envisages being taken to improve service on the railways in general, and specifically on the London underground.

I share with other hon. Members an interest in the operation of the London underground. The Central line is the artery that my constituents use to go to their businesses and it has offered an extremely inadequate service to the public over recent years. The inadequacy of the service has been very much in two parts. There has been historic under-investment in the London underground system, and there has been a poor quality of management of the service.

The Government have specifically resolved the first inadequacy. They are committed to, and have embarked upon, a programme in excess of £600 million to upgrade the fundamental infrastructure of the Central line. On behalf of my constituents, I am grateful for that. It cannot happen too soon.

So often, what rightly outrages my constituents has nothing to do with the age of the rolling stock, the adequacy of the staircase, the size of the signalling box, and so on; it has to do with simple discourtesies and inadequacies of communication. It has to do with simple management failures, often at station level, which are unforgiveable and which could be rectified without a single penny of additional funding. That is the key.

The citizens charter contains three proposals for London Underground. The first is the introduction of tough, new, quality-of-service targets for each station, with details of performance achieved available in the station foyer, and showing the comparisons between the targets for service and the number of targets that have actually been achieved.

Secondly, it proposes an acceleration of the contracting out of the cleaning and maintenance services. Anyone who knows the system knows that one of the major causes of disruption of service is suspected fires involving the ignition of pieces of litter on the railway system, which need to be taken away and dealt with quickly.

The third proposal is the introduction of performance-related pay for guards, drivers and signalling staff. I hope that that will especially relate to punctuality and absenteeism. We have all seen those marvellously short notices on the boards in stations that tell us that the reason for the failure of the 7·15 from Hainault is signal failure in Doncaster, when it is obvious to anyone who actually travels on the line that the real reason is that one of the staff failed to get out of bed on time.

I should prefer the system to concentrate on delivering that sort of quality of service and commitment in the most obvious way possible, which is quite simply to relate performance to pay. I assure the House that that will do more to improve the quality of service on London Underground than hundreds of millions of pounds expended by the Exchequer.

Mr. Dicks: With great respect to my hon. Friend, I must tell him that he made a slight error when he referred to funding. He said that London Regional Transport traditionally had been underfunded. In fact, in 1987, 1988 and 1989, LRT failed to spend an allocation of £120 million. When I raised that matter with its chairman during a Select Committee meeting, he said "Don't talk about the past; let us look ahead." I wanted my hon. Friend to know that LRT could have spent another £120 million on capital investment in the underground.

Mr. Norris: I defer to my hon. Friend's detailed knowledge of the subject. He is well known for having travelled some of the world's most exotic airlines and railways in his exhaustive endeavours to improve his expertise. The limits of my railway travel experience generally extend to going on to Lancaster Gate rather than getting off at Oxford Circus. I am sure that my hon. Friend is right in all that he says.

I consider the most crucial part of the citizens charter to be that which relates to performance-related pay. We need to be careful how we introduce that concept, because certain truths are self-evident. The first is that the concept of relating how people perform their duties to the remuneration that they receive must be fundamentlly correct, something of which we never lose sight, and something that we should promote wherever possible.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Norris: I think that I can forestall the hon. Gentleman, who is passionate in his belief that Members of Parliament should also be subject to a performance-related pay system. I hope that it is no reflection on my performance, but I sincerely hope that that does not happen. It would greatly diminish the joy of being a Member of the House if my function in life were limited to adding to the intolerable burden on Ministers, which the Liberal Democrats appear quite content to do, by asking desperately irrelevant questions about minor personalities in parts of the world hundreds of miles away. In fact, the answer could be much more easily derived by writing to the local police station or the benefits office.

If we were to approach such a system, I should prefer to do so on the basis of rewarding hon. Members for the number of constructive ideas that they include in their speeches, and deducting £500 a time for the spurious points of order they make and the number of sedentary interventions that interrupt the Member who is speaking.

On that basis, there could be some merit in the hon. Gentleman's proposals. In fact, he may well be thinking along positive lines. For example, it would be grossly over-simplistic to imagine that performance-related pay for teachers should be limited to the simplistic criterion of examination results. I am glad that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science immediately made it clear that, while he is rightly wedded to the concept of performance-related pay, he recognises that there is a need for an extremely sophisticated assessment system if the relationship between remuneration and performance is to mean something.

Anyone in business knows that if, for example, a salesman is rewarded simply on the basis of the amount he sells, that could often be a desperate distortion of performance. This might appear to be frightfully obvious, but in a bull market it is easy to sell anything to anyone —[Interruption.] I will accept no intervention on that subject. Of course, the reverse position is also true—a salesman has to work hard to deliver the business in a tough market, and he needs to be supported by, for example, reference to other criteria in the performance of his duties, such as attendance, willingness to go the extra mile in the performance of his duties, and so on. Those factors are what really mark out the ability to relate performance to pay, and I welcome them.

Another point that has caused me concern arose when I visited my local Benefits Agency office at Harlow—not the one that I share with my hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford. It expressed the real concern that, if the Treasury is allowed to take efficiency savings produced by agencies and immediately consolidate them into the Exchequer's budget—that is, take the savings and then reduce the starting point for the next year—that could have two consequences.

First, it would demoralise the staff when they see savings that they have struggled to make disappear in that way. Secondly, and perhaps more damaging, it might encourage them not to seek the optimum saving available. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary is shrewd enough to know that. The staff want to ensure that they have a little put aside for next year; they do not want to give all the savings to the Exchequer, because they fear that the agency's global budget will be correspondingly reduced.

I urge my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to take a firm line on that matter even though his officials—in the interests of efficiency and cost-effectiveness—will urge him otherwise. We must always remember that the flip side of the coin that penalises poor performance is that we must be prepared to reward good performance. An agency that has carried out its job conscientiously will show an obvious difference in the standards offered—for example, better furniture, a better foyer area, larger offices, and better pay. That is as it should be, as that will offer an incentive to others in the same public service to do likewise.

One point which causes me exquisite agony was raised by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. Of course, I am referring to the question of freedom of information. This is probably my only opportunity as a Parliamentary Private Secretary in the Home Department to make this observation. If the Whip on duty will avert his gaze and ears, I must state that I believe that one of the fundamental underpinnings of citizens' rights to good quality service is information to know what is being done in his or her name.

This morning, my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary said that he strongly supported principles of openness. I welcome that. However, the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury was sadly and dangerously misguided —I say "misguided", because I cannot believe that he wished to mislead the House—when he referred to the Labour Government's efforts in that regard. He should have allowed me to intervene, because he is such a fair chap. However, since he did not so, I am obliged to make my point now.

It is a matter of exquisite regret to me that the truth in these matters is that Oppositions love freedom of information and Governments hate it. The Wilson and Callaghan Governments hated it just as much——

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. At 11.30 am, we are expecting the latest inflation figures to be announced. Have you had a request for a statement, because many people hope that the figure will be below 4 per cent. this month?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I informed the House at three minutes past 11 that I have received no requests for permission to make statements.

Mr. Norris: Perhaps I should allow my observations on freedom of information to end at that point. However, I have always believed that the principle of freedom of information is a profoundly Tory principle. I have been saddened by the extent to which the arguments about it have been politicised so as to divide the parties on the issue.

I remind my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary that it was my right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) who so trenchantly observed the virtues of freedom of information in the many years that she spent on the Opposition Benches. I urge my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary not to allow Sir Humphrey to win every time. I am aware of the tempting arguments placed before Ministers by permanent secretaries who perceive a problem in the area and who do not want to give away their most potent weapon in government. I urge my hon. Friend to put their blandishments in context.

As other hon. Members in this packed House are keen to contribute to the debate, I will make a final point about a matter which concerns me greatly because it relates to contracting out of services. I was involved in health authority management when the Conservative Government introduced the extremely welcome concept of contracting out. It is worth reminding the House that, in those early days when contracting out was introduced, those who wanted to tender or were successful in their tenders were subjected to vandalism, violence and the planting of incriminating evidence, an example of which was the deliberately fabricated evidence of dirty hospital theatres, where it was subsequently proved that the offending material had been planted by people who wanted to undermine the contractors.

Fortunately, all that is, I hope, long gone. The principles of contracting out remain, and the quality of care offered to a patient in a bed in a national health service hospital must be delivered at optimum value, to treat the greatest number of patients possible. If that means that we can achieve better value for money in laundry, cleaning and catering, then, regardless of our political aspirations, we should seek to achieve it.

I am also concerned about direct labour organisations. When we consider how some DLO contracts operate, I sometimes wonder whether the playing field is entirely level. Is my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary entirely satisfied that the same standards of rigid supervision applied by some local authorities to the performance of contractors are also applied when the contractor is a DLO or a former department of the local authority? I doubt whether that is the case.

Is my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary—I am sorry, my hon. Friend; I am anticipating the inevitable—entirely satisfied that performance-related conditions of contract are applied equally to those in the private sector and former council employees? Again, I doubt whether that is the case. There are legions of examples and I will not waste the time of the House by enumerating them, as they are well known to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary.

I am very concerned about the dangerous concept of "cheapest is best". For all sorts of reasons, which all hon. Members understand, we must largely rest on the supposition that local authorities are obliged to take the lowest tender. I do not believe that any of us in our private lives ever adopts the principle behind that conclusion. We all want best value rather than the cheapest price when we purchase goods or services. There is a straightforward way around that. We need pre-qualification thresholds for companies, because that is what so often distinguishes tenderers.

Where there is an obnormally low tender which a local authority feels obliged to accept, and where the worst examples of contracts have invariably occurred, that has happened because there has been inadequate pre-qualification investigation of the ability of the organisation—occasionally a DLO—or company to deliver the service. Therefore, we must ensure that every council and authority contracting out a service has a very high pre-qualification threshold which only those who are competent to provide the right level of service can surmount.

I warmly welcome the White Paper, which concludes by stating:

> "Its themes of quality, choice, standards and value for money will be fundamental to public service throughout the 1990s.
> The Charter will bring for all those in public service new pride and satisfaction.
> For the public they serve, it will bring commitment to quality and a power to secure it, that will put Britain ahead of any country in the world."

I warmly endorse those sentiments and congratulate my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary and the Government team on the initiative, and I commend it warmly to the House.

Mr. Maude: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I believe that the House will want to know, following the point of order from my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell), that the annual retail prices index for October announced a few moments ago was 3·7 per cent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is nearly an abuse of the procedures of the House; it is not a matter for me.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There was no point of order.

Mr. Skinner: What steps are you going to take to deal with that Government Front Bench yobbo?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I deprecate the use of that kind of language.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it be in order——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I thought that I had made it clear that there was no point of order.

11.38 am

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): The hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) made a lengthy speech in which he catalogued an array of shortcomings in public services which he believes the citizens charter would address. He—or any other hon. Member—could have made that speech 10, 30 or 50 years ago and I have no doubt that it could be made in 10, 30 or 50 years' time. The citizens charter has been grossly oversold by the Government.

My earlier interventions were not designed to suggest that I do not believe that there is scope for machinery to improve public service. Some aspects of the charter can be welcomed and supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House. However, the title—citizens charter—is a gross, grand misnomer for what is nothing more than a public service consumers charter. It is worth while, valid and has merit, but it is not the great big idea that will save the Government from defeat at the next general election.

Mr. Dicks: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that an interest rate of 3·7 per cent., which has just been announced, would make more money available to implement the citizens charter?

Mr. Bruce: I should be delighted to find out where I can borrow money at 3·7 per cent.

The speeches of the Minister and the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) are good demonstrations of the motherhood and apple pie approach. Of course, things are wrong with public services which can be put right and mechanisms can be introduced. But the danger is in the Government's suggestion to people that there will be some great transformation. People will have unfulfilled expectations when they find that their ability to press complaints, obtain redress and have things sorted out is not as substantial as they had been led to believe.

One is also entitled to question why, if things are so appallingly bad and these measures are so urgently needed, the Government have taken 12 years and six months to come round to the idea of introducing them.

Mr. Norris: It is for a simple reason which the hon. Gentleman must appreciate. Every move that we have made during the past 12 years to introduce such measures has been bitterly resisted by both the Labour party and the hon. Gentleman's party. They now pray in aid their support for each of the measures, now that they see how valuable they are.

Mr. Bruce: I wish to make it clear that I do not pray in aid support for the way in which the Government have privatised the utilities. Indeed, the Competition and Service (Utilities) Bill, which will be debated on Monday, is a recognition of the Government's failure to create consumer protection at an adequate level before the utilities were privatised.

Before the hon. Member for Epping Forest intervened, I was about to make the second point that much of the citizens charter is a recognition of the Government's failures and mistakes over the past 12 years and six months and the need to introduce measures to ensure greater satisfaction. I have to concur with the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) that there is anxiety about the way in which the Government put more and more public services into the private sector and yet continue to claim that they will maintain satisfactory standards in services over which they have given up control and accountability for which this elected House of Parliament has lost. That was the point of my earlier intervention.

The Minister said—other hon. Members have commented on it—that he was in favour of greater openness in government. The hon. Member for Epping Forest is well known for his commitment to the cause of freedom of information and is respected by hon. Members on both sides of the House for it. I was glad that he managed to put his commitment on the record. But the Government have resisted measures to introduce genuine freedom of information.

Setting up agencies is not wrong in itself. It can lead to greater efficiency. Neither I nor my party fundamentally objects to the principle. However, we object to the practice of Ministers denying their responsibility and accountability to the elected House of Commons for those agencies. It worries me that Members of Parliament are finding it increasingly difficult to obtain replies from Ministers or access to information.

In addition, the Government and the Conservative party seem to run down and despise public servants and public service. It is perfectly reasonable to set standards for public service and targets which people should attain, but too often the Government imply that people who work in the public sector and public service are inferior to people who work in the private sector and private enterprise. That attitude demoralises people and causes resentment. It makes it more difficult for them to fulfil their role. Interestingly, it alienates former supporters of the Conservative party.

As the hon. Member for Gordon and a campaigner in the Kincardine and Deeside by-election, I can report to the House that the thousands of people in those constituencies who formerly voted Conservative and have defected to the Liberal Democrats should give considerable anxiety to the Conservative party. People do not trust the Government with public services. They no longer believe that the Government can be trusted to maintain standards in education and health.

The Government can say that publishing school league tables and information about the health service reforms are positive improvements, but there is an enormous credibility gap between the Government and voters, who simply do not believe or trust them. The voters have seen that the motivation in the past 12 years has been to introduce commercial practices and competition into public services, thereby undermining the basic public service ethic. People go into public service because they are committed to the community. They are not necessarily motivated by the standards and criteria of the private sector which the Government wish to apply to the public sector.

Mr. Maude: Do the Liberal Democrats oppose the introduction of competition into public services? Do they believe that public service organisations should not submit what they do in fair and open competition with what could be done by others?

Mr. Bruce: I oppose the idea that competition is the answer to delivery of good public services. It is not even relevant to the delivery of all services. Where it is relevant, we support it. We differ from the Government in their belief that only competition can determine the quality of service in the public sector.

The issue that was uppermost in the Kincardine and Deeside by-election was the opt-out of Foresterhill hospital, which also affects my constituency. Foresterhill is the only district general hospital serving the north-east of Scotland and, for some services, the entire north of Scotland. There is no competition and there can be no competition. Indeed, the health board and Ministers have said that there will be no competition, even if the hospital opts out. There is an inherent contradiction in the Government's argument. They say that competition is a good thing, yet they intend to create a free-standing hospital which will operate in a market where there is no market and no one even pretends that there could be competition. That is extremely inconsistent.

People will also look for what improvements in services they can reasonably expect. For example, during the eight years that I have been a Member of Parliament I have been approached by numerous people about no-fault compensation in services such as the NHS and the abolition of Crown immunity. I see nothing in the citizens charter to address those issues, which worry citizens.

Simply improving the delivery of service in the public sector, without providing the necessary resources or enabling facilities, will not create public satisfaction. I am sure that all hon. Members could give examples from their area, but in my local council, Gordon, a thorough review of how employees deal with the public has been carried out since the Liberal Democrats became the lead party in the administration. The council has imposed standards of which the Government would approve. However, it is no consolation to people who go to the housing department to be told politely, quickly, efficiently and courteously that there are no houses available and it is unlikely that there will be any available to meet their demands. That is where the citizens charter will, fundamentally, fall short. People want results and although it may be admirable to make the trains run on time, it did not make Mussolini one of the world's great political leaders. Nor will the Prime Minister's ambition to make Britain a cone-free society make him go down in history as a great Prime Minister.

As I was coming here this morning, I listened to a report of a speech of the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher). She was speaking, extraordinarily, to business men in Tennessee. It may be of great benefit to both the business men of Tenessee and the people of Britain that it is a long way from here. She was speaking against the move towards European political union, which seems to be causing considerable consternation on the Conservative Benches, even to the point of unseemly attempts to vote in committees of which no one had previously heard, in an attempt to alter the balance within the party. The right hon. Lady said that she would resist all further steps to European political union because they would remove the rights of voters in Britain. Two points spring to mind, First, it is extraordinary that the right hon. Lady did not think of that when she introduced the Single European Act in the House of Commons. Secondly, I am not sure that the rights of British citizens are inherently superior to those available to citizens in other member states of the European Community. Indeed, the reverse may be the case. Some of us believe that a move towards closer political union in Europe may help to drag this antiquated political system into the 20th century, never mind the 21st century, and that we may get some of the benefits that citizens in other European countries have, such as freedom of information, a Bill of rights, a democratic voting system and a division of power between central Government and regional and local government. One of the great concerns of the past 12 years has been the concentration of power in the hands of central Government and the inability of Members of Parliament, never mind individual citizens, to call the Government to account or to influence control of direct public policy. I shall illustrate that by reference to the one Department of State with which I must deal regularly, the Scottish Office.

The Scottish Office is the Lord High Everything north of the border. It covers a range of policies which in England and Wales are covered by many different Ministries. English Members can question Ministers on policy almost every day, but Scottish Members can do so only once every four weeks. Even then, we must compete with Englishmen who wander in at the end of Scottish questions, having taken no part in the proceedings, simply to fill up the time and prevent Opposition Members from calling Ministers to account by asking real questions. That is of genuine concern.

Every other Department of State is shadowed by a Select Committee which can cross-examine civil servants and Ministers about the direction and administration of policy. In defiance of the rules of the House, the Government have persistently refused to set up a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs. As a result, the Scottish Office is not effectively accountable either to the people whom it is supposed to serve or to the elected Members of the House who are supposed to call it to account. Those are the types of issues that concern citizens, but the Government fail to address them.

I cite another specific example. British Coal closed Monktonhall colliery. For two and a half years a consortium of local mineworkers has been competing to take over the licence and operate the mine as a free enterprise. They are not looking for public money. The Government have persistently refused to answer any questions about British Coal's conduct and attitude towards the consortium. They have refused all meetings with representatives of the consortium and with Members of Parliament. I understand that two days ago, on the instigation, interestingly, of a Conservative councillor in Lothian, a Minister agreed to meet the consortium.

Those examples show how our lousy, corrupt system works now. The Government are siphoning off their responsibility and refusing to answer questions in the House, yet they are trying to set up a citizens charter as though it were some sort of guarantee. Their record in office is of ducking their responsibility, of not answering questions, of not being called to account and of not being available to elected Members.

Mr. Maude: Does the hon. Gentleman contend, then, that public services can be provided for citizens only through directly employed, bureaucratic, pyramid structures accountable to Ministers through long lines of management? Is he now the only person left in the country and, probably, the world who believes that those means of management remain relevant?

Mr. Bruce: The Minister knows perfectly well that that is not what I am saying. I have made it clear that neither I nor my party objects to the creation of agencies per se. I am complaining about the Government's use of that structure to abdicate their responsibility ultimately to be answerable to the House. It is not a question of the Minister being our direct line from a pyramid; it is that Ministers should accept that they are accountable to Parliament. Increasingly, they are ducking that responsibility.

Members and Select Committees are being treated dismissively and with contempt. The main function of Select Committees now is not to influence policy. The Government take not the slightest account of what they say. Their function is to call evidence in public. The witnessing and publication of that evidence is their most useful service. It is a valuable service, but it falls far short of what they were set up to do in the first place and what in a democratic House of Commons they should be able to do—to influence Government policy and call Ministers effectively to account.

Too often Ministers are engaged in almost nefarious activities. They have furthered their personal careers on the back of their ministerial office and lined their pockets on the basis of the merits that they have gained from their jobs. Yet, we have not been able to call them to account subsequently because they have moved out of the range of accountability.

I shall embellish that point. I notice that Conservatives are keen on talking about the sovereignty of Parliament. Personally, I find that concept rather obscene. I believe that Parliament should serve the people who it represents rather than be their master and that the people should retain the sovereignty. In Scotland we understand that concept.

None the less, the idea is that Parliament should be sovereign. Yet parliamentarians are denied the rights of effective access to information, of getting proper answers and of calling Ministers to account. That is a sign that the sovereignty of Parliament is not a great triumph for democracy but a means of concentrating power in the hands of an establishment that is not effectively accountable—it simply has to control the majority in Parliament and it can ignore the elected representatives of the majority of the people.

Mr. Dicks: Surely the hon. Gentleman's party is desperate to get us under the control of the unelected officials in Europe. That is his party's policy. He speaks with a forked tongue.

Mr. Bruce: That is not our policy. Our policy is to create a democratic Europe, a democratic Britain and, I hope, a democratic Scotland as well. That is fundamentally different. We wish not to put ourselves in the power of the bureaucrats of Europe, but to reform Europe in a truly democratic way. It is the obstinacy of the Conservative party, which is divided and incapable both of representing Britain's national interests and of leading the debate constructively, which is causing concern. This country needs a proper open, modern democracy. It needs a Bill of rights to enable citizens to challenge the Government—the Executive—when it abuses its power and a House of Commons which is genuinely representative of the way in which people vote and which can ensure that policy is directed according to the wishes of the people rather than those of a minority who, because of a distortion, happen to control Parliament at a given time. We need to decentralise power.

The Liberal Democratic party believes that Scottish and Welsh parliaments and regional assemblies would be a good thing not only because they would bring decisions closer to the people, but because they would divide power instead of concentrating it in the hands of the Government in Whitehall.

When the citizens charter was introduced the Government believed that it was the big idea that would temper Thatcherism and secure the present Prime Minister a new mandate. It falls far short of achieving that objective. The citizens charter is a modest gimmick, designed to paper over the cracks of a crumbling and decadent political system. The Conservative party is running away from the fact that it has power and that it has abused that power over the past 12 years and is treating the public with contempt. The public will not be conned any more. Until we have a society with genuine freedom of information, a Bill of rights, decentralisation of decision-making and a fair voting system, we cannot expect that the citizens of this country will have rights. This is not a citizens charter; it is a public service consumers charter. It is high time that the Conservative party recognised that if the citizens of Britain are to be treated as citizens they need rights that the Government have denied them.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): It is most unusual for me to have the opportunity to attend a Friday debate. I cannot remember when I was last able to do so. About this time on a Friday, I am normally busy in my constituency, but when I saw that the Government had decided to spend a day discussing the citizens charter I knew that it was right for me to be here to listen to the Minister and to develop the excellent discussion that has already taken place on this important subject.

I decided to speak partly because I have had many letters from my constituents about the Prime Minister's idea of a citizens charter. The letters welcome and support the idea; above all, they show how the citizens, our constituents, want the ideas that we have already heard about this morning to be developed.

My second reason for contributing to the debate is that I have always taken a great interest in the Audit Commission, which is pivotal to the success of many of the reforms and ideas outlined by my hon. Friend the Minister.

The Opposition parties say that the citizens charter represents some sort of volte face from the changes made in the 1980s. On the contrary, it is a continuation of the theme pursued by the Government in the 1980s, which included the economic reforms, the supply side changes and the extension of competition through privatisation and competitive tendering of which my hon. Friend spoke.

The citizens charter is an authentic continuation of the reforms that we achieved in the 1980s. It will give citizens powers in those services where so far the reforms have had only a partial effect, if any. We have already extended choice and opportunity in education, health and in housing through the right-to-buy legislation. The citizens charter will extend that choice. It captivates our constituents and they look forward to further developments in the charter.

The other politicial parties are as lost on this issue as they were on the reforms of the 1980s. I listened with interest to the rather dyspeptic speech of the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce). On this matter, as on so many others, the Liberals cannot decide where they stand. I read with great interest the recent article on the citizens charter that appeared in The House Magazine by the leader of the Liberal Democrats. At first the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) dismissed the charter by stating that it was

"a rag-bag of policy proposals, many of which were no doubt around in Whitehall in any case and would have surfaced in time."

Later on the right hon. Gentleman changed his mind and said:

"the Prime Minister is tapping into a strain of thinking that is, potentially, extremely powerful."

The right hon. Gentleman is obviously right about that. He also made another point with which we can all agree when he said:

"The country does not want to return to Labour, which speaks more often for the corporate interests of the public sector than for the citizen."

That is the critical point—the Labour party does pot believe in a citizens charter because it is in hock to large power groups.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) has many redeeming features despite being an extremely dangerous left winger. During the week, when I am in London, I stay in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and the citizens charter will have a major effect on a number of areas in it. During the hon. Gentleman's speech we crossed swords briefly about the right to buy and I think that the hon. Gentleman managed to keep a straight face when he spoke about that.

The hon. Gentleman also spoke about the pamphlet published in 1921 by Herbert Morrison. He cited that pamphlet as evidence to prove that the citizens charter was an authentic Labour idea. However, since 1921 I calculate that there have been no fewer than six Labour Governments. Why did they not develop the idea when they had the opportunity? Why has it taken a Conservative Government and Prime Minister to implement ideas that the hon. Gentleman claims were originally proposed by that great former socialist? I cannot dispute that claim because I have never read the pamphlet.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the Post Office. I believe strongly that that service should be opened to the type of competition that my hon. Friend the Minister outlined. There is no reason why the £1 rule should pertain. I believe that that sum should be lowered to 50p as that would allow the private sector—the operators in fringe services—to get involved and to offer a much better service to the consumer. That is what the citizens charter is all about.

The hon. Gentleman was wise to give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) about official secrets. Again, the hon. Gentleman just about managed to keep a straight face——

Mr. Arbuthnot: No, he did not.

Mr. Mitchell: I stand corrected.

Whether one is in opposition or in government makes a tremendous difference to the way in which one reacts to official secrets. I was new to the House when my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) introduced his Bill and I listened to his powerful argument carefully. I did not believe that there was a case, then, for doing what my hon. Friend wanted, and, despite my hon. Friend's powerful argument, I do not believe that that case has advanced since.

Mr. Chris Smith: I have considerable respect for the hon. Gentleman, but in one respect he is confusing official secrets and freedom of information. We need reform on both counts. Secondly, although we understand that traditionally Governments of any political colour have been reluctant to undertake freedom of information legislation, we are determined, when we are in government next year, to ensure that a freedom of information measure is put through the House.

Mr. Mitchell In the unlikely event of Labour being in power, we shall see whether such legislation is introduced in the way that the hon. Gentleman suggests. I remind him, to answer the first part of his intervention, that reform has already taken place. The Minister who introduced the Official Secrets Act 1989, when he was Home Secretary —he is now Foreign Secretary—could hardly be painted an anti-liberal right-wing member of the Government. It is generally accepted in the House that he is a reasonable person, and he piloted that measure through.

Mr. Chris Smith: The hon. Gentleman reveals his misunderstanding of the issue. I accept that the official secrets legislation was reformed, but that Act, designed supposedly to reform the legislation, was deeply inadequate. It removed a few items from the list of official secrets, but put a stronger fence around those it preserved. The hon. Gentleman is falling into the trap; simply because the Government introduce legislation that purports to reform the official secrets or freedom of information laws, or anything else, does not mean that such reform is achieved.

Mr. Mitchell: While I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman's main point, I appreciate what he says about the difference between freedom of information and official secrets, and I shall explain the way in which the citizens charter does a great deal to assist the extending of freedom of information with the releasing of information that should rightly be in the public domain.

Opposition Members are impaled on a dilemma, because they cannot make up their minds whether to belittle the idea of a citizens charter or claim it for their own. We are intent on empowering individuals to get better and more accountable services and to enable them to seek and win redress. It is to enhance the right of the individual that we address the charter and Opposition Members have not dealt with that aspect of it.

The Minister praised East Midlands Electricity, which has its headquarters in my constituency, for having set up a fixed appointments and times system which provides compensation if times are not adhered to. I echo his comments about the work done by John Harris, the chairman of that company, which was the first of the distribution companies to have such a scheme. It is a great credit to him and East Midlands Electricity. By establishing those standards, the company has set an example to the other electricity companies which I hope will be widely followed.

The Minister also mentioned that benefit centres and jobcentres were increasingly being amalgamated to provide a better service for our constituents. I echo his remarks. I recently opened the new combined centre in Netherfield in my constituency. It is doing an excellent job for my constituents in one of the poorer areas that I represent and he is right to say that that reform has had a significant impact on the ease with which people can use the service and the effectiveness of it.

Although I see some movement among Labour Members in respecting the work of the Audit Commission, I hope that they will think carefully about their quality commission proposals and in particular about their plans to neuter the Audit Commission by filling it with people who are public sector oriented or who have come directly from the public sector. Nothing would more effectively destroy the work of the Audit Commission, which has proved to be one of the most effective reforms of the machinery of government to be introduced in the last eight years. It has managed to tackle a central issue that should concern us. Although we are all obsessed with the amount of money that goes into public services, and are quick to seize upon inputs and to note the extent to which Government funding has or has not increased, we are much less able to monitor whether that money is spent effectively, the quality of that spending and the realities of the output from that spending. The Audit Commission has successfully addressed those issues.

The commission's value-for-money studies into improving existing services or releasing funds to be deployed in providing other, more valuable services are immensely important. I salute the skill and expertise of the commission's controller, Howard Davies, and of his predecessor, John Banham, who both made significant progress in achieving greater accountability from the public sector. If the citizens charter builds and expands on the work of the Audit Commission in the way that it should, it will be all the more successful.

Every year, the commission identifies where huge savings can be made. It has achieved savings of nearly £1 billion, which is a remarkable success. It lives up to its reputation as the enemy of waste and inefficiency and the best friend of the taxpayer. I hope that it will be used extensively in relation to the charter.

Mr. Summerson: Does my hon. Friend agree that Labour wants to abolish the Audit Commission because it fears that the commission will continue to expose inefficiency and uselessness in local authorities, and particularly those that are Labour controlled?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend puts his finger on an important point. Labour's quality commission would neutralise the effect of the Audit Commission. Because Labour is in hock to the public sector trade unions, who are its paymasters, its proposed commission could not function effectively or defend service quality for the citizen.

The work of the Audit Commission will be extremely important in four areas. There has been a huge increase in the resources that the Government have made available to the police, but many of us wonder to what extent they are used efficiently. I am pleased that the commission has been deployed in the police service, though not as yet in the Metropolitan police.

There is a strong argument for allowing the commission to do for the Metropolitan police what it does for every other force in the country, in demonstrating how efficient or inefficient the police services are, and what can be done to improve them.

That is very much a matter for the citizens charter. The four areas of police work perceived by the public as being of most importance would probably trip off our constituents' tongues. They are the response time to 999 and other calls, crime clear-up rates, the number of police on the street and their effective deployment, and control and management of parking.

The latter is a complex issue, because it concerns not only the number of parking tickets issued by the police and related services but enforcement, and whether the situation in a particular area is improving.

Those aspects are all of great importance to our constituents and we must devise ways of making the police even more efficient in dealing with those and other matters. Disparities exist throughout the country.

Considerable strides are being made. The inspectorate of constabularies has done a good job in developing a matrix of 450 indicators of police performance. Under the terms of the Local Government Bill the citizen will, for the first time, be able to compare police performance in different forces. The Audit Commission is considering how to produce comparative figures to enable the public to see how the police are performing. It is clearly important that the Audit Commission, not the inspectorate of constabularies, should be responsible for producing the comparative analysis of forces by the same logic that led to the provider-purchaser split that we have implemented in so many other public service sectors.

The key issue is that the Government have made great strides in the way that they monitor and supervise public services, but there has been less emphasis in the past on doing so in a way that citizens can easily understand. That is what the citizens charter is about; it shows citizens that the police service in their district is doing well in objective terms in some respects and perhaps not so well in others in comparison with other forces. The charter enables citizens to question and to see for themselves how services can be improved and how those improvements can be made.

The charter provides the opportunity to breathe new life into local government and help to rebuild local democracy in a number of sectors, including housing management. One need only consider the speech that the Secretary of State for the Environment made this week after visiting North Tyneside and seeing what was happening there. The charter will enable us to highlight those councils that manage housing stock badly and to see how long houses are left unoccupied and unrepaired. There are huge variations in housing management throughout the different authorities. I believe that in one metropolitan district, 9 per cent. of its accommodation stock was left empty, while in another comparable district, the figure was only 1 per cent. There are wide variations between the best housing authorities and the worst.

Housing management is important to many of our constituents. The Audit Commission recommend that out of London, a three-week period for repairs and for houses to be empty is probably long enough and, in London, a period of six weeks. But half of all local authorities cannot meet those reasonable limits. Citizens living in local authorities where they have to endure such housing conditions, need to know why their authorities perform less well than neighbouring ones, and the Bill will enable direct comparisons to be made.

Originally, the inclusion of the performance of the refuse services in the citizens charter was pooh-poohed as a subject that was beneath Parliament, which should not concern itself with such a matter. That is far from the truth; citizens want the best possible refuse collection as much as they want the best of any other service. The issue of "missed bins" an important one, and nothing is more infuriating to a constituent. The Bill will allow league tables of the effectiveness of refuse collection to be published.

The Litter Act 1983 was a great success and introduced many new techniques for monitoring litter and preventing it spreading. Nothing incenses our constituents more than litter and graffiti in the local environment. Some local authorities have introduced photographic monitoring. I think that the Local Government Chronicle was originally doubtful about whether the Litter Act would be successful. But only last week it made it clear in an article that it believes that it does work and is effective.

It is right that the citizens charter should cover environmental health departments and consider how often such departments in one district carry out inspections, what impact they have and how those services compare with those of neighbouring districts. As a Member of Parliament, I am conscious of the steep increase in citizens' complaints about noise and smells. There is a disparity in the way in which environmental health departments in different areas perform and we need to ensure that all perform at the standard of the best.

The effect of all these changes will be to breathe new life into local government and local democracy. They will ensure not only better service for the citizen but greater accountability, and far better morale in local government because the providers will be able to see how they are doing and take great pride in their success when they are doing well. Some services will always be in the public sector and we support those services. We want them to be truly excellent and we want to establish how they can be improved. There is no reason why those services should not have their standards set and their achievements published, and the role of the Audit Commission in that will be pivotal.

My third point concerns the health service and the patients charter. The monitoring needs to be very robust and, in the interests of public credibility, we must ensure that there is external scrutiny. I was slightly surprised to see, on page 19 of the copy of the patients charter that was put through my door, that complaints should be made to Duncan Nichol, the chief executive of the health service. That is all right as far as it goes, but the public need to be able to complain to a non-health service person who can adjudicate fairly—otherwise, I fear that they will not feel that they are receiving an impartial hearing.

Mr. Tony Banks: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could help me. I thought that Duncan Nichol was leaving his post as chief executive of the health service in June.

Mr. Mitchell: I cannot help the hon. Gentleman on the departure of Duncan Nichol or on its date, but I can help him on the point that I sought to make. It is all right complaining under the charter to the person who runs the service about which one is complaining as long as there is a further port of call—a further person to whom one can complain.

There are wide discrepancies in the service that patients in different areas receive. The conclusion of a deep and extensive report on day-care surgery published a year ago by the Audit Commission was that waiting lists for day-care surgery could be cut by a third through the more efficient use of such surgery. In other words, if every health authority performed as well as the best in this important respect, there would be an immense increase in the amount of day-care surgery that could be undertaken. The Audit Commission focused on the 20 most common operations, which account for about 30 per cent. of all surgery conducted, and came up with a most impressive figure. If all the health authorities performed at the same rate as the top 25 per cent., an additional 186,000 patients could be treated at no extra cost. That will be a great prize if we can achieve it.

The parents charter will enhance parental choice and strengthen parents' rights and it will make far more information available to help parents to exercise those rights. They will receive written reports annually and their children's schools will be inspected every four years. Many of us may wonder why it has taken so long to achieve the last two objectives, but I am delighted that the proposal is now to go ahead. A number of my hon. Friends and I introduced a Bill earlier this year to oblige all schools to publish their public examination results in common form. Unfortunately, the Bill was vetoed by a Labour Whip although, since then, I note that, in The Guardian, the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), who speaks for the Labour party on education, said:

"Let a thousand league-tables bloom."

In the light of that, I am not clear where the Labour party will stand on this aspect of the Bill when we debate its Second Reading next Tuesday.

This is an important change and I am glad that we have got away from the odious and patronising attitude of so many local education authorities—particularly Labour local education authorities—that say that one cannot trust parents with objective information about how their children's schools are doing. The charter is a great step forward and the publication of objective results will be immensely valuable in increasing choice and improving standards. When the Prime Minister said in Blackpool recently that the trendy liberals in education hundreds of thousands of parents all over the country let out a huge sigh of relief. That aspect of the parents charter will do a great deal to help. Parents do not want trendy socio-economic arguments about why their school is not as good as another. They want the best for their children and an assurance that the school will improve its perforance and give their children better opportunities.

"have had their say and . . . had their day"

We have made good progress on education. The pay review body with its commitment to performance-related pay is immensely important. There have been large funding increases for education, not least most recently in the autumn statement. Perhaps we could all agree that it is not only a question of money. I was interested to read that in Japan half of all 16-year-olds reach a standard in maths which is reached by only 2 per cent. of children of an equivalent age in Britain. Yet the Japanese spend less per head on education that we do. I hope that the education measures that are enshrined in the citizens charter will do a great deal to improve standards for our children.

It is a pity that there are not more hon. Members here to take part in the debate. The charter is immensely important and will be greatly welcomed by our constituents. In the 1980s much was achieved in the economy and many essential and fundamental changes had to be made after the IMF was called in in the late 1970s when Labour was in power. I am sure that the citizens charter is the big idea for the 1990s. It will improve public services to the point of excellence, restore the morale of the people who deliver them and make them more efficient and capable of delivering good service to our constituents.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I welcome the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) to the Friday crowd. He will have noticed, as have those of us who are Friday habitués, that the Benches are sparsely populated. Perhaps performance-related pay for hon. Members could be debated by those of us who are here on Fridays for important debates such as this. Perhaps the 10 hon. Members who are in the Chamber could receive the pay of the other 640. That would be a nice little earner for us.

The hon. Gentleman does not have to worry about the normal courtesy of staying to listen to the next speaker. No doubt, in his constituency office and at his surgery at this very moment, impatient constituents are waving their charters and working out the waiting time that they have to put in while the hon. Gentleman is in London delivering a good speech. If the hon. Gentleman wants to be on his way, I would not wish to delay him for a moment.

I have always found it a great advantage to loathe my political opponents. It is not usually difficult, but the Prime Minister is certainly not one of those that I loathe. How could I? We both grew up in Brixton, we both support Chelsea and, oblivious of each other's existence, we travelled on the No. 45 bus from Brixton to Stamford bridge on Saturdays. We both support Surrey and watched the team through that glorious period when Surrey won the county championship six years in succession. We both served as Lambeth councillors. We both like beans on toast, although I like mine with liberal lashings of Worcester sauce, which I expect is far too exotic for the Prime Minister.

Where on this conjoined road of shared experiences did the Prime Minister go so badly wrong and become a Tory? I think that it was when he got turned down for the job of a bus conductor. He had set his heart on punching tickets and helping little old ladies on and off the bus, but he was spurned. At that point, he vowed hideous revenge on us all, but to be able to get it, he first had to push a little old lady from Finchley off the bus. Having achieved that, he has now turned his attention to the rest of us.

Our fate is to be even more horrible than to be frogmarched out of Downing street. We are to be buried alive under charters. I thought that the charter was just one document, and that after the press conference and the photographs it would go away. That does not appear to be the case, because there are more charters in store.

Mr. Dicks: Are not there fewer pages in our charter than there were in "Meet the Challenge: Make the Change", the document produced by the Labour party?

Mr. Banks: I have never actually read that document, but it was far too long. Its very length was designed to put off the rank and file member from reading it. It achieved its objective in my case.

I tried to ask the Prime Minister, in a parliamentary question, to give details of the additional charters in the various service areas which arise directly from his own citizens charter and to say when each of the new charters would be published. I should have thought that, in the new found spirit of glasnost in the Tory Government, with public officials being required to give direct answers, the Prime Minister would hasten to give me a reply. It was:

"I am asking the Table Office to make the necessary transfer arrangements to the Chancellor of the Exchequer."

The first offer that the Prime Minister gets to say something about his charter he shuffles the buck off to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Did I expect anything better of the Chancellor? I did not. I was right, as the answer was that I should get a reply "as soon as possible". I cannot even find out how many charters will flow from the original one.

Mr. Arbuthnot: Only two Fridays ago, the hon. Gentleman was berating Conservative Members for not having read "Meet the Challenge. Make the Change". When I said that I had read it, the hon. Gentleman said that he had also read it. May I now tear up my copy?

Mr. Banks: The hon. Gentleman must know that I am a liar. In those circumstances, if he believes that, he will believe anything. It is more important that Conservative Members read Labour party policy documents, because they might learn something. I do not have a great deal to learn from such policy documents.

If one reads the citizens charter, one realises that it will spawn more charters than the hydra could grow heads. I understand that we shall have charters for patients, tenants, parents and the taxpayer, charters to cover British Rail and London Underground, the post office, social security benefits agency, the police, local authorities—the list goes on. We shall have government by charter. I can imagine the Prime Minister responding to every new idea in Cabinet with the comment, "That's a most agreeable suggestion. Let's have a charter on it." He will inundate us with charters—and all because London Transport turned him down for a job.

We shall have charters to cover all manner of groups, but none to cover the Government—a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) from the Opposition Front Bench. There is no charter to give voters the right to claim compensation from the Government when they have pursued policies that have created unemployment, homelessness, high interest rates, social injustice and economic incompetence. There is no charter provision for a general election so that the people can have their say at the ballot box at a set time, rather than having to hang on until the Government can find the most appropriate time to make a rush to the polls.

The citizens charter is nothing more than a glossy confection. It is an epitaph to the accumulated failures of 12 years of Tory government. Having systematically run down and denigrated public services since 1979, they now expect the country to be grateful for being offered lower standards of service than we used to enjoy, and ones that are derisory in the light of what is enjoyed in many other European countries.

I shall take two examples of that and apply them to London. The first is housing. There were 37,240 households accepted as homeless by London councils last year—a rise of 12 per cent. on the previous year. There were 33,432 households in bed-and-breakfast accommodation, hostels and other temporary homes—an increase of 31 per cent. over the previous year. The comparable figure in 1979 was 2,750. Over 60,000 Londoners are more than three months in arrears with their mortgage repayments. For council tenants, London rents have more than trebled between 1979 and 1989. For example, in Conservative Ealing, tenants have had to face a 100 per cent. increase in their council rents since January this year.

We have people living rough in cardboard boxes in doorways in the streets of London. There is no local authority provision for young people who are homeless —that should be written into a charter. I hear young people ask why they cannot find homes. One of the reasons for their homelessness is that the Prime Minister, when he had ministerial responsibility for social security, changed the rules and regulations. The young people who sleep rough in the streets of London have the Prime Minister to thank for having only £31 a week income support. We all know that £31 buys next to nothing in London now.

Homelessness has more than doubled in London in the past decade. In 1979, London local authorities started more than 9,000 new homes in the capital. This year there were 363 starts, the fewest since the second world war. That has come about because of Government policies.

Capital spending by London councils fell by 85 per cent. between 1979-80 and 1989-90. The allocation for London in the current financial year 1991-92 has been cut by a further 8 per cent. This Conservative Government are spending £6 billion less on provision for housing than was provided in 1979. It is not necessary to have a doctorate in housing management to understand why there is a homelessness crisis in London and throughout the country: the answer lies with Government policies. The homeless and the badly housed of the capital do not want glossy charters waved under their noses. They want homes, but they will not get them until a Labour Government are elected.

The citizens charter brims with transport issues. I remind the House that traffic speeds in central London have fallen to 10 mph, which is no more than the speed of a horse and cart at the turn of the century. The Confederation of British Industry estimates that congestion costs its members in commerce and industry in London and the south-east £10 billion a year.

London passengers pay the highest charges in fares per mile for bus, tube and rail travel in the whole of the European Community. Indeed, they pay double the average fare in other European cities. Since London Transport was taken away from the Greater London council, fares have increased by 25 per cent. on average in real terms. Some fares have increased by much more. The fare for a short-hop bus journey in central London has increased by 61 per cent. since 1984.

Worse is to come: the Government are now demanding that Network SouthEast should break even and that London Underground should become operationally profitable by 1992-93. That is something which no other network in Europe has been made to do. The result is that jobs are being cut and the quality of service is being reduced.

The Government plan to deregulate London's bus routes. We say that that will leave the service in chaos and threaten the future of the travelcard. It must be obvious to anyone who has any understanding of how a city works that an inefficient transport system means an inefficient city. That is bad for residents, business and visitors.

It is no consolation to those who sit in traffic jams or on stations, or who are stuck in carriages in tunnels, to be told that they can use the time to read the various charters that are being printed by central Government. It is an absurdity.

I shall examine a couple of the transport issues within the charter in terms of the undertakings that are on offer. For all those who have their charters easily to hand, I refer to page 17 and punctuality on British Rail. We are told:

"92 per cent of trains are to arrive within five minutes of the published time all day (88 per cent. in the morning and evening peak)".

An individual passenger does not, of course, travel on 92 per cent. of all trains. He or she travels 100 per cent. on one train. It is no consolation to that one passenger to find that the train on which he or she is travelling 100 per cent. is late. It is no consolation to anyone to be told, "Don't worry, because 92 per cent. of all other trains are running on time today."

The next heading is "Reliability". We are told:

"99 per cent of trains should be run".

I say amen to that, but why 99 per cent? It seems rather a strange figure to choose. When we think about it, it is not far off 100 per cent. Surely 99 per cent. sounds like the election turnout in the old-style Nicolae Ceausescu elections in Romania. We know that that did not make a great deal of sense either. What does it mean? I hope that the Minister will deal with that because I, for one, am rather confused.

The charter says:

"100 per cent. of trains should be cleaned inside and out every day."

They certainly should be. I hope that extra staff will be taken on to pick up all the charters that were flung on the floor in anger and frustration by the travellers sitting on the train that was not one of the 92 per cent. that arrived on time that day.

On waiting time at booking offices, the charter says: "passengers should not wait for more than three minutes (five minutes in the peak)."

That sounds fairly straightforward, but on the next page —page 18 for those who are following this—it says of London Underground:

"no more than 2 per cent. of passengers will wait more than three minutes for their tickets."

Hon. Members should try to imagine that. If someone is standing in a queue, how on earth is he to work out whether he is part of the 2 per cent. of passengers who have waited more than three minutes for their tickets? It is a recipe for chaos. If I were standing in a queue at Stratford station, waiting for a ticket, once I had worked that I was actually within that 2 per cent. of people, I would push myself to the front, wave my copy of John Major's charter and insist on having my ticket, now. I would get my face filled in, and I would no doubt deserve it. My teeth would be knocked out.

What would happen to me then? As it happens, the charter is quite useful. Page 12 provides a dentists charter. It says:

"Dentists' patients are entitled to clear information . . . All patients are now entitled to a treatment plan setting out what is proposed."

Does that mean that if I can get into the dentist's waiting room, minus my front teeth that I have lost trying to enforce another part of the charter, I will have preferential treatment from the dentist? That should be included in the charter, because it is clear that there is an awful lot of trouble ahead for people who try to implement the various statements in the charter.

I refer once again to page 18, and the question of reliability on the London Underground. It says:

"no more than 7 per cent. of passengers will wait more than one and a half times the scheduled interval."

That is a useful piece of information to have when one is sitting on the station in the rush hour wondering why the train has not turned up. How on earth do we work it out? Someone would have to be another Einstein to work out whether he had had a rum deal on the charter. It is certainly well beyond the capability of someone with three GCSEs at O-level.

I welcome notices in post offices about waiting time. On pension day, the post office in Forest Gate resembles a Moscow bread queue. I warn the Government that the charters on waiting times—in so far as anyone can understand them—are a prescription for public disorder. On railway stations, in DSS offices and in post offices, enraged individuals clutching their copy of Major's charter will quote abstract calculations about waiting times. It will be sheer chaos. What consolation will they have? It will be the consolation provided in the charter that those who are injured will have to wait for only two years for treatment in hospital.

The charters will not build homes, they will not provide jobs, they will not cut waiting lists at hospitals, and they will not get the trains running on time. Without adequate resources invested in public services, there is no real choice for the citizens of London or, indeed, throughout the country.

A Labour Government will make a genuine commitment to public services. The sooner a Labour Government are elected, the sooner we will get public services operating in the way they should. The sooner a Labour Government are elected, the sooner the Prime Minister can fulfil his lifetime ambition of becoming a bus conductor. One of the promises that the Labour Front Bench has made is that, when we are back in government, we will restore bus conductors to our London buses. That should encourage even the Prime Minister to vote for us.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): It is almost impossible to follow the speech of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). Perhaps he should consider applying for the job as manager of the England football team, who at the moment is cornered between two stools. He does not know whether to opt for style or to wellie the ball up field. We know that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West has style and does not wellie. It is a great pleasure to follow him in this debate.

I disagree with the hon. Member for Newham, North-West in some respects about the citizens charter. It is essential to lay down exactly what we would like to happen in public services. He said that things would not happen, but I believe that they will although it will take some time. The parameters and approaches in the charter will be effective.

I am a great believer in considering rights and responsibilities side by side. They are two sides of the same coin. Too often we hear, especially from Opposition Members, about rights for these people and rights for those people, but they rarely speak about the responsibility that accompanies those rights. The public have a right and it is the responsibility of public services to respond to that right. The charter begins to follow that course in a definite manner.

The charter refers to standards of service and the choice within and between services. It aims to open up to public scrutiny what is happening in local authorities and other public areas. It refers also to value-for-money tests.

I apologise to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury because I missed the beginning of his speech. I was talking about the citizens charter on television in relation to British Rail. I am appalled at the service that BR provides. It is one of the most inefficient services and its nearest rival is London Regional Transport.

I want to clarify a point that I made in an intervention on my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris). Over the past 12 years, £12 billion of Government funding has been allocated to British Rail. It has received an additional £1·5 billion this year and £2 billion is laid aside for next year. It seems to be small-minded for Bob Reid to carp about investment when his organisation has had that kind of money to play with. His predecessor with the same name appeared before the Select Committee on Transport a couple of years ago and claimed that money was not a major issue in relation to improving the rail service.

Reference has been made to time-keeping and the hon. Member for Newham, North-West mentioned the 92 per cent. objective. It is nonsense to say that a train arrives on time if it is less than 10 minutes late. Either a train arrives on time or it is late. If I do not arrive at the Door of the Chamber before 2.25 pm on a day when there is Government business, I am too late to attend Prayers. I cannot turn to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, or to Mr. Speaker, and say, "Please, I was three minutes late, but technically that's on time." You would laugh at me, Madam Deputy Speaker, and rightly so. I cannot see how we can speak in those terms and make a meaningful contribution to what the commuter and traveller expects.

I hope that I can begin to rival the hon. Member for Newham, North-West when I refer to rolling stock. Perhaps the Opposition Whip will excuse me if I refer to the 158 train and an issue that is close to his heart and his area. I have redubbed the 158 train the 175. It was ordered by British Rail through British Rail Engineering Ltd. when it was still nationalised. That 18-month contract was delivered last October 18 months late with 175 faults. For example, the brakes did not work when it snowed. The two carriages that were linked together came unstuck when the train moved. The main shaft beneath the train came apart. A pump fell off and was found at 4.30 am on the Forth bridge. The toilets did not work and the seats wore out almost as soon as one sat on them. The tables in the carriages worked loose and allowed coffee to sink in because they were made of the wrong material.

I expect that a little deal will be done between ScotRail and BREL to smooth things over and fudge the issue of compensation. As a member of the Transport Select Committee, I promise the House that I will not allow that to happen. That is the kind of nonsense that is going on. As a result of those stupid arrangements and that chaos, commuters in Scotland are suffering. Had it not been for the efficiency of ScotRail's maintenance team in Scotland, passengers would have had no trains to ride on. The commuter is suffering from the incompetence of those ordering the equipment and the people building it and we must do something about it. Perhaps, in a small way, the citizens charter has a role in achieving that end. When one speaks to the railway people they play it down and say, "Those are just teething problems". But it was a hands, arms and lungs job. It was a transplant job.

I remind the hon. Member for Newham, North-West of the point that I made earlier. For the three years from 1987 to 1989, London Transport underspent its capital allocation by £120 million. When I raised that with Mr. Newton recently in the Select Committee, he said, "Don't let's talk about the past." But in his beautiful multicoloured brochure, which cost a fortune to produce, he complained about lack of investment and said that it was the Government's fault that the underground service was not running properly. He deliberately ommitted the fact that he had underspent.

I do not have to tell the House about docklands light rail. It is one of the most inefficient operations that it has been my misfortune, or the misfortune of any London Member, to know about. If ever there was an area which needed an efficient transport system, it was docklands, especially with the City airport nearby. Yet the service has been abysmal from start to finish. Mr. Newton and his team have the audacity to complain about the Government's rightly deciding that London Transport is no longer competent to operate the service and taking the service away from it. In doing that, the Government have jumped ahead of the citizens charter. On behalf of the citizens, they have recognised a mistake and rectified it.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): My hon. Friend is covering the problems of transport in London. Most of my constituents commute into London and they, too, face problems on a daily basis. It is not simply leaves on the line, the wrong trains or all the rest of it. British Rail simply does not do the obvious things well. Does my hon. Friend agree that the citizens charter will assist commuters and show them how they can put pressure on British Rail, which for decades has ignored passengers in the interests of those who work for it? Let us have performance-related pay and get the staff working for the passengers. Then we might see a difference in attitude in favour of our constituents.

Mr. Dicks: My hon. Friend's point about the problems facing commuters from outside London is well made.

Last week, the chairman of British Rail went to meet the passengers of British Rail, whom he is supposed to serve. He had to take a minder with him because he was fearful of their reaction. That is ludicrous. If ever there were a case for saying, "I have failed. It is a waste of time because I have a great big chap beside me to thump you if you even speak aggressively to me," that is it. If that is not a resignation matter, I do not know what is.

The Southend to Fenchurch Street line is chaos. If Bob Reid was paid according to results he would be paying the commuter and taxpayer rather than taking money from them to meet his salary. My hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) is right. The level of service in London is bad enough, not least because there is no cohesion between British Rail and London Transport. Nevertheless, it is just as bad, if not worse, in some places outside London.

The management of London Transport is ineffective and poor. Most of the time, it simply does not know whether it is Christmas, Easter or Shrove Tuesday. I have gone on record before saying that it could be no worse if we took the cleaners from Oxford Circus station, put them into management jobs on London Transport and put the managers to cleaning the station. We would probably find that the station was cleaned less well than before.

London Transport told the Select Committee that one reason why it increased fares was to keep people off the underground. In the next breath, it said that it did not have enough income. It does not persuade people to use the service, thereby improving the quality of the environment by reducing the chaos on the roads, to which the hon. Member for Newham, North-West referred. That is what it is there to do, yet it simply increases the prices to keep people off the underground.

I wish to refer to one aspect of the involvement of public sector trade unions. At a recent meeting of the Select Committee, I asked why travelcards could not be bought by members of the public in newsagents adjacent to stations. People go in to buy their newspapers, cigarettes and other odds and sods, so one would have thought that it was a logical plan for them to pick up their travelcards. I was told that London Transport does not allow that to happen and people have to buy their ticket at the booking office because the trade unions are worried about jobs. The unions view the sale of travelcards in nearby shops as a threat to jobs on the underground and in British Rail.

If that is the sort of narrow-minded approach that trade unions are taking and that London Underground and British Rail are accepting, what are we to think? Why should not a passenger have the right to buy a travelcard in the most convenient place? Again to use the example of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West—I am sorry to keep referring to him—the passenger would not have to join that queue and be in danger of having his teeth knocked out if he was allowed to buy his travelcard in the local newsagent. That might reduce the queue at the booking office.

Mr. Tony Banks: Surely the hon. Gentleman understands that we cannot expect people to vote to have their jobs liquidated. We have noticed that when the pressure is on, British Rail and London Underground reduce the level of station staffing, ticket staffing or ticket collecting, all of which result in fewer people being around to give the personal service that the travelling passenger wants. The hon. Gentleman knows a great deal about airlines. They do not run on the principle of one-person-operated jets. It is not suggested that the pilot should greet passengers as they climb the stairs, sit them down, give them a drink and then say, "Hang on. I've got to go and take the plane off now". The airlines operate with more staff, but the underground always operates with fewer. It does not make any sense.

Mr. Dicks: I could not agree more with the hon. Gentleman. He is absolutely right. I should like to see conductors back on buses. People do not realise that the one-man-operated buses cause traffic chaos. I have often made that case elsewhere.

I also agree with the hon. Gentleman that there should be an integrated traffic system for London. We cannot talk about the underground separately from BR, the buses and the cabs. Anybody who tries to is making a mistake. However, we must understand that we are where we are because of what has happened in the past. We cannot change all that now. I hope that the pressure created by the citizens charter will lead people to believe that we should proceed in a more organised and less chaotic way.

Recently there was a crazy report about a British Rail porter standing outside a gents toilet on a station to allow ladies to go in first and then gents because only one loo was working. That is amazing. We need good, better-paid staff on the underground, British Rail and everywhere else, but they must be effective. They must represent value for money. We cannot get away from that concept. We cannot have the place flooded with people sitting round drinking tea. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we need more people to care for customers' needs.

Among all my criticisms of British Rail I make one plea: please make sure that the person who speaks into the tannoy can be understood. Nothing is worse than hearing, "Wah, wah, wah, wah." Everybody asks which station is meant and the next announcement is, "Wah, wah, wah, wah." I do not understand why somebody does not stand there, as the commuter has to, find out what is wrong and put it right.

Mr. Arbuthnot: I wonder whether my hon. Friend might care to translate what he has just said for the benefit of the Hansard reporters?

Mr. Dicks: That is difficult, but I think that there should be exclamation marks and four little dots. Perhaps the Australian expression of XXXX might be appropriate.

The citizens charter has a part to play in Europe. I do not agree with the Opposition that Europe is better at meeting consumer needs than we are. Perhaps when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister goes to Maastricht he could suggest that the many benefits of the citizens charter are considered by his European colleagues for development in Europe. From Germany to Greece and France to Portugal there are weaknesses in all aspects of consumer choice and in the utilisation of services. My right hon. Friend should say that we need a citizens charter to put right what has gone wrong—of course, the changes will have to be made over time—and that Europeans can learn from us.

I noticed that when the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) started to speak there was a good attendance in the Press Gallery, but within a second of his standing up, the press had all gone. Perhaps because I followed him, they have stayed away.

The hon. Member for Gordon spoke about rights to elections and democracy, but his party did not complain at the turn of the century, when the Liberal party was the party of power. We never heard anything about proportional representation then. Many Labour Members do not want proportional representation because they see that the way in which we organise things is conducive to good, strong, sound government. We need only look across Europe to see the mixture of ways of electing representatives—a mishmash of different political views and parties.

Perhaps the Labour party has changed its mind and is now in favour of Europe because Labour Members see Europe as a socialist area in which to get closely involved. They see that the European Parliament and other organisations are basically alliances of the centre left—there are very few alliances of the centre right and those which exist are small. Perhaps that is one reason for the Labour party's conversion.

As for the Labour party's plans, criticism would be expected, would it not? I do not believe that the interpretation of history suggested by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) is correct. The Labour party says that it will try to do something, but that it cannot promise. We say that we promise to do something and we shall do it.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned perception. I shall illustrate one aspect of perception. The shadow health spokesman said in April that the underfunding of the national health service could be put right with £3 billion spread over five years, if economic growth made that money available. Yet the Government have put in £2 billion every year for three years—that is £6 billion in all. I cannot understand why people do not realise that the certainty of £6 billion over three years is better than the possibility of £3 billion over five years. That is an aspect of perception. We may be at fault for not having made the position clear, but it is a matter of simple arithmetic. If the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) is not capable of working out that a possible £3 billion over five years is far worse than the certainty of £6 billion over three years, he needs a lesson in mathematics. We can guarantee that under the citizens charter he will be tested and his place in the table will be shown to everyone.

The citizens charter is a good move. It is the right start, but it will take some time. The people of this country have been looking for it for some time. Commuters are saying, "Thank God that people care about the situation" and they see that, despite the odd anomalies mentioned by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West, there is now a chance to get things done. The Government are moving away from the bureaucratic, "It's nothing to do with me, Jack" attitude and we are going to do something about the problems. I commend the citizens charter to the House and to the people of this country.

1.2 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): The speech of the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) was mainly a blast against British Rail. As a former railway clerk, I feel rather defensive about British Rail. Members of Parliament tend to look back at the time before they entered the House—the time when they actually did some work—and they like to tell everybody about the significance of the areas in which they worked.

I spent many happy hours in the parcels office at Sunderland station breathing in the fumes coming up from the line below, so I look back to those days. One thing that I can say for British Rail is that it is infinitely superior to the Iraqi state railway. When I did my national service I was in rail transport and worked with the Iraqi state railway. Its trains were never on time—nowhere near the time record achieved by British Rail.

Mr. Tony Banks: They are much worse now.

Mr. Barnes: Yes, unfortunately they are in a terrible state, as are the Iraqi people, because of the Gulf war.

One aspect concerning British Rail that I would hope to see in a charter involves a gripe of my own. On the east Midlands line if a second class coach has to be taken off the train the coach for smokers is invariably chosen, so smokers with second class tickets have nowhere to go. I am not a smoker, but such citizens have a right to smoke if they wish. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) spoke about various charters being published for all kinds of things, so, who knows, we may require a charter for smokers.

It is not just the Government who produce charters. Charter 88 is a serious one which calls for a Bill of rights, proportional representation and other constitutional reforms. That charter apes perhaps the most important charter to be published, the people's charter of the 1830s and 1840s, which argued for the extension of the franchise. Although that charter was of crucial constitutional importance, the preamble referred to economic and social conditions and that helped to gain it support. In the 19th century, people believed that once they had the vote they would be able to use it for social and economic purposes. That can be done.

Another charter of great significance is the European social charter. Some of that charter may appear general and bland, but it contains a set of social affairs principles that are infinitely superior to anything in our citizens charter. The citizens charter has been produced by the same Government who block the development of the social charter. That charter calls for decent wages and equal treatment for people who take up jobs under contract in other countries, a decent general wage, vocational training and rights for disabled people. It would be far more significant and important if such measures were contained in the citizens charter.

The Labour party has also issued a charter, the citizen's charter, which was produced prior to the Government's charter. The Minister referred to our charter, which provides for consumer and citizen rights. Such rights do not figure much in the Government document.

Mr. Dicks: May I ask the hon. Gentleman to excuse me, but I must leave for a constituency engagement? I should not like the hon. Gentleman to think that I was being rude by leaving before the end of his speech.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you.

The Government's charter is a peculiar measure. It is like a collection of dead dogs' limbs put together in a bag and recycled to try to make them appealing to the public. The packaging of this document has also been peculiar. It first appeared as a White Paper—it now seems that, from now on, any White Paper will be called a charter. That White Paper has a red cover, which was thought to be a jolly good joke, because it is supposed to pinch something from the socialist tradition. It seems that the Conservatives want to take that colour. The very title of the Government document is similar to, and is pinched from, the people's charter of the 19th century and the word "citizens" brings to mind the French revolution and the common people.

At the bottom of the Government document is the slogan "Raising The Standard". That is a jolly good joke because it is not designed simply with the idea of raising standards generally. It is presented in the socialist tradition, as it were, of raising "the scarlet standard high", giving the impression that the citizens charter is being raised high, even though there is nothing in it of any significance.

The Minister said that the charter was built on 12 years of achievement—that it was to be like the fairy on top of the Christmas tree—and that it was revolutionary. I accept that the Conservatives have been revolutionary in the last 12 years. Indeed, when the poll tax was being debated in Standing Committee I said that we had had in power the most revolutionary Government since the days of Cromwell.

The Government are claiming to be building on the achievements of the past. In other words, they are building on the achievement of the poll tax, even though they are now opposed to it and are replacing it with the council tax. My hon. Friends and I have put forward many reasons why the poll tax should be scrubbed. The Government have offered no reasons why it should be abolished. They have simply said that it would have worked well but for the activities of nasty Labour-controlled councils. That is about the level of intellectual endeavour we have witnessed from the Government over a measure that has had massive revolutionary consequences that will take decades to remedy.

When Labour is elected, we shall replace the poll tax with a fair and sensible system of finance for local government, but the consequences in terms of the attack that poll tax has made on civil liberties and citizens rights will live on for a long time. We shall have our time cut out putting that right. Nowhere is that more serious than in the matter with which the people's chartists were concerned, which was the extension of the franchise.

The poll tax has undermined the electoral register by removing a million people from it. Putting that right will take a long time, and there is nothing in the Government's latest citizens charter to suggest how the damage done by the poll tax will be remedied. We shall probably need a charter for enfranchisement rights. If charters are to mean anything, they must be turned into legislation. Our representation of the people legislation has been undermined by the poll tax, which is still in existence. That has removed superior rights, for constitutional lawyers accept that those parts of our constitution that are in writing, in terms of legislation, include enfranchisement rights. That legislation determines who shall have those rights, and we have determined, on the basis of birthright, who shall be enfranchised. That right has been removed from a million people in Britain, so many are not included as citizens in the Government's new citizens charter.

We gather that bits of the charter will develop into legislation. Those items are summarised on page 5 of the charter, which lists nine major points. In other words, the great six points of the 19th century charter have become nine. The first, and presumably the most important, point in the new charter is covered by the words "more privatisation." Presumably the Government believe that that will be attractive to the British public. Given that more privatisation is at the forefront of the document, how are we to believe the Government when they say that the national health service will not be privatised? It seems that the Government have hit on the idea that, in the end, everything can be privatised so that public funding can pay for private bodies to run services. One could ultimately privatise the prisons, Army, and even Parliament—with agencies paying people to perform specific tasks determined by legislation.

The charter makes mention of wider competition, irrespective of the circumstances. It fails to recognise, as Alfred Marshall and other 19th century economists did, that some services are natural monopolies. Marshall made particular reference to the railways and identified the fact that monopolies needed development, regional provisions and most of all regulations and controls. The truth of that can be seen when such functions are kept within the public sector. That has been seen in the case of the National Rivers Authority in performing its regulatory role, though it needs more funding. It would make more sense if the body with which the NRA has to deal was publicly owned. That would also allow regular parliamentary investigations and questions.

The charter also has other bits and pieces about redress for the citizen when services go badly wrong, but much of its content was aimed at attracting favourable publicity for the Government, who spent a vast amount of money to that end. The Minister denied that £8 million was spent on publicising the citizens charter, so perhaps he will tell the House the correct amount.

Mr. Maude: The figure of £8 million suggested by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) was born of complete fantasy. The actual cost was less than £1 million.

Mr. Barnes: If my hon. Friend's figure was exaggerated tenfold, the true figure would be £800,000, which still compares badly with the £680,000 being spent on Government publicity encouraging the public to take up their electoral rights. If one compares that with the money spent per voter on the ridiculous Bill to encourage voting by expatriates, on which the Government worked very hard but for a poor response, one begins to see the truth of the matter.

A few years ago, Abbey National ran a publicity campaign to encourage its members to vote on plc status. The society could not tell them how to vote, but commissioned an extensive publicity campaign that cost £7 million. Instead of spending money on glossy documents such as the citizens charter, the Government should fund the promotion of a fundamental right on which all other rights are built. I refer to the electoral right to vote and to appear on the electoral register.

The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys says that 1 million names have disappeared from the electoral registers in recent years—first in Scotland, and then in England and Wales, but not in Northern Ireland. That all ties in with the poll tax. Worst affected are attainers—those young people nearing the age of 18 who have never previously appeared on a register. There should be legislation requiring the poll tax register, while it continues to exist, any successor to it, and the electoral register, to be kept entirely separate, and prohibiting any interface between them, of the kind that exists in district council offices at present. People understand that.

The Government introduced a measure on confidentiality in relation to the census to try to convince people that census forms would not be used for poll tax purposes. People did not accept the message and 1 million people disappeared from the electoral register. The number of people in this country and their ages are known because of the registration of deaths and births. Even in the past there have been problems with the electoral register for which there has been oversubscription due to people moving out of the district or dying and under-representation as it takes time for the register to catch up with people. Those discrepancies usually cancel themselves out, but an extra 1 million people have been missing from the register in recent years.

If we are worried about citizens' basic rights and matters concerning the chartists of the 19th century, we should have more charters. I suggested an enfranchisement charter, on which much advertising revenue would be spent and which would involve the superiority of the Representation of the People Acts.

I have also suggested that we should have a Members' charter, not for the benefits of Members, but for their constituents. It would allow us to ask questions about more, not fewer subjects. An hon. Member, for example my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), would not have to publish a document of bits and pieces he had collected from the Library and answers obtained from various agencies. The information would be readily available in Hansard. Every bit of privatisation and agency work detracts form Members' rights to ask questions. It would be useful to have a little charter stating that any letter written by an hon. Member must be answered within a week or so. That would be a fantastic advantage, not least with Government Departments and agencies.

One advantage Members enjoy while Parliament is sitting is that they can table questions about when they will receive from a Department an anwer to a previous question. We are often told that the answer is in the post, but that does not apply when the House is in recess for 12 weeks in the summer when we do not enjoy those rights. I do not like the 12-week recess, but if it is to continue it would be nice to have a charter and legislation to ensure that we receive some response from Ministers. I was told that one Minister would be away during the recess, and for a while, until I started to make a fuss, it looked as though I would have to wait 13 weeks before receiving an answer. I am not talking about individual Members' rights, but of the rights of Members acting on behalf of their constituents and in response to complaints picked up in their advice surgeries.

We should also have a petitioners charter. Ancient and historical petitioners' rights operate in the House. Originally petitions were directed to the Crown, and parliamentary development was largely based on petitioning—legislation evolved through petitions from Members. Later, petitioning rights were extended to petitions to this House which, if organised in a certain way and presented by Members in respectable language, could be aired without duress being used against the petition's signatories. The names of those on the petitions are known only to Parliament, not to Government Departments, except those mentioned publicly when the petition is announced.

However, let us consider what the Government did in relation to poll tax. During the debate in the House on Scottish poll tax matters someone suggested that it would be a good idea if, when a petition against the poll tax was presented to poll tax registrars, it was checked against the poll tax register to see whether it contained the names of people who were not contained on the register, so that their names could be added to it. That is offensive and places under duress people who have the right to sign petitions. Any petition presented in due form to the Executive—the Prime Minister's office or whatever—should have the same protection as petitions presented to the House. That begins to have significance in an era during which civil liberties are under attack by the Government.

Now perhaps a relatively minor part of the British constitution, petitions are nevertheless the expression of citizens' traditional rights. At one time, the right to petition was the only right that citizens had. To some extent, the need to exercise the right had been superseded by the development of what was once the full franchise but I suggest that the Minister has a look at my Petitioners Rights Bill, which would overcome the present difficulties.

If we are concerned about citizens' rights, we need to consider matters far more serious than the ragbag of material thrown together in the citizens charter. The contents of the citizens charter are discussed as if they matter, but, in reality, there is nothing there, and certainly nothing as grand as is to be found in the peoples charter, Charter 88, or the social charter. The citizens charter is nothing but a cosmetic exercise and it should be seen for what it is. We should develop the limited parts of it of which some use can be made and see the rest as the continuation of the Government's ideological policy—dead dogmas as well as dead dogs' limbs.

1.26 pm

Mr. Hugo Summerson (Walthamstow): I do not agree with much of what the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) said, but I do agree with him that, if we are to have a Members charter, it should contain something about constituents who visit us in this place and ensure the provision of reasonable facilities for them. It is really bad that queues of people have to stand outside in cold and wet weather. I have sometimes wondered whether we might consider building a long shelter at the very least for those who have to stand outside on the pavement. Alternatively, greater use could be made of Westminster Hall, which is a magnificent and historic building but which is also an enormous area of empty and cold open space that is put to very little use. Perhaps use might be made of it by members of the public who come here to visit us.

The hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East referred to the electoral register. I agree with him that, if we are to call ourselves a true democracy, it is very important that as many adult members of the public as possible have their names on the electoral register. The hon. Gentleman said that, as a result of the poll tax, fewer people were registering. I can only say to him that, after years of decline—to about 48,500 in 1987—the size of my electorate has increased to about 50,000, so I suspect that the poll tax has not had that effect on my constituents, even though, in its first year, the Labour council imposed a heavy poll tax of £438.

Over the past 12 years, the Government have consistently improved services to the public and raised standards—by privatising industries, introducing and extending competition and freeing the civil service at large from central bureaucratic control by setting up "next steps" agencies. Under the citizens charter, those policies will be developed further throughout the public sector.

Let me refer first to the tenants charter, which was first introduced by the Government in 1980 and which has been extremely effective. It is now to be reissued after consultation with local authorities, tenants and consumer groups. In its new streamlined form it will give guidance on the practice that local authorities should follow to ensure that tenants know their rights and how to use them.

The right to repairs will allow council tenants to have carried out most repairs costing up to £200 when their landlord has failed to do them. That will be reviewed to see how procedures can be simplified and strengthened so that urgent minor repairs can be done more swiftly.

In common with many hon. Members, I am sure, I get queues of people at my surgery complaining bitterly that the council has not carried out minor repairs. It may be a dripping tap, or perhaps someone has put his foot through a floor board six months ago, or a chimney flue is blocked. Naturally, people are worried about such matters and ask me to write to the council. With a weary sigh of resignation I say that of course I shall write and I take down the name and address. I write to the council to try to have the repair carried out. It would be much better if people could have the work carried out themselves and send the bill to the council. Such a procedure would save time, money and effort and I am sure that it would be of enormous benefit to tenants.

Under the tenants charter, more information provided directly to council tenants would deal with the efficiency of the council's housing management and with vital matters such as repair times and rent arrears. I am sure that council tenants and everybody else in the London borough of Waltham Forest, which is in my constituency, would be interested to know that the council there has rent arrears of about £2 million. That Labour-controlled council is always complaining about the way in which the Government cut its funding, but the Government have not cut the funding. They have given that council more and more money, even though the council could raise more from its own resources by collecting the rent arrears. A large amount of interest could have accrued on that money.

Housing Corporation tenants will also benefit from a stronger tenants' guarantee which, in its present form, seeks to ensure reasonable rents for those on low incomes and lays down minimum standards of management. Local authorities will be encouraged to impose financial penalties on contractors and direct labour organisations which fail to complete on time the renovation and refurbishment of council property.

The Government will legislate to introduce competitive tendering to certain aspects of local authority housing management. Final decisions will be taken after the completion of a detailed study commissioned by the Department of the Environment, but repairs, management, rent collection and security may be subject to competitive tendering. The new arrangements in the citizens charter will not just allow but positively encourage tenants to take part in the management of their property.

I have spoken about rent arrears and the money available to local authorities. Councils complain bitterly that the Government will not allow them to spend the money raised from right-to-buy sales. However, councils are permitted to spend 25 per cent. of that money per year. Many local authorities are making no effort to raise money in that way. In my area it takes, on average, 21 months to complete a right-to-buy sale. Much money could be raised if local authorities pushed such sales and the 25 per cent. of the proceeds that they are allowed to spend would enable them to provide more houses.

However, the problem with that is the serious difficulty in providing new housing in a mature city such as London. My area is very built up and has been since the turn of the century. There are few places in which it would be possible to provide more new housing. The Government take great pride in the fact that the green belt round Greater London has been doubled in their period of office. That is fine as far as it goes, but we have to bear in mind the fact that new housing must go somewhere. The Government must think about that point.

The citizens charter also covers public transport. At this time of year, there are problems with leaves on tracks. To the best of my knowledge, this was not a problem 100 or even 150, years ago. I bet that I. K. Brunel was never bothered by leaves on the line. To start with, his locomotives were not particularly aerodynamic, so they made a great draught in passing, which must have had some effect in clearing leaves off the lines. In addition, the locomotives were very heavy and some had 8 ft driving wheels. They must have been the most magnificent sight. It would have been awesome to see one of Brunel's flyers going down the Great Western line from Paddington to Bristol at getting on for 100 mph. The great advantage of such heavy, fast and unaerodynamic locomotives was that they either swept the leaves aside or crushed them beneath their wheels. Furthermore, the braking system, which operated directly on the wheels, would have burnt off all the scrub and residue picked up by crushing the leaves.

Let me move from the time of Brunel to the citizens charter. About British Rail, the charter states unequivocally:

"For all the efforts of staff and management, British Rail's performance too often falls short of what the public has a right to expect."

It is equally clear about the long-term solution. It says:

"Progress towards privatisation of the railway is integral to the Citizen's Charter."

The Government expect to set out detailed plans for the privatisation of British Rail in a White Paper before the end of this year. Its key features will be a presumption against a monopolistic structure, the lifting of BR's service monopoly and the appointment of an independent regulator to ensure fair competition and to protect the customer's interest. I am glad that there will be that presumption against the monopoly state structure.

It is fascinating to conjecture what structure a privatised British Rail might have. To return to the days of the old regions would not be in the best interests of the customer. Perhaps the best thing would be to have a track authority and to give people the right to run trains over those tracks.

More immediate improvements are foreshadowed in the citizens charter. British Rail will publish a passengers charter in the autumn setting out targets of performance, means of complaint and details about what forms of compensation are available. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is no longer in the Chamber. He regaled the House with a story about having to stand in queues at Stratford station to buy his ticket, with the danger that, because some angry person had knocked out his teeth, he would have to visit his dentist. My advice to him is that he should pay a visit to the Fees Office, where he would be issued with a season ticket. He would then no longer have to stand in the queue at the risk of having his teeth knocked out.

An enlarged and more comprehensive compensation scheme has been agreed with British Rail. Under it, if trains are cancelled or unreasonably delayed, passengers can apply for refunds with claims assessed individually. What a good idea, but goodness knows how long it will take to assess the claim. If passengers decide not to travel because a train has been cancelled, they will receive a full refund. Perhaps we could go slightly further and state that those passengers will receive compensation for missing a meeting, for example. If we went that one step further, I could be compensated for missing a surgery. InterCity passengers with reserved seats will receive automatic compensation. Season ticket holders will receive compensation, mainly by extensions to their ticket for days when there is no effective service. Perhaps that will relate especially to this time of year. British Rail will take the initiative wherever practicable to offer compensation to passengers on badly delayed or cancelled services rather than waiting for them to claim.

I did not agree entirely with the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks). I believe that the management of London Transport is, on the whole, doing a good job in difficult circumstances. There is enormous pressure on public transport, particularly on the London underground system. I frequently pay visits to the Victoria line, which serves my constituency. I have complained, as have many of my constituents in the recent past, about escalators being out of service. The escalators have had to be repaired and they have been out of service for several months.

When I approached the management of London Underground to talk about the problems with escalators, I was asked whether I had any idea how many people passed through Walthamstow Central underground station every year. I hazarded a guess and said, "Perhaps 1 million." The answer was 10 million. If 10 million people are passing through one underground station every year, enormous pressure and strain is bound to be placed on the station's facilities. That applies throughout London.

As I have said, I believe that the management of London Transport is doing its best. It had the legacy of the Greater London council, which underfunded and mismanaged London Transport. The management is having to do a great deal of catching up and it is having to spend huge sums. The benefits of the expenditure are already starting to show through, but they will not become clearly apparent for a year or two yet.

Mr. Arbuthnot: I wish to clarify the interesting figure that my hon. Friend has presented to the House. I suspect that 5,000 or 6,000 people pass through Walthamstow Central underground station on quite a number of occasions, not that 10 million individuals pass through it.

Mr. Summerson: My hon. Friend is good at arithmetic. He would doubtless count the same people time and time again. I suspect that the management wishes to draw attention to the number of feet and bodies that pass through the station. Perhaps if I talked about passenger movements that would satisfy my hon. Friend.

There is a successful lane rental scheme, which has speeded motorway repairs by rewarding contracting firms that finish work early and penalising those that finish late. The scheme will be extended to all roadworks where there is a risk of significant delay to motorists. New regulations will specify the maximum length of carriageway that can be coned off at one time. Contractors will be fined if they cone off more of the motorway than is needed to carry out the repairs. It is an excellent idea. I am sure that on occasions all of us have driven along motorways, passing those wretched cones for mile after mile and observed that no repair works were being undertaken. In many such instances one lane is closed completely. This causes motorists great frustration. They might find that on a busy Friday evening, for example, three lanes of the motorway are merged into two. All the traffic has to squeeze into the two lanes that remain open and everything comes to a virtual standstill.

The taxpayers charter was launched on 13 August. It revised the previous charter, which was published in 1986. The new charter sets out the standard of service that people can expect to receive from Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue. The latter undertakes to settle tax affairs impartially, to expect people to pay only what is due under the law and to treat everybody with equal fairness. Again, I am sure that we all have constituents who have complained to us about Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue. I have a current case in my constituency of a company complaining about the treatment that it has received at the hands of Customs and Excise. I have to say that, so far, Customs and Excise is responding well to my inquiries and I hope that the case will soon come to a satisfactory conclusion.

Under the charter, people will be helped to sort out their tax affairs correctly and to understand their rights and obligations by the provision of clear leaflets and forms giving information and assistance at inquiry offices and by the showing of courtesy at all times. A little courtesy goes a long way, especially if people know to whom they are speaking. I hope that the requirement that those in official positions wear name tags will not be abused. People will not be amused if, on asking an official for his name, they are told, "Donald Duck".

There is more to come. In due course, Customs and Excise will spell out its duties and responsibilities even more fully in separate charters for VAT and excise duty traders and those involved in inland clearance of goods. In addition, there will be a special charter for travellers.

Both the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise are redesigning some of their main forms and other literature to make them easier for people to understand. There is no excuse for such official bodies not to set out matters clearly and simply in words that people can understand. The new series of leaflets will tell particular groups of people—for example, small business people, pensioners and school leavers—what sort of help and level of service each can expect from the Inland Revenue. Selected tax inquiry centres will experiment with more flexible opening hours to test public demand.

As I said earlier, a great deal of the citizens charter depends on further privatisation. It commits the Government to pave the way for further privatisations and contracting out by introducing legislation to clarify the right to redundancy compensation for all civil servants transferred to the private sector. Currently, separate legislation is required for each privatisation. More services will be contracted out and the Government will publish a White Paper later this year setting out detailed proposals to encourage more contracting out in local and central government and in the NHS. Competition within the NHS will be gradually extended to new distribution warehousing, non-emergency transport and management services.

What all that means is a new role for the citizen. I am delighted to know that local lay adjudicators will be introduced into many parts of the public sector. They will be well-known local people, well respected in their local communities. They will be appointed to help the citizen resolve minor, but irritating, complaints against public sector bodies. That lay adjudication system will not involve the legal system at any stage. Both sides will agree in advance to abide by the decision and participation in the adjudication scheme will be voluntary. The Government assume that most public services, including local authorities, will want to join the scheme to show commitment to the citizens charter.

My final point refers to the challenging of unlawful strikes. The citizens charter proposes the introduction of an entirely new legal right for the individual citizen. At the moment, unlawful industrial action in the public services such as an unballoted or political strike, can be challenged in the courts only by the employer or by a member of the union who has been called upon to take part in that unlawful action. In future, the citizen will have the right to bring legal proceedings to halt any unlawful industrial action affecting services covered by the citizens charter.

I was going to refer to the speech made earlier by the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), the Liberal Democrat spokesman. It is a great pity that he has left the Chamber and that his party's Bench is empty. I should have thought that on such an important occasion, the Liberal Democrats could at least have taken the trouble to stay for the entire debate and listen to contributions from other right hon. and hon. Members. If they had done that, they might have learnt a great deal.

1.50 pm

Mr. James Arbuthnot (Wanstead and Woodford): I am one of those who welcome without any reservation the citizens charter that has been brought forward by the Government. I was a little disappointed, although perhaps not surprised, at the grudging welcome for some of the suggestions from the Labour party. Many of the suggestions made by the Government in the citizens charter give us an opportunity to contribute our own ideas to what should go into the citizens charter and for those ideas to expand and to grow as a result of the kernel in the programme that the Government have produced.

The citizens charter is not only a programme of new suggestions; it is a framework under which we can produce further suggestions ourselves. I am sure that that is a process in which the Opposition would wish to take part. I suggest that it is a process in which the Opposition have tried to take part in their own citizens charter. I wish that I had found the Opposition's citizens charter a little more convincing, but half the ideas that they put forward in their citizens charter, as a spoiling exercise to the Government's, were already in operation and the other half were vague promises and side-stepping some of the problems that have been created by Labour-controlled local authorities up and down the country.

One important part of the citizens charter is not so much that it contains many individual ideas and proposals for change, but that it is intended to change the entire attitude of public servants and the way in which citizens approach them. In other words, we now have a certain expectation of the sort of courtesy and level of service which we can receive from our public servants and that is something we have not had in the past. It is as a result of the citizens charter that we are able to have that expectation.

This is an opportunity not only for us, the politicians, to put in ideas for what could be included in further episodes of the citizens charter, but for the citizens themselves to put in ideas. It will prompt people to ask for improvements in their public services. So when it is called the citizens charter, it is not just a charter for the benefit of the citizens of this country, it is a charter which is owned by the citizens and to which they can contribute. I very much hope that they will feel free to contribute to the charter and to put forward their own ideas.

Therefore, I heard with great approval the comment from my hon. Friend the Minister that he is issuing a survey to ask what people want out of the citizens charter and what improvements they want in their public services. I think that that is a very important component of the citizens charter. We must not believe that the charter ends with the glossy document that we have seen and with the action set out in it. We must carry the citizens charter forward as an ongoing programme throughout the decade and build on it.

The private sector in Britain knows that the customer must come first. If the private sector or any components of it—any individual firm—begins to ignore the message that the customer must come first, it finds out pretty soon the hard way that if the customer does not come first, the firm may well go out of business. The public sector has not had that discipline. In one sense, the citizens charter is a method of bringing to the public sector the discipline of the private sector.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on not being daunted by the sheer scale of the task that he has undertaken. He deserves great credit for not finding the task so difficult that he does not know where to begin. He has undertaken a review of virtually the entire gamut of government services and he has approached it in a way that has been both orderly and comprehensive, yet still leaves room for further ideas to come forward. He has a tiny team of support staff. He must be congratulated on his restraint in expanding public expenditure as a result of the charter. The point about that is that the key to this programme is not that more money needs to be spent. The key to this programme, as he said, is not what one spends but what one buys. That is something which I hope that we can emphasise throughout the country.

There were various suggestions from the Labour and Liberal Benches that if these ideas were so good we should have introduced them 12 years ago. The answer is that, in many areas, we did. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) suggested that there would be a reduction in the Post Office's monopoly and that things might therefore get worse. Let me remind the hon. Gentleman what happened over the privatisation of British Telecom.

Before the privatisation of British Telecom there were approximately 77,000 public telephone boxes. Many of them were out of order. Following the privatisation there are 97,000 public telephone boxes, of which 96 per cent. work on a day-to-day basis. Yet when we were privatising the telephone system, we were told by the Opposition that those public telephone boxes would go out of order completely because they would not be found to be economic. They told us that a private telephone service would drop public telephone boxes. That is only one example of the improvement that we have already seen under the Government's programme.

Several hon. Members mentioned London Underground. My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Summerson) mentioned the Central line. The line serves my constituency and he and I have spoken about it in the Chamber many a time on a Friday morning. It causes many of my constituents to arrive at work, if at all, late and absolutely furious because of the unreliability of the service and the delays that they have suffered on the way to work. On one occasion, some of them even had to walk along the track when the electricity had not been switched off.

The value of the citizens charter is that it will change the expectations of my constituents and my hon. Friend's constituents so that they will know the standard of service that they can expect, know to demand it and be able to point to a document and say, "This is what we are told we can expect. This is what we are not achieving. Please produce this service now." That will provide a real spur to London Underground to improve the standard.

However, one of the greatest causes of the unreliability of the underground service, particularly on the Central line, is the incidence of fires. One problem is that the money which is being spent by London Underground in terms of safety is being spent on the wrong things. It is being spent on relatively marginal improvements to safety in stations rather than on some of the new equipment that is needed for the tracks and tunnels to improve fire detection services.

I have said that one advantage of the citizens charter is that we can produce our ideas about what should be included in it. My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow referred to the taxpayers charter. I welcome what is in it so far, but I have two extra suggestions. First, sometimes there are disputes between the taxpayer and the Inland Revenue. It must be accepted that, in terms of litigation, the Inland Revenue has huge financial muscle over the taxpayer. It can say to the taxpayer, "This is our position. If you don't like it, take us to court. We don't mind. We are backed by public money. You, unfortunately, are not. You will have to rely on your own purse." The effect of that is usually to make the taxpayer cave in, often where the law and right are on his side. He knows that he does not have the money to stand up against the Inland Revenue. There should be some method by which the Inland Revenue is forced to consider whether, in deciding disputes between itself and taxpayers, it should contribute to the taxpayers' costs—not necessarily wiping out those costs, because there must be some disincentive to litigation, but contributing to them. It is helpful to the Inland Revenue to clear up the effects of the tax law.

My second suggestion relates to a tax clearance procedure, about which I have written to my hon. Friend. It would be helpful mainly to companies. Before entering into a transaction companies wish to know what the tax consequences of that transaction are likely to be. All too often the Inland Revenue says either, "I am sorry, but you will have to find out when you've entered into that transaction what the tax consequences are"—that is no good—or, "We think that the tax consequences are such, but do not hold us to it because we may well change our minds later." There should be a tax clearance procedure for which the companies could pay. There is nothing to stop them paying for one. Nor is there anything to stop the Inland Revenue perhaps contracting out the advice that it would give to private firms of accountants. That would save any futher demand on its time.

I know that other right hon. and hon. Members want to speak, so I will simply say that I have raised that matter previously with my hon. Friend and I warn him that I shall return to it. He has the enormous task of looking after the Inland Revenue and the citizens charter. The charter gives us the opportunity to put forward this idea and to build on the ideas of my hon. Friend and it is welcome on that account.

2.3 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): The phrase "citizens charter" attracts my interest, but those who advocate it do not have the slightest idea what they have started. We in this country are not citizens; we are subjects of the Crown.

An hon. Member cannot take his seat in the House of Commons without the famous declaration:

> "I swear by Almighty God that I will be faithful and bear true Allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, Her Heirs and Successors, according to Law."

An atheist may affirm. I affirm in honour of Charles Bradlaugh who won the case. Every Church of England minister, every officer and every judge has an oath of allegiance. Privy Councillors are subjected to an especially embarrassing procedure: a medieval oath is read out. When at the end of it I said that I had not agreed, I was told, "Don't worry, we've administered the oath". An oath is an injection. I never knew what the phrase "administration of oaths" meant until I became a Privy Councillor. We are not citizens at all.

I was reminded of that only this morning when I got an answer from the Prime Minister about Maastricht. He said:

> "Ratification of any Treaty is a prerogative act, exercised by the Government on behalf of the Crown."

One can complain if one's tap is not repaired by the local authority, but if the Crown decides to ratify the Maastricht treaty one has no rights at all.

Let us be clear—if we are talking about citizens we shall have to change the constitution. Whatever we may say about the mother of Parliaments—we have all that stuff that we tell schoolchildren when they come here—the British are subjects. We do not choose our head of state. Unlike the Americans, who elect a president, we shall have Prince Charles whether we like it or not. We do not elect the House of Lords, which exists through patronage. The past 10 Prime Ministers have appointed 837 Peers who are Members of Parliament. If we are talking about citizens the Government will have to consider constitutional reform. I presented a Commonwealth of Britain Bill in May, which would bring about a new charter of rights. We could consider that when I bring it back in the new Parliament.

Why should the citizen have rights only in relation to public services? What about the private sector? Indeed, I would go further. If a tap is leaking, the citzens charter will allow us to force the council to mend it, but if one is homeless there is nothing in the charter to say that one can force the local authority to give us a home. There is nothing to say that the unemployed can force people to give them a job. If someone cannot live on his benefit he cannot force the Benefits Agency to give him enough money to live on.

The citizens charter is nothing to do with people's real rights. It is an attempt to mobilise public opinion against the public services, which have deliberately been kept tight on cash and rate capped—the councillors who built houses in Liverpool have been disqualified and surcharged for "wilful misconduct" or some such phrase. If the Government are going to start the hare running, we shall follow it up.

I believe that there are human rights; they are very simple. Everybody is entitled to do useful work at a living wage. Everybody is entitled to free health care based on medical need, not on their wealth. Everybody is entitled to life-long education. I know that I am going an inch or two beyond Labour party policy, so I hope that nobody reports me to the leader of the party, but I favour raising the school leaving age to 95. Everybody should be able to go in and out of education, as and when they want, throughout their lives, just as people go into libraries to learn what they want to learn and come out when they have finished. That is a proper education policy. That is a citizen's right, but there is nothing about that in the citizens charter.

All pensioners are entitled to dignity when they get old. Why should people who bust a gut all their lives working to create wealth have to live on the poverty line when they retire? It is because the Government are not interested in giving people rights if that involves taxing the people whom they represent.

Those are some of the basic questions raised by the debate today. I apologise for not having been here for the whole debate, but I had another engagement to fulfil before coming to the House. Ministers have started something that they will live to regret—from their point of view, not from ours. People will ask a lot of questions, such as "Why cannot we be as democratic as the Russians? They can elect Yeltsin but we cannot elect our head of state.", and, "Why cannot we, like the Americans, have the right to examine judges before they are appointed?" People may laugh about Clarence Thomas, but not long ago a former member of the British Union of Fascists was appointed a judge in this country.

We should have more rights over those who govern us and over private industry. What use is the idea of "the customer is always right" to someone who is sacked by a multinational company? There is no protection of the citizen's right there.

I welcome the citizens charter, because the Government have opened a Pandora's box that will raise a lot of questions that they cannot answer with their market forces philosophy. I shall take it up.

I published a charter of rights, including the right to democracy in industry, in the Bill that I presented on 20 May. Why should people hang up their civil rights when they go to work? Why not have a ballot to deal with management, like the one that the Government introduced to deal with the trade unions? Why should a trade union not be allowed to spend money politically without a ballot when a company can do so? Why should a company be able to close a factory—far worse than any industrial action, because everyone in the factory is put out of work, without a ballot when a trade union cannot stop a factory for one day without a ballot?

The hierarchy of a feudal society is challenged by the use of the word "citizen". The discipline of market forces is challenged by the use of the word "citizen". By trying to move into the central area of politics in order, as they imagine, to win the election, the Government have started a discussion about human rights. Those rights have nothing to do with medieval hierarchy or market forces, they are inherent in people when they are born. To go back to the book of Genesis:

"Am I my brother's keeper?"

That is the question raised by having a serious debate about citizens' rights.

Dare I say it, but some of the speeches that I have heard today have been insignificant in the issues that they raised. However, this charter will open a debate that will excite the British people, but not in support of this Government.

2.10 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): It will be difficult to follow such an ingenious speech, but I shall try. It will probably come as no great surprise to the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) that I do not entirely share his views on the monarchy. However, democracy means that we are each entitled to our views. I apologise to the House for the fact that I have not been present throughout the debate, but I am glad to have the opportunity to speak in support of the citizens charter.

The citizens charter was the Prime Minister's idea and he has captured the mood of the nation. It would be churlish of the Opposition to delay its passage through the House. I have not been a Member of the House for the past two or three decades, but those who have been say that the role of the Member of Parliament has changed greatly. Some older Members believe that we have become glorified social workers. To be honest, much of our work concerns dealing with people's disappointments at the precise delivery of public services.

I have no doubt that if the charter is successful, and it will be, our role as Members of Parliament will return to that of the past and we shall debate the great affairs of the nation and decide overall policy. We will no longer be involved in the detail of why someone has not got satisfaction on housing from the council or why a hospital appointment was not kept on time.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) mentioned the law and there is no doubt that the law is an expensive process. The small claims court has been extremely successful. However, I am sure that everyone would applaud the citizens charter if it meant that the ordinary citizen was able to gain redress from the public services for any disappointment.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister and his team have worked hard on the proposals. I should be interested to learn what impact the citizens charter will have on our relationship with the European Community—I accept that my hon. Friend will not have time to consider that issue today. No doubt on Wednesday and Thursday of next week, hon. Members will discuss that relationship. It is relevant to ask how the citizens charter will be viewed by our European partners. I hope that they will not obstruct in any way its passage and successful implementation.

I greatly welcome the guarantee that parents will receive a report on their children's progress each year. Our postbags often include complaints about delays, for example, at the general practitioner's surgery or when waiting for an appointment with a consultant. I am an enthusiastic supporter of the Government and it seems to me that we get blamed for everything—the weather, delays in the shops—you name it. We accept responsibility for many things, but when it comes to queues of people waiting to see their general practitioners or to be examined by consultants, we must look elsewhere for the reasons. I accept that doctors must sometimes leave the surgery to attend an emergency and that people will be left waiting, but good practice should enable those arranging GPs' and consultants' bookings to make better arrangements.

For example, patients told to arrive at, say, 9 o'clock should be seen shortly after that time. It is unacceptable for many people to be told to turn up at the same time, with the result that there are enormous queues at the surgery. When patients grumble about such delays, it is easy to blame the Government, even though it is dishonest to do so.

I was glad to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Summerson) refer to British Rail. I hope that I shall have an opportunity in the Adjournment debate to comment on the Fenchurch street line.

I am delighted that the Consumers Association has welcomed various aspects of the citizens charter. I hope that timeshare practices that have been the subject of abuse will be caught by the charter.

Basildon district council, which is socialist only with the casting vote of the chairman, has not welcomed the citizens charter, no doubt because the Government's initiative will result in the shortcomings of local authorities being brought to the fore. I welcome the charter and I have no doubt that it will be welcomed by the public in general when they cast their votes in the general election next year.

2.16 pm

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I can, with justification, describe myself as a modest man. Accordingly, I can say, following the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), that compared with his aspirations, I have a modest desire in wishing to remove a minor carbuncle from the face of the constitution and I shall be delighted if the Minister will assure me that the citizens charter will achieve that.

We in West Glamorgan, in Swansea, have a local form of pestilence. It is a quango, one of those bodies which the Conservatives so detested when in opposition in the 1970s. But the one of which I speak was appointed by the Government. It is called the West Glamorgan health authority.

To everyone's surprise, even shock, that health authority, although short of cash, devoted a large section of one of its recent health journals to the citizens charter. That was a source of great wonderment to the people of Swansea. It represented a conversion on the road to Gower that overshadowed anything that happened on the road to Damascus.

It had consulted on the question of changing a casualty unit in my hospital from a full to a minor casualty unit. After years of consulting about that, it decided not to change it from a major to a minor unit but to close it. That decision was taken without any consultation. The quango, arbitrarily and unilaterally, closed the casualty unit.

Even the Secretary of State for Wales was furious that a quango should act in that way, so he instructed it to reopen the unit. It was reopened, but as a minor casualty unit. In addition, the authority took the view that the people of Swansea would not have accidents at night, so the unit was not opened at night. "Local people shall not have accidents at night", was apparently the thought behind that. Again the Welsh Office intervened. The quango was instructed to open the casualty unit on a 24-hour basis.

Now, almost at the end of 1991, that quango, much despised throughout West Glamorgan, is about once more to close my local casualty unit at night. It is going through a farcical, nonsensical and meaningless form of consultation. I say that not because the quango disagrees with me—although that is bound to weigh in my assessment of its competence—but because, by acting in a unilateral and arbitrary manner, it is ignoring the fact that 30,000 people have signed a petition saying that they want the unit to be open at night.

Right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House know how difficult it is to get 30,000 constituents to sign a petition. When the local newspaper conducted an opinion poll, 82 per cent. of those questioned said that they wanted the unit kept open at night. The health authority emblazoned the citizens charter—at the request of the Prime Minister, it was said—in its journal, but ignored a petition of 30,000 signatures and 82 per cent. of public opinion and did exactly what it wanted.

West Glamorgan will accept a simple indication of whether or not the charter is meaningful. One modest action would lead us to believe that it is something other than a con. All that Ministers must do is sack West Glamorgan health authority.

2.20 pm

Mr. Chris Smith: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The debate has been marked by several distinguished contributions from my right hon. and hon. Friends. None was more distinguished than the sparkling speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who made the important fundamental point that charters do not build homes, invest in railways, put roofs on schools, or provide better pensions to people who have given their all to this country throughout their lives. Those are the real improvements that the public want. Charters are all very well, but the Government must realise that they are fundamentally inadequate in dealing with basic problems of under-provision and poor service.

Right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House want improved courtesy, the identification of individuals, better signposting in Government offices, and what have you. Those specific proposals are welcome, although one does not need a charter to achieve them. One needs the rigorous application of efficiency and value for money throughout the public and private sectors. Much of that is already being achieved by Labour-controlled authorities throughout the country. The pioneering work of the city of York, for example, is an example that Ministers would do well to applaud and to follow.

So much more needs to be done than the Government have even dreamt of in the citizens charter. We require freedom of information legislation, real regulation of the privatised utilities, proper independent procedures for dealing with complaints about police behaviour and from prisoners and a quality commission coupled with annual elections, to bring real accountability to local government administration.

Above all, we need a real commitment from the Government to high performance, good quality and value for money in public services. Health, education, transport and housing will form the centrepiece of the next general election campaign. Glossy charters will not save the Government from their record, the inadequacies of their present proposals or the verdict of the electorate.

Mr. Maude: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This has been a good debate and I hope that it will be the first of many debates in years to come on the important Government initiative to improve public services. I thank my right hon. and hon. Friends who have participated in the debate for the high quality of their contributions and the seriousness with which they have tackled an extremely important subject. I am particularly grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) for his kind remarks to me. It is a big challenge to be looking after not only the Inland Revenue but the citizens charter, but I do not believe that there is any tension between the two activities. The high quality of the debate reflects the importance that Conservative Members attach to the steady improvement of public services over a period of years in the interests of the citizen—the user of the services.

I am disappointed that so many Opposition speeches did not deal with the programme to improve public services for our citizens but, for some reason difficult to understand, shied away from the subject. That is despite the fact that the Opposition claim that the issue is their territory and their carefully cultivated myth that public services are the province of the Labour party alone. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) made what can most kindly be described as ill-judged remarks about the charter's content.

There is nothing paper about the promises that we make in the charter and nothing gimmicky about saying to patients called to out-patient appointments that they should not have to wait all day to see a doctor, but 30 minutes. That may seem a trifling matter for Opposition Members, but for the patients who have to suffer the wait, it is very serious. The House owes it to those people to support them and the Government in their determination to eradicate those habits, which arise not from constraints on resources, but from poor management and an inconsiderate approach to the users of the services.

There is nothing gimmicky about creating league tables for schools and local authorities to give local residents, parents, taxpayers and users of services the chance to compare the performances of different organisations. There is nothing gimmicky about privatising British Rail and our presumption against monopolistic structures. The Government have said that they consider that to be the best way to improve the working of the railway for citizens. There is nothing gimmicky about reducing the Post Office's monopoly on mail, which would introduce real choice and competition for our citizens.

The Government, in introducing those policies, confront difficult issues and have to take on the big, vested interests in the interests of citizens. That is why the Labour party has dodged the big issues and sought to divert the debate into matters that do not involve the citizens charter. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) made a splendid and thoroughly enjoyable speech which produced a grand diversion. If we succeed in arousing a splendid and magnificent debate on the lines that he suggested, nobody will be happier than I, because the citizens charter is an important issue that will engage people's minds.

Public services exist for the public, not politicians. They are not our playthings, or those of councillors. They do not exist for the managers or staff of the services, although they depend on the work of the staff. They are brought into existence to serve citizens. It is our citizens who own and use the services and we should consult those citizens and give them choice. We should extend competition deep into public services, as the Government will propose in the White Paper to be published next week which I hope will command widespread support in the House.

At the beginning of the debate, I asked the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) a number of hard-edged questions about the Labour party's policies on some central issues concerning choice for the citizen. The hon. Gentleman refused to answer a single one of them. When it comes to the election, the British people will be asking him and his colleagues those questions and they had better have thought up some answers by then. The hon. Gentleman may be able to run, but he and his colleagues will not be able to hide. The British people will expect some answers and, if the Labour party cannot supply them, they will vote unequivocally to continue with the present Government in office.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Southend Railway Line

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

2.30 pm

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Madam Deputy Speaker, I am going to tell you a horror story today which will wring your withers, which will make you very angry and which will make you understand the sense of frustration that has brought so many of my colleagues from south-east Essex here to support me. I am delighted that my right hon. Friends the Members for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) and for Southend, West (Mr. Channon), and my hon. Friends the Members for Thurrock (Mr. Janman) and for Basildon (Mr. Amess) are here to back me up. Their presence will give the House a good idea of just how important we think the subject is.

We are here to talk about the Fenchurch Street line, which serves—if that is the right word—the people who live in our constituencies. It is easy to sum the line up: it is Britain's worst railway line. It is shabby, sloppy and slow. The carriages are shabby, the management is sloppy and the trains are slow. Half the trains now run at a quarter of their normal speed—if they run at all—because the electrical components have been allowed to deteriorate so badly.

More than 40,000 of our constituents use the line every day. It is not an option for them: this railway line is their lifeline to their jobs, connecting their homes to the places where they work. Our constituents are now discriminated against if it is known that they must travel to work on the Fenchurch Street line—yet, without the line, they cannot earn their living and they cannot be self-supporting.

British Rail admits that the rolling stock, the signalling and everything about the line is now 60 years out of date. We want to know why BR has done nothing about it. It is not as though our constituents have an alternative. They cannot go to work in their cars, because there is nowhere for them to park in central London and the main roads from our part of the world all badly need attention. The A13 and A127 are choked with lorries from Shell Haven, Fords in Dagenham and Tilbury docks in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock. The line is not an option for our people; it is the way in which they get to work.

As I waited on the station today, we were given three excuses over the loudspeaker, which broadcasts such excuses every day. Two trains were cancelled this morning. One, which had a defect and had been travelling at a quarter of its proper speed, had to be taken off the line. People are piled into the carriages. On each train, one carriage travels empty because the electrical components are worn out and out of date and it is apparently beyond the wit of British Rail to get new components manufactured. Of course BR cannot buy them off the peg any more, because, in most parts of the country, those railway lines went out of business 30-odd years ago, but that is still no excuse.

When we get off the train we line up in a pathetic queue at the station master's office to get an excuse card. There are eight excuses on the card, and the station master religiously ticks one of the boxes so that, when we get to work, we can explain to our employers why we are late again. The excuses are: points failure, train failure, staff failure, signal failure, vandalism, storm damage and overhead power cable failure. Everything fails but the management of British Rail. Oh dear, no, it is nothing at all to do with them. We do not get just wet leaves on the line but dead sheep. That is not surprising, because the trains travel so slowly that the sheep feel that they have plenty of time to cross. However on one occasion, the signalman got the signal wrong and the train hit the sheep. On that day my constituents were turfed out at Purfleet and had to take taxis at a cost of £7. That is not rare; it is the sort of thing that people have to do all the time. They would much rather pay a bit more for a better service, but that option is not open to them.

Why is the line so neglected? Is it British Rail's biggest loss maker? No, it is not. It has a turnover of £62 million a year and is used by 40,000 people a day. It makes a profit and we should like to know where that profit has gone. It seems that it has been used to improve the lines in all parts of the region except ours.

Mr. Paul Channon (Southend, West): When I was in a position to look dispassionately at lines all over the country, it was universally agreed that this line was one of the worst two. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is essential to implement the massive programme put forward this year by British Rail to improve the infrastructure and renew the rolling stock? Will she press the Minister to make sure that the Government give the go-ahead this year for such a programme?

Mrs. Gorman: I agree with everything that my right hon. Friend says. Thanks to the efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon, we got Sir Bob Reid to experience what the rest of us have to experience, but British Rail could not even get the line right on Tuesday for Sir Bob's visit. A cancellation prevented my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point getting to Basildon on time. When we arrived our little cards were ticked to show that the 20-minute delay was due to a points failure. Even for the managing director of British Rail, BR could not get its act together.

I was delighted to see my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point giving Sir Bob Reid the biggest flea in his ear that he has ever had. It was a salutary lesson and gratifying for the passengers to see somebody was taking up their cause and letting British Rail know what we thought about it. My right hon. Friend expressed the frustration felt by our constituents who are always late for work. They also feel impotent because nothing is ever done about the line.

Long before I came to the House, my colleagues had been badgering about the line, but still nothing has been done. That is simply not good enough, and this time around we intend to get some action. I have sympathy for members of the staff because although they are totaliy disillusioned, they want to help. They dish out little cards, as if people who are late for work have nothing better to do than to read them. The cards state:

> If you need help or have any comments about our services, please contact our Customers Service Team.

Is not that wonderful? There is a customer service team but no solution for the prime need of customers, which is to get to work on time.

British Rail management is responsible for the line. As always, Sir Bob Reid tried to blame someone else—the Government. That is not good enough. He is paid to run British Rail and we want some action from him. The Government represent the people who use the line and they are the major shareholder. It is up to them to see that Sir Bob does the job for which he is paid. If he does not, they should sack him. At night, customers going to Fenchurch Street station find that they are locked out because of train delays and crowding on the platforms, which is almost lethal. Police outside the station—I almost said riot police—try to direct passengers to another method of getting home. My constituents tell me that they sometimes spend three hours on a journey that should take 45 minutes.

Furthermore, my constituents' democratic rights are threatened. During the May council elections last year, when the polls closed at 9 pm, my constituents were still coming off the trains and so were unable to vote. There were queues outside polling stations and the doors were shut in their faces. This is a disgrace because it takes the problem beyond that of being late for work.

We want action and we want it now and we have come here today in force to see that we have it. If I had my way, I would push on with privatising the whole of British Rail and make sure that this line was the first to go. It would be a real commercial proposition. Private management would not tolerate for one minute the level of service offered to our constituents.

Another option would be to allow British Rail to raise money in the ordinary commercial markets because, as the line makes a profit, it could pay for such borrowing. Under the present mandate, BR is not allowed to do this. Apparently, the line needs above £240 million invested in it, but right now it needs an immediate injection of £40 million to replace the signalling and the electrics so that the trains would at least run on time. Shabby old carriages that they are, at least they would reach their destination in the time that they are supposed to. Long term, we also want new carriages, which could be made available by leasing from the private sector. All these solutions are available and there is no reason why they should not be introduced.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basildon has a great deal of practical experience in this matter and he has done as much as any of us to highlight the problem so I should like him to have the opportunity to give the House his views.

2.42 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) on her magnificent speech. She is a woman of enormous energy and on this subject her energy has been deployed to good effect.

At the moment, there is much talk in the media about Essex man and Essex woman. They are rightly extremely angry about this service, just as Members of Parliament are. British Rail is not being blamed for this service. I and my parliamentary colleagues in Essex are being blamed. It is disgraceful that this is being allowed to happen. The general public are being given the impression, very quietly, that Members of Parliament are not being diligent in their duty in lobbying British Rail about its poor services. This is not the case.

I have not been a Member of Parliament for anywhere near as long as my right hon. Friends the Members for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) and for Southend, West (Mr.

Channon) but during the time that I have been here, I have been inundated with complaints from constituents on these subjects. Three years ago, there was a public meeting in Basildon on the subject. At that meeting, British Rail representatives gave—over the weeks after the meeting, I went to three railway stations which served my constituency and this was repeated—categorical assurances that there would be improvements. Instead, the service is even worse.

I have in my hand a letter dated June 1989 from the management of British Rail, talking about a 16 per cent. increase in passenger journeys, the opening of three new lines and 10 new stations, the electrification of 11 lines and the rebuilding or modernisation of 295 stations on Network SouthEast. What about our line? The letter says at the end:

"I hope that the enclosures are useful, and that your constituents start to see the improvements we are seeking over the course of the next few months."

Here we are, on 15 November 1991. Why have not those promises been delivered? Why is BR allowing parliamentarians to be used as the fall guys?

Six weeks ago, spurred on by the Basildon commuter group—I pay tribute to Mr. Martin Rams and his hard-working committee—I participated with it on a public journey. I arrived at Basildon station, but the British Rail representatives did not turn up, and the train was 20 minutes late. When it pulled in two of the carriages were closed and only one fifth of my constituents could get on the train. When we arrived at Fenchurch street station the British Rail representative charged up to me. I said, "Unless there has been a death in the family, I do not wish to hear the excuse." At that point a card was thrust into my hand. A box on it was ticked "Staff shortages". I took a taxi and arrived at my office at the House. I insisted on speaking to the chairman of British Rail, Sir Robert Reid. When I eventually spoke to him, he agreed to join us on our journey. I was invited to travel on the 8.34 am train. I wrote to my colleagues, asking them to join me on that train.

There is no 8.34 train. It should have been the 8.24. That is the level of incompetence with which we are dealing.

Mr. Tim Janman (Thurrock): Is my hon. Friend aware that, although in a somewhat more incognito fashion than he and my right hon. and hon. Friends, I made two return journeys on the Fenchurch Street line on 12 November, one from London to Grays and back in the morning and one from London to Tilbury and back in the rush hour peak? I can tell him that I had the same problems with delayed trains and late running as those that he experienced. When I was coming into Fenchurch Street I met my hon. Friend coming out, with steam coming from his ears.

Mr. Amess: I appreciate the reinforcement that my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Janman) has given to my statement. I wonder sometimes whether there are certain people in society who think that we are exaggerating the difficulties that our constituents experience.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay, my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point and I joined Sir Robert Reid on Tuesday, the journey was a fiasco. It was supposed to be a public relations exercise. It was an opportunity for my constituents, who are served at the stations of Laindon, Pitsea and Basildon, to see that British Rail was accepting responsibility. Unfortunately, that is not what happened. My right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point thought that he would be joining us from the 8.3 am train, but that train was cancelled.

I implore my hon. Friend the Minister to help my colleagues and myself in Essex. We need his help even more than we have before to ensure that British Rail takes our complaints seriously and to ensure that the railways service is improved dramatically.

2.47 pm

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): I shall be brief because I know that my hon. Friend the Minister wishes to reply.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) has said, my train was cancelled and Bod Reid's train out of Fenchurch Street station was jammed and accordingly was late. That is the way it goes. I support my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) for raising the matter. The line is a scandal and a disgrace. I would, as a start, sack the entire management. During a meeting with Bob Reid I asked for an explanation. He replied plaintively and said, "The signalling is 60 years old." He did not even know that the signalling was changed after the war when the line was electrified. Of course, if the signalling is defective that is a potent cause of delay and a reason why trains are cancelled. Apart from those consequences, it could be a recipe for disaster.

My hon. Friend the Minister must understand that we want action now. The line should be given complete priority. We know that British Rail has been receiving more money from the Government. Let some of it be devoted to ending the scandal to which my hon. Friends and I have referred.

2.48 pm

Mr. Tim Janman (Thurrock): I shall be extremely brief. As I have recently said, I travelled on the line, but in a somewhat more incognito fashion than my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) and others. I recommend that my hon. Friend the Minister also travels the line and that he speaks to the long suffering passengers and to ordinary station staff. He will learn that although the management that is responsible for the line is appalling, there are more than 90 members of it. We do not get very good results. Station staff, unless they are inspectors, are not allowed to stop passengers, even if they think that they are fiddling and travelling without a ticket. Accordingly, there is a massive loss of revenue. Money is also being wasted in employing various levels of management that are not needed.

Even in a period when British Rail has had the largest investment programme since the 1960s, since the change from steam to diesel, it seems that the line has been left permeditatively at the end of the queue by British Rail. The line is carrying an ever-increasing number of commuters. It is an important passenger and freight line serving south-west and south-east Essex and the east of London. Enough is enough is enough. The line needs to be rejuvenated, it needs investment, and we need that to start on Monday.

The Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Patrick McLoughlin): I congratulate and pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) for the concise way in which she introduced the debate and then gave time for others of our hon. Friends to speak. They, too, have serious concerns and I was well and truly exercised by the way in which they made their effective case.

I assure my hon. Friends that the Government take their concerns seriously. We are all well aware of how important an efficient rail service is to the everyday lives of travellers, especially those who have to travel to work. Delays and cancellations, old and unreliable trains, signal and points failures and even leaves on the line are problems that most of us have encountered. I certainly have great sympathy with those who are affected by frequent disruption to their journeys. There is nothing more annoying, especially when people are working to a timetable.

In the short time available to me, I wish to reiterate the Government's commitment to British Rail. We want more traffic, both passenger and freight, carried by rail. That can be achieved only if rail travel is an attractive alternative. We fully appreciate that. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) who was one Secretary of State for Transport who managed to secure significant investment funding for British Rail. He ensured that rather than over-subsidising British Rail, it received proper investment. He was responsible for important changes.

Our commitment to British Rail is undoubted. On InterCity, the electrification of the east coast main line and the provision of new InterCity 225 trains have just been completed at a cost of £450 million. On regional railways, the entire fleet of diesel trains is being renewed so that by the end of the next year all diesel vehicles will be under eight years old. In addition, more than 100 new stations have opened on those routes since 1982.

The south-east has the most intensively used urban rail network in Europe. It serves a catchment area with a population equal to that of the whole of Australia and it runs 93 million train miles every year. Network SouthEast is vital to London. It carries more than 40 per cent. of commuters into central London—almost half a million workers a day. Without it, road congestion would be intolerable and the environment and the economy of the city would suffer.

We all want Network SouthEast to provide a modern and efficient rail service and British Rail is committed to the progressive renewal of the system. More than 1,000 new vehicles have been introduced since 1986 and many improvements have been made to infrastructure. Network SouthEast is now pursuing a programme of total route modernisation to spread those benefits to the entire network.

I realise that that does not go very far in reassuring my hon. Friends' constituents and those who have to use the line. I am trying to show the Government's commitment to British Rail and to point out the important changes being made. Network SouthEast has to concentrate on a few routes at a time, modernising trains, tracks, stations and signals to gain the maximum benefits from investment.

The process of total route modernisation has already begun. The Chiltern line once suffered by far the worst service on Network SouthEast—although I am reluctant to say that, having heard my hon. Friends' complaints about their line. I understand that the Chiltern line was worse even than theirs.

Mrs. Gorman: Impossible.

Mr. McLoughlin: I said that I was reluctant to say that.

The Networker turbo diesel trains are now being delivered and will run to new, faster timetables in the new year. Every aspect of the service on the Chiltern line has been improved and performance has already shown significant improvements, even though the full fleet of trains has not yet entered service. The project cost more than £75 million.

Total route modernisation is also in progress on the busy Kent link lines, where almost 500 new Networker vehicles are on order. Old and unreliable slam-door trains need to be replaced when they reach the end of their useful life and associated fixed works will enable longer trains to run and so reduce overcrowding. The total cost of the Kent project is almost £700 million. All that adds up to a great deal of money—around £1 million a day over the past financial year for Network SouthEast alone. The Government are supporting the highest level of investment in the railways since the changeover from steam in the late 1950s and early 1960s. Much of the credit for that lies with my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West.

As part of our expenditure proposals this autumn, we were able to add nearly £1 billion to our existing plans for British Rail for 1992-93. British Rail's total external finances—including borrowing and grant—will amount to more than £2 billion next year. That is a substantial increase which will allow BR to proceed with investment despite the problems it faces in relation to forecasts for revenues and asset sales. That level of investment clearly shows our commitment to ensure that we improve the rail service for everyone and particularly people suffering on the worst lines.

Of course, not all those projects can be realised overnight; nor can they be realised everywhere at once. It is up to BR to set its priorities within the available resources. We give it the resources and it is right for BR to come to us and tell us where it believes those resources should be spent. We are doing what we can. There must be a rolling programme that will bring benefits of modernisation to the network as projects become necessary, worth while and affordable.

I want now to consider the specific points made by my colleagues about the London, Tilbury and Southend line. I acknowledge that the quality of the service on that line is quite unacceptable. I did not need to be convinced of that and the point has been endorsed today by the strong representations of my colleagues and by other colleagues who have not been present today for various reasons.

The poor service is due to the age of the equipment, not lack of will on BR's part. The staff are doing their utmost to provide the best possible service with the equipment. As has been said, one must have sympathy with the staff, particularly those who have to deal directly with the customers. It must be very frustrating for them. They try to do the best they can, but always meet a barrage of criticism.

The problem has recently been exacerbated by electrical faults on some trains. Immediate action was taken to ensure the safety of passengers, but regrettably that further reduced the number of seats available. Assessment of all trains is continuing and those which do not show a deterioration will return to normal running as soon as possible. Where faults have been identified, they are being corrected, but that is taking longer than we and BR had hoped. Overcrowding has been minimised by the introduction of rolling stock from other lines and retention of units which were due to be transferred elsewhere.

British Rail is doing what it can to make the situation tolerable for passengers. I realise that in some cases passengers can become more annoyed when they receive explanatory cards, but that is an attempt to tell them about the problems. I accept that the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay probably do not find that reassuring.

Such action is, of course, only a short-term measure. The longer-term solution is re-equipment. The Department has recently received proposals from BR for the complete modernisation of the London, Tilbury and Southend line. Those proposals are being dealt with as a matter of the highest priority. Discussions have already begun between officials and BR with a view to decisions being taken very quickly.

The total cost of the project is about £260 million. It consists of the complete renewal of the signalling system; the introduction of modern trains; and various smaller improvements. It is a very large and complex project and parts of the appraisal have yet to be completed. However, Ministers are determined that the project should be taken forward as quickly as possible without any unnecessary delay. To this end, I am pleased to be able to tell the House that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport has agreed that BR should go ahead with the renewal of the signalling system without waiting for the remainder of the project to be approved. I understand that Sir Bob Reid, the chairman of BR, is today announcing that £50 million will be allocated to the signalling work.

The signalling system is the most critical part of the project, as parts of the existing system are more than 40 years old. I accept the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine). It is an important element within the overall project and the Department is satisfied that it can proceed without prejudicing decisions that have yet to be taken on the rolling stock and other aspects of the project. The Government's decision to provide a substantial increase in funding for investment in the railways has enabled BR to allocate money to the project. Had it not been for the increases announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his autumn statement, that would not have happened. I hope that that shows our concern.

Mr. Channon: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's kind remarks. He has made a most encouraging statement this afternoon and my hon. Friends and I are very grateful. Will he press ahead with the rolling stock as soon as possible?

Mr. McLoughlin: We will be considering the rest of the appraisal as a matter of priority. Work will begin immediately on the specification for the design of the scheme with a view to placing contracts as soon as possible. Resignalling is awkward and trains must be kept running on time. Therefore, it will take some time for all the resignalling to be completed.

Work on the remainder of the project is continuing and it has a very high priority. I hope that it will not be too long before decisions can be taken on the remainder of the scheme and the appraisal and the investment needed to provide a modern and efficient network. We all want to see that and it will not be long delayed by the Department.

My right hon. and hon. Friends have today dramatically illustrated the way in which their constituents feel about the need for improvements. I hope that my announcement today and the announcement made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State before the appraisal, in very unusual terms, will go some way to help those people who use the line to understand that the Government are very committed and determined to——

The motion having been made at half-past Two o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at Three o'clock.

HOME DEPARTMENT

West Midlands Serious Crimes Squad

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received a report from the Police Complaints Authority on their supervision of the investigation of the West Midlands serious crimes squad; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have received a report from the Police Complaints Authority made under section 97(2) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 which I am required to lay before Parliament and publish under section 97(5) of the Act. Copies of this report have been placed in the Library and will be made available by my Department to anyone seeking a copy.

In August 1989 the chief constable of the West Midlands police disbanded the serious crimes squad and asked Mr. Shaw, an assistant chief constable of West Yorkshire police, to conduct an investigation into its activities. At the same time he invited the Police Complaints Authority to supervise the investigation under section 88 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. The Police Complaints Authority has issued a statement in accordance with section 89(10) of the Act confirming that the investigation has been conducted to its satisfaction.

The Police Complaints Authority report falls into two parts. The first part describes the investigation of complaints relating to cases handled by the serious crimes squad. The main investigation covered the period between 1 January 1986 and the disbandment of the squad. In that period 694 arrests were recorded in the serious crimes squad's arrest book. Seventy of the people arrested as well as 16 other people, made complaints to the investigating officer. Complaints from 11 people relating to the period between 29 April 1984 and 1 January 1986 were also investigated. One case was subsequently withdrawn.

The 1984 Act requires that the report on any complaint against a police officer where criminal behaviour may have taken place must be referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions. All the complaints just mentioned have therefore been so referred but the fact of referral does not imply that criminal offences have necessarily been committed. It is for the Director of Public Prosecutions to decide whether or not the evidence suggests that any criminal proceedings should be taken.

The second part of the PCA report describes management practices prevalent during the period in question which may have contributed to the problems described. I am glad to be able to report to the House that these management practices have already been addressed by the chief constable of the West Midlands, in consultation with the west midlands police authority. A copy of a report which he has sent to me describing the action which has already been taken has been placed in the Library with the report of the Police Complaints Authority for the information of hon. Members. Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary will be monitoring the action taken in respect of all the points raised.

Decisions as to whether any disciplinary action would be appropriate in respect of particular officers cannot be taken until the Crown Prosecution Service has completed its consideration of the possibility of criminal charges.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Indochina

Mr. Jim Lester: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on aid to Indochina.

Mrs. Chalker: On the occasion of the signing of the Cambodian peace settlement on 23 October we announced a number of new aid commitments for Indochina. These commitments are targeted on the needs of the countries concerned and take into account the changed circumstances in the region.

In Cambodia a key element in our aid strategy is to encourage a responsible and co-ordinated approach to the tasks of reconstruction and development, with due regard to local institutional, social and environmental factors. The success of the reconstruction and development effort will be critical to the economic progress and political stability of the country and therefore to the durability of the peace settlement. With these considerations in mind we intend to post an experienced aid administrator to our diplomatic mission in Phnom Penh as well as making available a senior medical adviser from the Overseas Development Administration to the World Health Organisation Office there. The main components in our aid programme to Cambodia will be:

English Language training for local administrators and others involved in the development process; a continuation of the support we have already provided for programmes and projects directed to help vulnerable groups. This will include continued support for non-government organisations development and health projects, for volunteers and for a World Health Organisation anti-malaria programme; support for economic development activities related to Cambodia sponsored by the Mekong committee.

For these purposes we are making an initial allocation of £3 million. We shall also be contributing £2 million to the appeal by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for financial support for the repatriation of the people in camps on the Thai/Cambodia border. We stand ready to consider, with other donors, provision of additional financial support.

For Vietnam, we shall be providing £3 million bilaterally towards the international reintegration programme for returned economic migrants. We are also contributing substantially to this programme through our share of the EC budget. We shall also offer a training project to support the economic reform process that is now under way in Vietnam. This project would involve training in such subjects as finance, banking, enterprise restructuring and environmental economics. British non-Government organisations working in Vietnam with Overseas Development Administration support have already put in place a number of sound development projects. We shall continue to support their activities through Overseas Development Administration's joint funding scheme.

I have also approved a small projects scheme for Laos to finance projects designed to help the poorer members of the community.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Tax Returns

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can announce the figure below which from next April taxpayers will be able to submit simpler accounts to the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Maude: From next April a further half million people will be able to save themselves the time and expense of preparing detailed accounts for the Inland Revenue.

The level of business turnover or gross rental income below which taxpayers may submit three-line statements instead of full accounts is to be increased from £10,000 to £15,000. The new amount will apply to accounts received by the Inland Revenue on or after 6 April 1992.

This increase follows an announcement by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget, and reflects the Government's commitment to reduce taxpayers' costs by cutting down paper work where they can.

Official Report (Price)

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the price of the Official Report.

Mr. Maples: Following a review by Her Majesty's Stationery Office I have authorised increases of £1·50 in the prices of the Daily Parts and Standing Committee debates, with broadly proportionate increases in the prices of the Weekly Part, Bound Volumes and Indexes. Subscription rates will be adjusted accordingly and the scale of charges for reprints of Members' speeches appearing in the Official Report will also be raised. These increases, coupled with plans to enable the reports of proceedings to be "machine read" by the HMSO presses, should permit the final elimination of the revenue subsidy, which has been progressively reduced from £6·0 million in 1983-84.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Resettlement Units Executive Agency

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the annual report and accounts of the Resettlement Units Executive Agency for 1990-91 will be available.

Miss Widdecombe: Copies of the annual report and accounts for 1990-91 have today been placed in the Library.

Information Technology Services Executive Agency

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether the annual report and accounts of the Information Technology Services Executive Agency for 1990-91 are yet available.

Miss Widdecombe: The annual report and accounts have today been placed in the Library.

Child Support Act 1991

Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he plans to consult interested organisations about the content of the regulations to be made under the Child Support Act 1991.

Mr. Jack: The consultation document containing the Government's detailed proposals for the contents of the regulations arising from the Child Support Act 1991 has been published today. Copies have been placed in the Library of both Houses, and are available from the Vote Office and from the Department. Some 100 organisations with a particular interest in the subject will be sent a copy of the document and invited to submit their views by 16 December 1991.

HEALTH

NHS Trusts

Mr. Lee: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the names of those people appointed to be chairmen and non-executive directors of the second wave of national health service trusts.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have today placed in the Library a list of those people appointed as chairmen and non-executive directors of the trusts established today.

Nursing and Midwifery Staff

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nursing and midwifery staff there were in each broad pay group in 1989 and 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information is shown in table 1.

The fall in the number of senior nurses is largely attributable to the voluntary transfer of more than 600 senior nurses to the senior manager pay structure.

The fall in the number of nurse learners is largely attributable to the cessation of enrolled nurse training and to the introduction of Project 2000. The estimated number of Project 2000 students in training in 1989 and 1990 is shown in table 2. Because of their supernumerary status, Project 2000 students are not included in statistics relating to staff in post.

Census (Confidentiality)

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether subsequent to its main review of confidentiality arrangements for the computer processing of 1991 census data, the British Computer Society has reported on the documents for later completion which it wished to scrutinise.

Mr. Dorrell: The British Computer Society has completed this work and reported its results in the document "report of the Supplementary Review". Copies of this Report were issued with an OPCS press notice on 16 September and a copy was placed in the Library. This supplements the society's main report, published in the White Paper "1991 Census of Population: Confidentiality and Computing" (Cm 447) and completes its review. The "Report of the Supplementary Review" records that the documents reviewed meet the society's objectives, and commends the care demonstrated by the census offices' staff with regard to confidentiality.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Foreign Affairs Council

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a statement on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council on 21 October.

Mr. Hurd: The Foreign Affairs Council met in Luxembourg on 21 October to pursue its negotiations on the European Economic Area (EEA). The EEA is intended to extend the single market to the seven countries of the European Free Trade Association (EFTA) from 1 January 1992. My hon. Friends the Minister for Trade, the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, and the Parliamentary Secretary, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food represented the United Kingdom. Representatives of the EFTA countries were in Luxembourg. The two sides reached political agreement on all the key outstanding issues in the negotiations.

On fish, the two sides agreed that under the EEA the EFTA countries will remove all tariffs on imports from the EC of fish species and products. The Community will reduce or remove tariffs on imports from EFTA of most species and products. Full tariffs will remain on certain sensitive species such as salmon, mackerel and herring. The EFTA countries have also undertaken to adapt their national legislation to avoid distortion of competition in the fisheries sector.

Norway will guarantee the EC's share at north Norway of the total allowable catch for north east Arctic cod and increase it from its present level of 2·14 per cent. to 2·9 per cent. This will continue to be allocated within the Community in accordance with the present arrangements. The United Kingdom will thus receive around two thirds of this allocation. Norway will also make available to the Community a separate fixed quantity of north Norway cod: 6,000 tonnes in 1993, rising to 11,000 tonnes in 1997. The United Kingdom will not benefit from this. Iceland will make available to the Community a quantity of redfish or redfish equivalent as an exchange of fishing opportunities. The allocation of this within the Community will be decided later, though we have made clear that our historic rights in the area should be taken into account. The arrangements for allocation within the Community of fish obtained under the EEA will not prejudice the principle of relative stability or the 1992 review of the common fisheries policy.

The two sides reached agreement on the cohesion fund, through which EFTA will give financial support to less favoured regions of the Community. The fund will comprise 500 mecu in grants and 1·5 becu in soft loans. Northern Ireland will be eligible. The other recipients will be Spain, Portugal, Greece and the Republic of Ireland.

The Community also reached agreement in principle with Austria and Switzerland in the negotiations on Alpine transit. There will be a limited increase in the numbers of Community trucks permitted to pass through the two countries, in exchange for measures to reduce pollution and encourage the use of alternative means of transport.

The two sides will now aim to complete work rapidly on the text of the draft EEA agreement, with a view to signature later this year. A statement will be made to the House prior to signature.

This meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council has thus cleared the way for the conclusion of the EEA agreement. I warmly welcome this. The EEA will create the largest single market in the world and facilitate membership of the Community for those EFTA countries who wish to join. I believe that the EEA will be good for the United Kingdom, good for the Community, and good for the wider Europe.

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a statement on forthcoming business in the EC Council of Ministers.

Mr. Garel Jones: The Telecommunications Council will meet on 4 November. Ministers will discuss the draft directive on high definition television; a proposal to harmonise radio frequency bands as from 1 January 1992 for the introduction of digital short range radio; the draft directive on the harmonisation of leased lines; and the harmonisation of the internal telephone access code to 00. Ministers will also discuss the satellite communications work programme, and will make a statement on the postal services Green Paper.

The Foreign Affairs Council will meet on 4 November. It will discuss EC/Jordan relations in preparation for the meeting of the EC/Jordan co-operation Council which will take place that evening. It will review the successful negotiations of the comprehensive settlement agreements signed by the Paris conference on Cambodia on 23 October. The Council will also discuss EC immigration issues possible measures against Yugoslavia and the GATT Uruguay round. Ministers will review progress in the Inter-Governmental Conference on Political Union. Ministers will also meet the Arab Maghreb Union.

The Labour and Social Affairs Council will meet on 6 November. Ministers may discuss the proposed directives on the protection of pregnant workers, and working time. Ministers may also discuss the Commission report on poverty.

The Internal Market Council will meet on 7 November and Ministers will discuss the proposed sweeteners directive. Ministers are also likely to discuss vehicle type approval, and the European company statute. Ministers may also discuss food irradiation; the pensions fund directive; trans European networks; and the Presidency situation report on the state of Internal Market Council work.

The Health Council will meet on 11 November. Ministers may discuss an amending proposal for a Council directive amending Directive 89/622 on the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the member states concerning the labelling of tobacco products, and on the prohibition of the marketing of certain types of tobacco for oral use; and a Commission draft directive for a ban on tobacco advertising. In the absense of opinions from the European Parliament and the Economic and Social Affairs Committee there will only be an "orientation" debate on this issue. Ministers are likely to discuss the link between health and the environment in the context of a draft resolution to request the Commission to draw up an inventory of initiatives in national and international forums. Ministers might also discuss the critical choices in health policy which face member states; needs of drug addicts in prison; and of proposals for an integrated system for future licensing of medicines for human veterinary use in the EC. Ministers may also discuss overall health policy concerning drug abuse; the Commission proposal that 1995 should be European Code on Doping in Sport Year. There will be a Commission presentation on measures to control AIDS.

The Economic and Finance Council will meet on 11 November and will consider member states' programmes for economic convergence as part of the Council's regular multilateral surveillance; the remaining tranches of the balance of payments loans to Bulgaria and Romania; the new 1·25 billion ecu food credit package for the Soviet Union; the Commission proposal for the revision of the financial perspective; and measures to reduce carbon dioxide emissions including a possible carbon/energy tax in the Community. Ministers will discuss the abolition of fiscal frontiers and hope to reach agreement on the legal text of the excise movements directive. Ministers may also discuss the investment services directive.

The Budget Council will meet on 12 November and Ministers may discuss the European Parliament's amendments and modifications as a result of their first reading of the draft budget for 1992.

The Justice Council will meet on 13 November. Ministers are likely to consider the results of work on the relationship between Community law and national criminal law, particularly in respect of fraud against the Community budget. Ministers may also consider data processing for legal purposes, and judicial training within the member states.

The Cultural Affairs Council will meet on 14 November. Ministers are likely to agree two Presidency resolutions promoting cooperation over cultural networks and conservation and access to archives. Ministers will also discuss the Commission's paper on future cultural priorities and an Italian paper on the promotion of theatrical events in 1993. Ministers may also consider the Commission's proposals on national art treasures. The Agriculture Council will meet on 18 and 19 November and Ministers will discuss reform of the common agricultural policy; the agricultural aspects of the GATT Uruguay round; welfare of pigs and calves, and the transitional reform of the oilseeds regime. Ministers may also discuss meat products; foot and mouth disease vaccine banks; a co-ordination centre for foot and mouth disease; classical swine fever and non-harmonised animals.

The Industry Council will meet on 18 November and Ministers will consider the Commission communications on biotechnology, textiles and maritime industries. Ministers will also discuss a draft resolution on the electronics and information technology industries; and state aids.

The Education Council will meet on 25 November and Ministers are likely to discuss the teaching profession and the Commission's memorandum on higher education, covering quality assessment and mobility. Ministers may also discuss the statute for the European Schools; and the European Dimension in education.

The Fisheries Council will meet on 26 November and Ministers will consider EC negotiations with third countries; and 1992 fish guide pricing. Ministers may also discuss technical conservation measures.

The Development Council will meet on 28 November and Ministers are likely to consider Presidency proposals for operational guide-lines on human rights and democracy for all EC aid; the Commission report on the progress of the programming of Lomé IV and on the evaluation of Community aid; the Presidency report on the fact finding missions to Ethiopia and Bangladesh; and the Commission proposals for the coordination and management of emergency aid. Ministers may discuss the EC aspects of the preparations for the 1992 United Nations conference on the environment and development; and the administration of the next five year programme for Asia and Latin America. Ministers may also discuss the rehabilitation plan for Angola; and the untying of aid. Ministers may consider Commission proposals for a new period of the programme for the stabilisation of export earnings; and a further pilot stage of the EC investment partners scheme.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Veterinary Medicines Directorate

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what change he is making to the framework document for the veterinary medicines directorate.

Mr. Gummer: As part of a recent reorganisation of the duties of senior officials in my Department, the responsibility of chairing the ownership board for the veterinary medicines directorate (VMD) has been transferred from the grade 2, food safety to the chief scientific adviser. This has necessitated a minor revision to paragraph 4.3 of the VMD framework document, copies of which amendment have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

ENVIRONMENT

Business and the Environment

Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has responded to the initial report of the Advisory Committee on Business and the Environment.

Mr. Heseltine: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I have received a first report from the Advisory Committee on Business and the Environment, and we have today sent the chairman our response.

I shall place copies of both the report and our response in the Library of the House.

Buying Agency

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made towards establishing the Buying Agency as an executive agency.

Mr. Heseltine: I am pleased to announce that yesterday I established the Buying Agency as an executive agency within my Department. It is the fourth agency to be set up within the Department of the Environment under "next steps".

The Buying Agency—TBA for short—is a public sector procurement agency. Its primary purpose is to provide the means for Government departments to obtain a wide range of engineering, building, maintenance and domestic products and services under arrangements that provide quality assurance and value for money, and which comply with public purchasing policy and regulations. Other TBA customers include the national health service and other non-departmental public bodies.

Last year TBA became an independently accountable division of the Crown Suppliers, under whose wing it had operated for a number of years. Earlier this year, after the closure of its parent body, the House agreed that TBA should operate its business within its own trading fund. I am confident that the combination of this financial regime, the additional management freedoms resulting from TBA's new status as an executive agency and the scope it has to develop its business on sound commercial lines will enable the agency to deliver increasing improvements in its service to customers and better value for money to the taxpayer.

The agency is already well on the way to meeting the financial targets I have set to the end of 1991. These are:

—in respect of each financial year, to make a profit after interest in current cost terms of 1·5 per cent. of the total value of goods and services procured; —to increase the total value of goods and services procured, in a customer driven away, from £97 million in 1990 to £111 million in 1991, and to progressively higher levels in successive years.

In addition, I also propose targets for improving the quality of service, in line with the aims of the citizens charter:

—to answer complaints on poor service/late delivery within three working days;

—to ensure quoted delivery times are met in 90 per cent. of cases.

I have appointed Mr. Roger Powell to be chief executive of TBA for the next three years. He will be directly accountable to me for the management and performance of the agency. I wish him and all the staff of The Buying Agency every success for the future.

The arrangements for the agency are described in full in its framework document, copies of which have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Finance

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the estimated cost to local authorities of preparing for the council tax and the Government's plan for supporting this expenditure.

Mr. Portillo: We commissioned CSL management consultants to look into the likely costs of preparing for the council tax and they have advised that authorities in England will have to spend an estimated £156 million between now and 1 April 1993—mainly in 1992-93. I have placed a copy of the report in the Library. The Government have decided in 1992-93 to pay 75 per cent. grant, worth £86 million, in support of estimated revenue costs of £114·6 million and to issue supplementary credit approvals in support of capital expenditure of up to £41·2 million.

HEALTH

Office of Population Censuses and Surveys

Mr. Tracey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys is being considered for agency status.

Mr. Dorrell: The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys is now a candidate to become an agency under the Government's "next steps" policy during 1992-93.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Vietnamese Migrants

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Vietnamese migrants in Hong Kong.

Mr. Hurd: On 29 October, the British, Hong Kong and Vietnamese Governments signed a statement of understanding for the orderly repatriation from Hong Kong of Vietnamese illegal immigrants—that is, those who, having left Vietnam clandestinely, have been determined under the screening procedures monitored by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees not to be refugees.

The internationally agreed comprehensive plan of action provision that all those who are not refugees should return home will now be implemented in stages. Vietnamese who, having left Vietnam clandestinely, arrive in Hong Kong from 29 October, will be screened on arrival in accordance with the agreed UNHCR procedures and the provisions of the CPA and Hong Kong law. For those screened out, there will be a full appeals procedure conducted by an independent review board. The screening procedures will be monitored by the UNHCR who will have full access to the migrants throughout the process and will help asylum seekers to prepare appeals. Those migrants who are screened out and whose appeals fail or who decide not to appeal will be offered voluntary repatriation with a resettlement allowance. Only those who refuse this option will be returned under the new arrangement.

Now that the Government of Vietnam have accepted the principle of return of those who are not refugees to Vietnam under the CPA, we will be discussing with them the extension of the scheme to migrants who arrived in Hong Kong before 29 October.

The Vietnamese Government have guaranteed that no illegal immigrant who returns to Vietnam will face persecution. They will continue to facilitate the monitoring of all those who return, by the UNHCR and others, to ensure that these guarantees are fully respected. In the last two and a half years more than 11,000 Vietnamese migrants have returned voluntarily to Vietnam without a single substantiated case of persecution. We hope that in due course Members of Parliament will be able to visit Hong Kong and Vietnam to see how the return arrangements are working.

Aung San Suu Kyi

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has about Aung San Suu Kyi of the National League for Democracy in Burma and other detained leaders of the democratic movement in Burma.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: It is difficult to verify the number of political detainees in Burma held since the suppression of the democracy movement in 1988. Local estimates suggest the number may be around 2,000, including many hundreds of party workers from Aung San Suu Kyi's National League for Democracy party. This total also includes at least 55 out of 485 Members of Parliament elected in the 1990 democratic elections, the results of which have been ignored. Of the leaders apart from Aung San Suu Kyi, the former NLD chairman U Tin U was sentenced to three years' hard labour in December 1989; U Kyi Maung, the former acting chairman, was initially given a three-year sentence in November 1990, subsequently extended a further 10 years; and U Nu, the former Prime Minister, remains under house arrest imposed in December 1989. We have repeatedly called in public statements for the release of all political detainees in Burma.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by, for, or on behalf of the Lord Chancellor's Department or the Law Officers since 11 July 1991.

The Attorney-General: One such survey has been carried out by the Lord Chancellor's Department since 11 July. This was an exit survey conducted in a sample of courts on the northern circuit by the north west legal services committee. It was commissioned in May 1991, and it was undertaken on various dates during the summer. In the survey the public were asked to answer a number of questions on the quality of the service and facilities that had been provided for them in the court.

No national public opinion survey has been conducted by any of the departments for which I am responsible since 11 July 1991. No records are held centrally of any local surveys that may have been conducted by area staff of the Crown prosecution service, and such information could be acquired only at disproportionate cost.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by the Lord Chancellor's Department during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (a) the topic, (b) the commencement date, (c) the duration and (d) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor's Department has no plans to carry out any television advertising campaigns during 1991-92, nor any individual publicity campaigns costing more than £100,000.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General if he will give separate figures for spending by the Lord Chancellor's Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

The Attorney-General: The figures for the Lord Chancellor's Department, excluding staff costs, are as follows:

	1988-89 £	1989-90 £	1990-91 £	1991-92 £[1]
Television advertising	Nil	Nil	Nil	Nil
Radio advertising	Nil	Nil	Nil	Nil
Newspaper advertising	15,000	3,967	50,242	4,900
Other promotional material	32,500	31,208	77,968	69,550

[1] Estimated.

Figures for the budget for 1992-93 will not be available until after the autumn statement and after budgets have been finalised.

The breakdown of the amounts spent on respective areas and the amounts spent for the previous years can be obtained only at disproportionate cost, but the total expenditure, including staff costs, was:

1984-85	135,730
1985-86	176,613
1986-87	148,020
1987-88	137,001

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General whether the Lord Chancellor's Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor's Department has not sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General what was the total expenditure by the Lord Chancellor's Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

The Attorney-General: Total expenditure on press and public relations excluding staff costs is as follows:

1984-85	5,180
1985-86	13,253
1986-87	23,282
1987-88	34,500
1988-89	34,159
1989-90	33,616
1990-91	[1]36,960

[1] As revised

The revised 1990-91 figure was lower than anticipated because the Lord Chancellor's Department was not required to contribute to the Children Act publicity to the extent originally envisaged.

The amounts spent between 1979 and 1984 can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The estimate for 1991-92 is £63,450. This includes the Lord Chancellor's Department press office's additional responsibility for departmental leaflets, the increased cost of publicity to explain the role of the courts and the judiciary, to expand public understanding in areas where new legislation is proposed or implemented, or law reforms considered.

Figures for the budget for 1992-93 will not be available until after the autumn statement and after budgets have been finalised.

ENVIRONMENT

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 11 July.

Mr. Heseltine: The following surveys, carried out by my Department since 11 July 1991, include questions to individuals about their opinions:

Evaluation of the DOE "Wake-Up" leaflet.
Monitoring Housing Management Performance in Housing Associations and Local Authorities.
Survey of Household Budgets and Housing Costs.
Evaluation of Block Action.
Development Work for 1991 English House Condition Survey: (a) Dairy System (b) Pre-pilot.
National Survey on attitudes towards Environmental Noise (fieldwork in progress).
Energy Efficiency Campaign—Creative Development Research [Stage 1 and Stage 2] (jointly sponsored with the Department of Energy).
Evaluation of Energy Efficiency Campaign (jointly sponsored with the Department of Energy).

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what was the total expenditure by the Nature Conservancy Council on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93;

(2) if he will give separate figures for spending by the Nature Conservancy Council on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. Heseltine: I have asked the chairman of the Nature Conservancy Council to write to the hon. Member with the information requested.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether his Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material;

(2) if he will give separate figures for spending by the Ordnance Survey on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93;

(3) what was the total expenditure by the Ordnance Survey on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Heseltine: I will ask the Director General of Ordnance Survey to reply to the hon. Member on behalf of his organisation.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by (a) the Department of the Environment, (b) Ordnance Survey, (c) the Nature Conservancy Council and (d) the Countryside Commission during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (i) the topic, (ii) the commencement date, (iii) the duration and (iv) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Mr. Heseltine: My Department has carried out no television advertising during 1991-92 and has no plans to do so.

I gave the hon. Member information regarding my Department's expenditure on publicity campaigns costing more than £100,000 on 1 July 1991. The advertising company Collett, Dickenson, Pearce and Partners has been selected to undertake strategic and creative work for the joint campaign with the Department of Energy to promote home energy efficiency. The public relations firm Maxima has been selected to carry out promotional work for the campaign. The campaign begins today and is intended to run for at least three years.

I will ask the Director General of Ordnance Survey and the chairmen of the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission to write to the hon. Member replying for their organisations.

Mr. Frank Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. Heseltine: In May 1989, deliveries of a leaflet explaining the community charge were made to 19 million households in England. In January 1990, my Department sent leaflets to 1·6 million businesses giving details of the new business rate. In February 1991, a leaflet explaining the dangers of radon in houses and inviting householders to take advantage of free radon testing was delivered to 660,000 households in Devon and Cornwall.

From time to time, samples of the Department's publications are sent directly to interested bodies for information.

Local Authority Pension Scheme

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to equalise female contribution survivor benefits within the local authority superannuation pension scheme.

Mr. Heseltine: Regulations are being prepared to amend the local government superannuation scheme to provide equal survivor benefits. Subject to the necessary parliamentary procedures, the regulations will come into force as soon as possible.

Standard Spending Assessments

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the standard spending assessments for each education and social services authority for (a) education and (b) social services functions for the years 1989-90, 1990-91 and 1991-92, together with a description of how those standard spending assessments were constructed.

Mr. Key: Standard spending assessments—SSAs—replaced grant-related expenditure assessments—GREs—in 1990-91. The education and social services SSAs for each relevant local authority in England are given in tables 2A, in £s million, and 2B, £s per adult, of the "Standard Spending Assessment Handbook 1990/91" and the "Standard Spending Assessment Handbook 1991/92".

The method used to calculate these SSAs is set out in "The Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England)" and "The Revenue Support Grant Distribution (Amendment) Report (England)". The 1989-90 GREs for education and social services are shown in table C.3.1 of "The Technical Handbook of Grant-Related Expenditure 1989-90" and the method of calculation is described in "The Rate Support Grant Report (England) 1989/90". All these documents are in the Library.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Mr. Heseltine: No.

Thames House, Millbank

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether planning consent was sought by his Department from Westminster council prior to building the eight-storey block between the arches of Thames House, Millbank.

Mr. Yeo: Planning consultation under DOE circular 18/84 took place between the Property Services Agency and Westminster city council between September 1989 and November 1989. On 9 November 1989, Westminster city council confirmed that it had decided to raise no objections to the proposals put forward, in respect of both listed building consent and planning consent.

Sports Clubs (Rates)

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many non-profit making sports clubs in England applied for rate relief for each of the financial years 1979-80 to 1991-92 and as a total over the same period; and how many of these clubs were granted rate relief of (a) 25 per cent. or under, (b) 25 to 50 per cent., (c) 50 to 65 per cent., (d) 65 to 90 per cent. and (e) 90 to 100 per cent.

Mr. Key: The information requested is not available. However, the results of a recent departmental survey, based on returns received from 81 per cent. of local authorities, reveal that more non-profit making recreational clubs received more relief in 1990-91 than in 1989-90, the last year of general rates. The table shows the number of properties occupied by non-profit making recreational clubs receiving relief in the two years and the percentage amounts of relief given.

Year	Number of properties receiving relief	Number of properties granted relief of:
		less than 20 per cent.	21-50 per cent.	51-80 per cent.	more than 80 per cent.
1989-90	8,500	300	5,200	1,100	1,900
1990-91	10,200	700	3,900	2,800	2,900

Figures may not sum due to rounding.

Right to Buy

Sir William Shelton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he intends to take on the performance of Lambeth in processing right-to-buy applications.

Mr. Yeo: Lambeth is one of several London authorities where large numbers of tenants have experienced delays in the processing of their right-to-buy applications and who have thus been denied their statutory rights. The performance of all London authorities is monitored annually, and the poorest performers are required to submit monthly reports. In March 1989 the Government introduced procedures which enabled tenants to have rent counted as advance payments towards purchase of their home if sale was delayed. Through this measure, the tenant gains some recompense and the authority loses part of the receipt on sale.

Following these measures the number of delays in monitored authorities has fallen dramatically, from 15,457 in March 1989 to 3,712 in September 1990. Most London authorities now have only a handful of cases, if any, where tenants are being delayed in the exercise of their statutory right. Only two authorities are still subject to monthly monitoring—Lambeth and Hackney.

Lambeth accounted for 40 per cent. of the total cases delayed in London in September 1990. On the basis of the most recent return, Lambeth still has 843 cases out of time, which is three times as many as the next worst authority. Not only are right-to-buy applicants continuing to suffer, but Lambeth tenants and residents as a whole pay for this inefficiency through the receipts forgone on delayed sales. This is clearly unacceptable. On 29 October I therefore invited the leader of Lambeth council and his senior relevant officials to meet me to discuss this situation and what needs to be done to bring Lambeth's right-to-buy performance to an acceptable level.

Local Government (Competitive Tendering)

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish his proposals for extending the requirement for compulsory competitive tendering for local authority services.

Mr. Portillo: I am today publishing "Competing for Quality—Competition in the Provision of Local Services", in order to start the process of consulting widely on the Government's proposals for clarifying and extending the requirement for compulsory competitive tendering for local authority services. The citizens charter underlines our belief that the widest possible application of competition will bring benefits to the local taxpayer and the consumer. The consultation paper, therefore, seeks to tighten up on anti-competitive behaviour so that private firms have a fair chance to compete for local authority contracts, and explains how we propose to extend compulsory competitive tendering to a wide range of professional and technical activities. Copies are being placed in the Library.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total expenditure by the Countryside Commission on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Heseltine: I have asked the chairman of the Countryside Commission to write to the hon. Member with the information requested.

TRANSPORT

Transpennine Road Crossing

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he now proposes to publish the report on the consultation on a possible transpennine road crossing.

Mr. Chope: As soon as possible.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. McLoughlin: The spending by my Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year and the estimated spending in 1991-92 is as follows:

	Television £,000	Radio £,000	Newspaper £,000	Other £,000
1979-80	4,141	62	105	1,532
1980-81	3,502	336	129	1,737
1981-82	3,615	6	410	1,457
1982-83	2,319	98	816	1,415
1983-84	4,655	22	334	1,488
1984-85	1,723	207	476	2,873
1985-86	70	858	834	4,026
1986-87	72	520	738	4,489
1987-88	2,310	50	140	3,010
1988-89	1,867	110	365	3,367
1989-90	1,930	233	982	3,289
1990-91	3,122	145	833	3,962
1991-92	3,414	306	794	5,053

Detailed decisions have not yet been taken on expenditure by media for 1992-93, but the overall figure is expected to be approximately £9·5 million.

The increase in expenditure this year is largely due to the child road safety campaign; other major areas of expenditure include campaigns on drink driving and rear seat belts.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by his Department during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (a) the topic, (b) the commencement date, (c) the duration and (d) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Mr. McLoughlin: The following television advertising campaigns have been carried out or are planned by my Department in 1991-92:

Topic	Commencement date	Duration	Company
Child road safety —cycle helmets	23 April	3 weeks	Miller and Leeves WAHT
—driving speeds	21 October	3 weeks	DMB and B
Drinking and driving	3 December	4 weeks	DMB and B

The following publicity campaigns costing more than £100,000 have been or are being carried out in 1991-92:

Topic	Commencement date	Duration	Company
New rear seat belt legislation	1 June	4 weeks	Miller and Leeves WAHT
Drinking and driving	1 July	4 weeks	Miller and Leeves WAHT
Coastal safety	—	Ongoing	None
Transport and the environment	6 July	Ongoing	None
Safety on the Move exhibition programme	—	Ongoing	None
Road Traffic Act	15 August	Ongoing	None

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. McLoughlin: The total expenditure on the Department's press and public relations office since 1984-85 is as follows:

1984-85	339,426
1985-86	354,393
1986-87	363,446
1987-88	389,473
1988-89	437,950
1989-90	451,214
1990-91	517,905
[1]1991-92	565,336
[2]1992-93	590,776

[2] Budget.

These figures cover the overall costs of running the press office, calculated using the ready reckoner for staff-related costs.

Before 1984-85 the information division was a common service of the Departments of Transport and the Environment and the Property Services Agency.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. McLoughlin: No.

A12

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement detailing his plans for the future of the A12 trunk road in Suffolk in respect of dualling and bypasses; and the latest timetable for each section.

Mr. Chope: The proposals to upgrade the A12 in Suffolk north of Ipswich to a two-lane dual carriageway have been split into five schemes. The latest timetables for each section are as follows. The whole programme of improvements should be completed by the end of the decade.

(1) Martlesham to Wickham Market:—Preferred route decision Autumn 1992.
(2) Wickham Market to Saxmundham Bypass:—Publication of draft orders Summer 1992.
(3) Saxmundham Bypass dualling:—Publication of draft orders Spring 1993.
(4) Saxmundham Bypass—South of Wrentham:—Preferred route decision late 1993.
(5) South of Wrentham-Kessingland:—Preferred route decision late 1992.

Barrow Crossings

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has had over the Health and Safety Executive decision to take away barrow crossings at stations.

Mr. Freeman: The Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate supports British Rail's decision to remove barrow crossings from locations where they are no longer needed because of the risk of unauthorised use which presents a safety hazard, particularly at unmanned stations and at those where there is third rail electrification. A few letters have been received from people who formerly used them.

Public Expenditure

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish an updated version of table 7.18 of chapter 7 of the 1990-91 to 1992-93 public expenditure White Paper, Cm. 1007, extending the series there up to date.

Mr. Chope: The figures are published in table 1 of "National road maintenance condition survey. Report on the 1990 survey". A copy is in the Library. Figures previously published in Cm. 1007 have been revised following a review of the way the index is calculated, carried out in particular to ensure that the cost weightings used take account of current maintenance practices.

Bypasses (Compensation)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the number of claims for compensation for noise and disturbance arising from the construction of (a) the A696 Woolsington bypass and (b) the A1 Newcastle western bypass; and how many of those claims had been settled by 1 October.

Mr. Chope: The number of claims under part I of the Land Compensation Act 1973 received in respect of the A696 Woolsington bypass and A1 Newcastle western bypass are 104 and 550 respectively. None of these claims had been settled by 1 October.

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 11 July 1991.

Mr. McLoughlin: My Department regularly commissions surveys. A list of all surveys is maintained, but it is not possible to identify easily from this list those surveys which include questions of opinion. The answer on 11 July 1991 to the hon. Member referred to 101 surveys of all types reported to the Department's survey control unit in 1990. A further 69 have been reported since and I am sending a list of these to the hon. Member.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Mr. McLoughlin: No. Some officials came to Blackpool to discuss departmental business and then left.

Channel Tunnel

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated number of (a) private cars and (b) lorries entering and leaving the channel tunnel portal at Folkestone from the Eurotunnel shuttle service in (i) 1993, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 2003.

Mr. Freeman: The latest available figures are contained in a report published in August 1990 by the cross-channel traffic group. The report provides estimates of the total number of cars and goods vehicles using the tunnel on an average annual day. The table shows the figures multiplied by 365:

	Cars	Goods vehicles
2003	4,352,990	888,045

No estimate was made for 1998.

Vehicle Air Bags

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what studies his Department has undertaken to examine the feasibility of introducing air bags into vehicles for safety purposes.

Mr. Chope: The Department is currently studying the experiences of USA and Canada in the application of air bags, in both research conditions and production vehicles. Information from this study will be considered in the development of proposals for an improved European standard for vehicle occupant protection in frontal impacts.

There is no restriction on the introduction and use of air-bags in cars in the United Kingdom. It would not be sensible, however, to make fitment compulsory in the absence of an agreed European standard. Meanwhile, seat belts, which are both effective and cheaper to fit than air bags, will remain the main secondary safety feature in vehicles in the United Kingdom.

Disabled Rail Passengers

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it part of British Rail's quality of service objectives that all British Rail stations are fully accessible to disabled passengers.

Mr. McLoughlin: British Rail already does much to make its network accessible to those with disabilities. I expect BR's commitment to improving the existing arrangements to be set out in the forthcoming BR passengers charter.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consultations he has had with British Rail over the funding of disabled access to stations.

Mr. McLoughlin: The funding of access to stations for disabled people is not considered as a separate issue. Rather, British Rail is expected to take account of the needs of people with disabilities whenever it plans the modification or refurbishment of stations.

Road Fatalities

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people were killed and how many people were injured in road accidents by age group and sex in (a) the Greater London area and (b) central London in each of the last 15 years.

Mr. Chope: The information requested is given in the tables. It is given for the years 1979 to 1990 only, as information for earlier years is not readily available. It is possible to break down the information only to the level of London boroughs. Data for the greater London area are for all the London boroughs, while figures for the cities of London and Westminster are given separately to cover central London.

Casualties killed in road accidents in London: By age and sex: 1979 to 1990

Crash Cushions

Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will adopt the draft CEN specification for the use of crash cushions in the United Kingdom as soon as possible.

Mr. Chope: Working group 1 of CEN technical committee TC226 is preparing draft standards covering terminology, performance classes, testing methods and test acceptance criteria for vehicle safety restraint systems, including crash cushions.

Further examination is taking place of the required testing criteria for crash cushions. This will delay the preparation of the draft standard covering performance classes for this type of device.

When these standards are agreed, the United Kingdom will consider their adoption.

Edinburgh-Aberdeen Line

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it the policy of Her Majesty's Government to electrify the Edinburgh-Aberdeen railway line.

Mr. Freeman: It is for the British Railways Board to determine investment priorities within the funds made available to it by the Government. It is not for Ministers to tell BR when a specific project should be brought forward.

CIVIL SERVICE

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 15 July 1991.

Mr. Renton: No public opinion surveys have been carried out by my office since 15 July 1991.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Rights of the Child Convention

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made towards ratification of the United Nations convention on the rights of the child; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Considerable progress has been made towards ratification of the United Nations convention on the rights of the child. We hope to be in a position to ratify in the coming months.

Western Sahara

Sir Peter Blaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the latest position regarding the United Nations efforts to secure a solution to the problems of the western Sahara.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A ceasefire in the territory took effect on 6 September. A referendum on the future of the territory, envisaged in the United Nations Secretary General's plan, is scheduled for January 1992. The United Nations mission supervising the referendum—MINURSO—has been deployed. It is now drawing up a list of voters. The United Kingdom is contributing to the cost of MINURSO and has provided 15 military observers.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: No.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether his Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: No.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by his Department during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (a) the topic, (b) the commencement date, (c) the duration and (d) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I have nothing to add to the answers I gave to the hon. Member on 1 July at column 24 and 11 July at columns 421-22.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Total expenditure by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on advertising and other promotional material for the years 1979-80 to 1990-91, latest estimates for 1991-92 and budget provisions for 1992-93 are:

These figures cannot be disaggregated to identify the medium used without incurring disproportionate cost.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The information is as follows:

Total expenditure by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on press and public relations from 1983-84 to 1990-91, latest estimates for 1991-92 and budget provisions for 1992-93 are (£ million)

Vietnam

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions have been held with the United States Government about joint efforts to promote and monitor observance of human rights in Vietnam and the implications for Her Majesty's Government's policy on repatriation of the boat people in Hong Kong.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We remain in close touch with the United States Government about the situation in Vietnam, and welcome the recent Vietnamese reaffirmation that no Vietnamese migrant returning to Vietnam will be persecuted. The Vietnamese have also agreed to continue to facilitate the monitoring of conditions of all returnees to Vietnam by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 11 July 1991.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: One such poll has been conducted.

Diplomatic Missions (Parking Fines)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish up-to-date figures recording the number of unpaid parking fines incurred by each diplomatic mission in London in the first six months of the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The information requested by my hon. Friend is given in the table. The table also includes those international organisations which incurred unpaid fines. The figures may be reduced by late payments.

The total of 3,000 for the first six months of 1991 represents a 22 per cent. reduction from the figure of 3,842 for the same period in 1990. It compares with nearly 67,000 in the first six months of 1984 before publication of the 1985 White Paper. We welcome this further reduction in unpaid parking fines that has been achieved during 1991 and appreciate the co-operation of diplomatic missions since the introduction of the parking policy. We shall continue to monitor carefully the level of unpaid fines and bring pressure to bear on diplomatic missions to reduce this still further.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Private Health Insurance (Tax Relief)

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is the estimated level of deadweight on tax relief for private health insurance;

(2) what is the total cumulative cost of the tax relief for private health insurance;

(3) for each year of the scheme's existence, what is (a) the number of people receiving tax relief for private health insurance, (b) the number of these that are pensioners and (c) the cost per pensioner for whom the tax relief has been claimed.

Mr. Maude: Of those cases benefiting from tax relief for private medical insurance in 1990-91, the proportion not previously covered by this form of insurance is not known, but is thought to be relatively small. The estimated cost of the relief in respect of 1990-91 was £55 million and for 1991-92 is expected to be about £60 million.

In 1990-91 relief was available in respect of about 330,000 contracts covering about 600,000 people aged over 60. The revenue cost per insured person was about £90.

Unemployment

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the full cost including revenues forgone to the Exchequer of every extra 100,000 unemployed people in (a) 1991-92 and (b) 1992-93.

Mr. Meller: A rise of 100,000 in unemployment is estimated directly to add around £305 million to benefit expenditure in 1991-92 and £325 million to benefit expenditure in 1992-93 as shown in table 24 of the DSS Departmental Report, Cm 1514. Estimates of the effects on tax receipts and public finances as a whole would depend on the assumptions made.

Public Expenditure

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will publish the figures in table 7.3 in Cm. 1520, including the latest estimated outturn for 1990-91, (a) in cash prices, (b) in 1990-91 prices and (c) as a percentage of gross domestic product;

(2) if he will publish the figures in table 7.2 in Cm. 1520, including the latest estimated outturn for 1990-91, with a back series to 1978-79 (a) in cash prices, (b) in 1990-91 prices and (c) as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not currently available. Updated versions of the two tables will be included in the "Statistical Supplement to the 1991 Autumn Statement" which is due to be published at the end of January 1992. Figures for the years 1978-79 to 1984-85 on a basis consistent with the figures given in table 7.2 of the "Statistical Supplement to the 1990 Autumn Statement", Cm. 1520, could be provided only at disproportionate costs.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the figures for the public sector borrowing requirement/public sector debt repayment for each year back to 1978-79, (a) including privatisation proceeds, (b) excluding privatisation proceeds and (c) both of these as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. Mellor: The figures are in the table.

Books (VAT)

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent proposals have been made by the European Commission concerning the rate of value added tax levied on books; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: At the 24 June meeting of ECOFIN, agreement was reached that member states which apply zero rates of VAT will be able to retain them, during a transitional period to December 1996, provided that they were in force on 1 January 1991 and are in accordance with Community law. The current zero rating of books is, therefore, safeguarded until at least December 1996, without prejudice to the position thereafter.

Incomes

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table giving the percentage increase in real terms in (a) income from employment, (b) income from self-employment, (c) rent, dividends, interest, (d) social security benefits and (e) personal disposable income after deduction of taxes and interest between1978-79 and 1990-91 giving the contribution of each towards personal disposable income in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maude: There are no official estimates of individual components of personal disposable income measured at constant prices. Between financial years 1978-79 and 1990-91 real personal disposable income as a whole increased by 41·6 per cent. Estimates of the various components expressed as percentages of personal disposable income, measured at current prices, are given in the table.

	As percentage of real personal disposable income
	1978-79	1990-91
Income from employment	86·6	82·5
Income from self-employment	12·0	14·8
Rent, dividends and interest (net)	11·1	14·7
Social security benefits	13·7	12·8

Parent-Teacher Associations

Mr. Paice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer under what circumstances fund- raising by parent-teacher associations and similar bodies for use by schools would become liable to VAT.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Only those organisations whose turnover is in excess of £35,000 per annum are required to register and account for tax on their activities.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Vertebrate Animals

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to sign the European convention for the protection of vertebrate animals; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: We have signed the convention and hope to ratify it shortly. The Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 fully complies with the convention and in a number of ways exceeds its requirements.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give separate figures for spending by the office of the Data Protection Registrar on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mrs. Rumbold: For the years up to 1991-92, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend on 8 May 1991 at columns 483-84, save that the newspaper advertisting budget for this financial year has been revised from £50,000 to £195,000. I understand that the budgets for 1992-93 have not yet been determined.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by (a) the Home Office and (b) the Metropolitan police during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (i) the topic, (ii) the commencement date, (iii) the duration and (iv) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Details of Home Office television campaigns and each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000 during 1991-92 are as follows.

Television advertising

	Start date	Duration	Companies involved
Crime Prevention (General Awareness)	1 April 1991	19 days	Collett Dickenson Pearce Advertising; Clarke Hooper Consulting Promotions

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My Department has not sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The full cost of staff, accommodation and administration for the Home Office press office from 1979-80 to 1990-91 was:

1979-80	283,140
1980-81	392,532
1981-82	381,799
1982-83	424,290
1983-84	516,362
1984-85	560,512
1985-86	606,996
1986-87	548,136
1987-88	599,282
1988-89	674,945
1989-90	715,646
1990-91	786,519

Notes:

1. Figures supplied before 1986-87 were the costs estimated by the Treasury. After devolved budgets the estimates are based on Home Office costs.
2. Press Office figures include the costs for staff, accommodation and administration costs.

The estimated cost for 1991-92 is £800,275.

The budget for 1992-93 has not been confirmed but the estimate is for the same amount of staff and the projected figure is £832,285.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Figures for expenditure on advertising and other promotional material for the years from 1986-87 to 1990-91 are as follows:

Year	TV advertising £ million	Radio advertising £ million	Newspaper advertising £ million	Other promotional material £ million	Total £ million
1986-87	Total advertising = 5·0			1·40	6·40
1987-88	Total advertising = 4·7			2·10	6·80
1988-89	Total advertising = 5·4			2·80	8·20
1989-90	Total advertising = 5·5			3·70	9·20
1990-91	2·024	0·109	3·595	6·75	12·47
1991-92 estimate	1·131	0·236	2·172	6·46	11·89

Note: £1·9 million for crime prevention remains to be committed. 1992-93 cannot yet estimate

It would not be possible to provide more detailed information on advertising except at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total expenditure by the office of the Data Protection Registrar on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mrs. Rumbold: For the years up to 1991-92, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend on 3 May 1991 at column 339. I understand that the budget for 1992-93 has not yet been determined.

Murderers

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his general policy to release the relevant medical records of convicted murderers prior to their release.

Mrs. Rumbold: No.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all those convicted murderers since 1979 who have been released from prison and subsequently were convicted for another murder.

Mrs. Rumbold: I assume that the question relates to convicted murderers released since 1979. There have been five: J. W. Charlton; K. Pollard; J. Johnson; M. N. Robinson; and M. J. Green.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what factors were considered in the decision to release convicted murderers from prison after serving sentence for a first murder.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend may release a life sentence prisoner only if recommended to do so by the Parole Board and after consultation with the Lord Chief Justice and the trial judge if available. The main factors which are taken into account are whether the prisoner has been detained long enough to satisfy the requirements of retribution and deterrence for the offence, and whether it is considered safe to release him to the community.

Party Conferences

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a table showing the cost of policing the party conferences for (a) the Labour party, (b) the Conservative party and (c) the Liberal Democrats, for each year from 1987 to 1991, giving the percentage increase in costs between each year and the percentage increase between 1987 to 1991; and if he will give an estimate of the full economic cost of policing each conference.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the chief officers of the forces concerned that the additional costs of policing the party conferences for the Labour party, the Conservative party and the Liberal Democrats for each year from 1987 to 1991 were estimated as follows:

Year	Force	Additional cost £	Percentage increase in costs between each year
(a) Labour
1987	Sussex	23,000	—
1988	Lancashire	61,000	+ 165
1989	Sussex	4,000	− 93
1990	Lancashire	97,545	+ 2,339
1991	Sussex	10,000	− 90
Percentage change between 1987 and 1991 = −57 per cent
(b) Conservative
1987	Lancashire	829,000	—
1988	Sussex	1,400,000	+ 69
1989	Lancashire	1,080,000	− 23
1990	Dorset	2,000,000	+ 85
1991	Lancashire	1,379,000	− 31
Percentage change between 1987 and 1991 = +66 per cent
(c) Liberal Democrats
1987	N.A.	No identifiable policing costs	—
1988	Lancashire	No identifiable policing costs	—
1989	Sussex	No identifiable policing costs	—

Year	Force	Additional cost £	Percentage increase in costs between each year
1990	Lancashire	No identifiable policing costs	—
1991	Dorset	No identifiable policing costs	—

Information about full economic costs is not available.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No.

Betting Shops

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has had any approaches from members of the public or punters' associations in favour of evening opening of betting shops.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In the year ending 30 September 1991, we received no direct representations in favour of evening opening of licensed betting offices from members of the public or any association representing punters.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has had in favour of the evening opening of betting offices; and what interests they represent.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In the year ending 30 September 1991, we received one direct representation from an independent bookmaker in favour of evening opening of licensed betting offices. We are also aware that a number of organisations expressed their support for evening opening in the course of the Home Affairs Committee's recent inquiries into the levy on horseracing.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will extend the consultative period over the evening opening of betting offices.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We should be willing to arrange for written comments to be received after 29 November if any organisations are unable to submit them by that date. Until all written comments have been received, it is not possible to predict what further consultations may be necessary nor how long they may take to complete.

Horse Racing

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many evening horse racing meetings took place during the last 12-month period when figures were available; and what estimate he has of the annual attendance at these evening meetings, and at all horserace meetings during that year.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There were 134 evening horserace meetings in 1990 attended by 654,302 racegoers. The total attendance for all horserace meetings in 1990 was 4,901,515.

Asylum

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for asylum as listed in his answer of 21 October, Official Report, column 338, were (a) in country and (b) at port of entry on entry in each quarter of 1990 and 1991.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is given in the table. The figures are for principal applicants excluding dependants. The 1990 figures for after-entry applications understate because of delays in recording, particularly for the fourth quarter.

Applications received[1] [2] for asylum in the United Kingdom, by location of application, 1990-91

	At port of entry	After entry[3] [4]	Total[3] [4]
1990[2]
Quarter 1	1,450	1,910	3,360
Quarter 2	1,615	2,000	3,615
Quarter 3	2,580	4,220	6,800
Quarter 4	3,550	3,995	7,545
1991
Quarter 1	3,520	8,180	11,700
Quarter 2	2,040	10,030	12,070
Quarter 3	1,970	8,630	10,600

[1] Excluding dependants.
[2] Provisional figures, rounded to the nearest 5.
[3] The after-entry, and total, figures for 1990 understate because of delays in recording, particularly for the fourth quarter. In total, applications in 1990, excluding dependants, are estimated at over 22,000 (over 30,000 including dependants).
[4] Includes also the small number of principal applications made from overseas.

Young Prisoners

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to achieve his commitment to end the practice of holding young people in prison accommodation.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has established a national steering group to plan and take forward the work needed to give effect to the juvenile remand provisons of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, including the abolition of prison remands for 15 and 16-year-old boys.

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 11 July.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My Department's public relations branch has commissioned three market research surveys since 11 July:

Pre-campaign research for smoke alarms maintenance advertising.

Qualitative research among samples of the target audience for Special Constables recruitment advertising.

Post-campaign research for electoral registration advertising.

Greyhound Tracks

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many greyhound tracks operate throughout England, Scotland and Wales in the evening for the last year when figures were available; and what information he has as to the approximate annual attendance at greyhound evening meetings.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On the basis of figures provided by the joint standing committee of the British Greyhound Racing Board and the National Greyhound Racing Club to the Home Affairs Committee inquiry into the financing of greyhound racing, I understand that there were about 87 greyhound tracks operating in the evening in 1990 with annual attendance estimated at about 5 million.

Residential Psychiatric Patients

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many former residential psychiatric patients were prosecuted for offences in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. John Patten: Information on the number of former residential patients who have been prosecuted for offences is not collected centrally.

Adoption

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the number of children brought into the United Kingdom for the purpose of adoption each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information held centrally relates to Romanian children during the last two years only. In 1990 the issue of 114 entry clearances was authorised to Romanian children with a view to adoption by British couples. To date the corresponding figure for 1991 is 212. In 1990, a total of 80 and in 1991 to date seven Romanian children have been brought to the United Kingdom without entry clearance with a view to adoption. In addition I understand that in 1990 our High Commission in Sri Lanka issued 54 entry clearances to Sri Lankan children with a view to adoption by British couples.

PRIME MINISTER

Terrorist Offences

Mr. Stanbrook: To ask the Prime Minister in how many cases since 1975, excepting those initiated under the Criminal Jurisdiction Act 1975, British courts have exercised extra-territorial jurisdiction conferred upon them by anti-terrorism legislation in compliance with mulilateral conventions for the suppression of hijacking, hostage-taking and similar terrorist offences.

The Prime Minister: The information requested is not available.

Separation of Powers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will bring forward proposals to ensure a constitutional separation of powers and to enhance the powers of the elected representatives vis-à-vis those of the Government.

The Prime Minister: No.

Political Advisers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister how many political advisers are in post in Her Majesty's Government; in which Departments they are in post; what is the salary in each case; and what is the total salary bill of such posts.

The Prime Minister: There are currently 34 political advisers to Ministers employed in the civil service. The number in each Department is as follows:

	Number
Cabinet Office (including No. 10)	8
Defence	1
Department of the Environment	3
Foreign and Commonwealth Office	2
Department of Health	3
Her Majesty's Treasury	3
Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food	1
Department of Education and Science	2
Department of Energy	1
Department of Employment	1
Home Office	2
Lord President of the Council	1
Lord Privy Seal	1
Scottish Office	1
Department of Social Security	1
Department of Trade and Industry	2
Department of Transport	1

It is not our practice to reveal the salary of any advisor as it is negotiated individually in relation to previous earnings and is therefore confidential. They are, however, normally paid on a special advisers' salary spine comprising 30 points, as follows:

Scale Point	Salary (Inclusive) £
30	57,706
29	55,486
28	53,352
27	52,104
26	50,861
25	49,271
24	47,681
23	45,509
22	43,818
21	42,135
20	40,372
18	36,818
17	35,048
16	32,937
15	31,595
14	30,527
13	29,464
12	28,347
11	27,328
10	26,490
9	25,316
8	24,422
7	23,627
6	22,843
5	22,042
4	20,869
3	20,155
1	18,403

The two most senior special advisers are paid personal salaries above the spine limit of £57,706. The current total salary bill, excluding one adviser who is paid a daily rate, is £1,249,970.

Nuclear Weapons Tests

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what changes he plans to announce in the programme of testing British nuclear weapons.

The Prime Minister: None.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what representation he has received from the Government of Australia or the representatives of the Maralinga aboriginal people to fund a clean-up of the British nuclear bomb test site at Maralinga, Australia.

The Prime Minister: I have received a letter from the Australian Prime Minister on the question of a further clean-up at the former nuclear weapon test sites at Maralinga and Emu field, and requesting discussions between Ministers and officials from both countries. We are considering the points raised by Mr. Hawke and have agreed to meet the relevant Australian Minister and officials later this year. In addition, a delegation representing the Maralinga aborigines called on my noble Friend the Earl of Arran, Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces, and senior officials on 30 October to present their views on the same topic.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what response he has made to representations from the Shoshone nation against the continuation of the British nuclear bomb test site in Nevada.

The Prime Minister: I have asked Her Majesty's ambassador in Washington to reply on my behalf.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the compatibility of the Dutch Presidency's proposals for economic and monetary union with his own call for an EC of 30 states; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The question of enlargement will be high on the European Community's agenda in the coming years; we must ensure that decisions taken in the intergovernmental conferences do not pose a barrier to the accession of applicants who wish to join and meet all the conditions of membership.

The text produced by the Dutch Presidency is a useful basis for further negotiation towards an agreement. But the United Kingdom and other member states are not committed to any particular part of its contents. The Government have plenty to say about it in the intergovernmental conference and we will make our views clear to the other member states. I remain confident that it will be possible to reach an agreement on economic and monetary union. Such an agreement should not hinder the enlargement of the Community.

Pensioners

Mr. Battle: To ask the Prime Minister how many letters he has received from pensioners about the level of their pension increase.

The Prime Minister: I have received many representations on this topic.

Ukraine

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister what impact the declaration of independence for the Ukraine has had upon Her Majesty's Government's policy.

The Prime Minister: We are naturally paying close attention to developments in the Ukraine and intend to build on the good contacts we have established there. Questions of recognition and our future policy towards the Ukraine will largely depend on the outcome of discussions which are still going on between the Ukraine, the centre and other republics on the form of its future relationships. The Ukrainian people will vote on their Supreme Soviet's declaration of independence on 1 December.

Paid Public Appointments

Mr. Warren: To ask the Prime Minister if he will publish an up-to-date directory of paid public appointments made by Ministers; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: A list of public bodies by Departments, with the number of paid and unpaid appointments, is now given in "Public Bodies", published annually by the Cabinet Office (OMCS). The 1990 edition is available from the House of Commons Library; the 1991 edition will be published in December.

World Development

Mr. Lester: To ask the Prime Minister what interdepartmental meetings are held to discuss how world development issues can be covered within British schools.

The Prime Minister: As a result of the introduction of the national curriculum world development issues will be firmly established in school timetables. Government Departments worked together on the formulation of the national curriculum.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total expenditure by the Cabinet Office on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

The Prime Minister: Expenditure on press and public relations by the Cabinet Office was:

1984-85	247,495
1985-86	232,980
1986-87	224,813
1987-88	215,925
1988-89	201,837
1989-90	205,650
1990-91	165,601

The latest estimate for 1991-92 is £1,005,000 and the provisional budget for 1992-93 is £508,000.

Similar information is not available for the years prior to 1984-85.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will give separate figures for spending by his office on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

The Prime Minister: My office has incurred no expenditure on advertising or promotional material and there are no plans for any such expenditure in 1991-92.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister whether (a) the Prime Minister's office or (b) the Cabinet Office have sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

The Prime Minister: My office has not sent any unsolicited direct mail. The Cabinet Office, as part of its central civil service function, has sent the following publicity material:

An approach has been made to heads of universities and local authority chief executives advising them of European Community recruitment competitions as part of the ongoing initiative to improve United Kingdom representation in EC institutions.

Each year we inform certain private sector companies of the date by which the Cabinet Office needs to receive applications for the top management programme in the forthcoming cycle.

The public appointments unit approaches individuals, in respect of whom they have received a recommendation, seeking their willingness to be considered for senior appointments.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total expenditure by his office on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

The Prime Minister: Expenditure by my office on press and public relations was not recorded separately before 1987-88. The total expenditure for each year since then is as follows; the budget for 1992-93 has not yet been finalised.

1988-89	419,326
1989-90	427,802
1990-91	553,068
1991-92	[1]560,750

Note: The figures for 1990-91 and 1991-92 include notional superannuation costs which are excluded from the figures for earlier years.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by (a) the Prime Minister's Office and (b) the Cabinet Office during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (i) the topic, (ii) the commencement date, (iii) the duration and (iv) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

The Prime Minister: My office has not undertaken any advertising campaigns in 1991-92; nor has the Cabinet Office undertaken any television advertising during 1991-92.

Details of the only advertising campaign costing over £100,000 carried out by the Cabinet Office in this period are as follows:

(i) Citizen's Charter White Paper
(ii) 22 July 1991
(iii) 7 weeks
(iv) the campaign was managed by the Central Office of Information

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will give separate figures for spending by the Cabinet Office on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

The Prime Minister: The Cabinet Office has not incurred and does not expect to incur any expenditure on promotional advertising on television or radio in the years 1979 to 1993. Expenditure in this period on promotional advertising in newspapers is estimated at £585,000 in 1991-92 and £300,000 in 1992-93.

Information on other promotional material is not available for the years 1979 to 1987. Expenditure on such material from 1987-88 was:

1987-88	19,306
1988-89	9,500
1989-90	14,833
1990-91	876

The Cabinet Office does not expect to incur any expenditure on other promotional material in 1991-92 or 1992-93.

Sunday Trading

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Prime Minister if he will issue guidance to local authorities on the kind of shops and markets and the goods which may legally be offered for sale to the public on the Sundays between 10 November and Christmas in England.

The Prime Minister: No.

Private Health Insurance

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on tax relief on private health insurance for the elderly.

The Prime Minister: The Government intend neither to abolish the existing relief nor to extend it to the under-60s.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister whether any member of (a) the Prime Minister's Office's or (b) the Cabinet Office's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

The Prime Minister: One private secretary and one secretary were available to assist me in my official duties. Three members of my policy unit were also in attendance.

Interned Soldiers

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he or his predecessors have made and what efforts he is currently making on behalf of civilians of Dutch, British and Commonwealth citizenship interned by invading and occupying forces in Indonesia and other Asian countries in the years 1942 to 1945 to secure adequate and meaningful compensation.

The Prime Minister: Successive Governments have taken the view that the question of compensation for former prisoners of war and civilian internees of the Japanese was settled in the 1951 treaty of peace with Japan.

Cabinet Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will now give details of the name, composition and remit of each Cabinet committee and sub-committee.

The Prime Minister: No. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him of 6 June 1991 at column 280.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 5 November.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 15 July 1991.

Dr. Mawhinney: Two surveys have been carried out since 15 July: one, a survey of customer attitudes towards the service provided by the Social Security Agency with relation to national insurance contributions, the other a survey examining employment and possible improvements in services and the general environment in the Rathcoole/Bawnmore/Longlands area.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information could be obtained in the form requested only at disproportionate cost; the total figures for spending on all advertising and other promotional material are, however, set out in the table.

1979-80	468,972
1980-81	487,393

[2] (Budget)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by his Department during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (a) the topic, (b) the commencement date, (c) the duration and (d) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is as follows.

Campaign	Commencement Date	Duration	Company
Pedestrian Safety	26 June 1991	1 month	A V Browne Advertising Ltd
	16 September 1991	1 month
Environmental Awareness and Energy Efficiency	22 August 1991	3 months	Chrysalis TV
Crime prevention	2 September 1991	3 years	Cannot be disclosed on security grounds
Confidential Telephone	Mid-December 1991	4 months	Cannot be disclosed on security grounds

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information requested is as follows:

Year	£
1979-80	281,641
1980-81	344,596
1981-82	393,239
1982-83	519,912

1991-92	[1]5,502,537
1992-93	[2]5,800,516

[2] Budget.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether his Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Dr. Mawhinney: Yes.

Police Custody (Injuries)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many payments of compensation for injuries suffered in police custody have been made in each year since 1987; and if he will list the amounts paid in each case.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Dr. Mawhinney: No.

Sports Clubs (Rate Relief)

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many non-profit making sports clubs in Northern Ireland applied for rate relief for each of the financial years 1979-80 to 1991-92 and as a total over the same period; and how many of these clubs were granted rate relief of (a) 25 per cent. or under (b) 25 to 50 per cent., (c) 50 to 65 per cent., (d) 65 to 90 per cent. and (e) 90 to 100 per cent.

Dr. Mawhinney: Rate relief for non-profit making sports clubs is a mandatory 65 per cent., but is restricted to those parts of the premises used solely for sporting purposes. This is administered by the Commissioner of Valuation who is responsible for the maintenance of the valuation list.

Relief is granted as of right to these clubs and there is no need for them to apply.

The application of sports and recreational relief is governed by article 31 of the Rates (Northern Ireland) Order 1977, and the Rates (Recreational Hereditaments) (Northern Ireland) Order 1979.

Hospital Trusts

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has reached a decision on the Royal group of hospitals' application for health and social services trust status; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: I have decided to establish the Royal group of hospitals as a health and social services trust to become operational on 1 April 1993.

In making my decision I considered carefully the Royal group of hospitals' application and the comments made on it during consultation.

As a trust, the Royal group of hospitals will continue to be a regional centre of excellence with a commitment to the provision of services to its local community and to teaching and research. The trust will remain firmly within the Northern Ireland health and personal social services and will continue to be financed from public funds. However, it will have new freedoms and I am confident that the trust will use these to benefit patients and improve its quality of service while giving greater job satisfaction to its employees. I am also confident that the trust will build on the existing involvement of senior professional staff in the management of the unit.

Consultation on the application revealed a number of problems which need to be resolved concerning the future of the Royal group of hospitals. In order to give time for these matters to be addressed I have decided to delay the operational date of the trust for one year. In the meantime the Eastern health and social services board will retain overall managerial responsibility for the unit. A shadow board for the trust will be appointed which will take over full responsibility for the Royal group of hospitals from April 1993.

Stillbirths

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what will be (a) the initial costs and (b) the annual running costs of confidential inquiries into stillbirths and infant deaths in Northern Ireland; and what additional funds he is making available to (i) the Northern Ireland Office, (ii) the General Register Office and (iii) health and social services boards to (a) set up and (b) run the inquiries.

Mr. Hanley: Resources will be made available to allow Northern Ireland to participate fully in the national confidential inquiry. It will not be possible, however, to provide detailed information about the funding and costs of the inquiry in Northern Ireland until expert advice on its design and content has been formulated by the national advisory board which is being set up to guide and oversee the work throughout the United Kingdom.

WALES

Publicity

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list, in declining order of size of print run, all leaflets and circulars printed by him for general or mass circulation distribution in the past two years on education, health, and other topics relating to his departmental responsibilities, and their cost in each case.

Mr. David Hunt: The information requested by the hon. Gentleman is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. David Hunt: A breakdown of annual expenditure by the Welsh Office in advertising and other publicity from 1979-80 to 1990-91 is set out in the following table.

Publicity expenditure in 1991-92 is planned to be about £2,000,000. It is not possible to provide a breakdown of this under each heading because in many cases decisions about the extent to which different media will be used are taken as projects develop. Budgets for 1992-93 have yet to be finalised.

[1] Television and Press advertising for the years 1979-85 cannot be readily separated.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80, and each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. David Hunt: Figures for expenditure by the Department's information division, including staff and press cutting service, but excluding media advertising and promotional material, cannot readily be disaggregated for the years 1979-80 to 1987-88.

Figures for the succeeding years are:

1988-89	469,000
1989-90	487,000
1990-91	481,000

Estimated expenditure for 1991-92 is in the region of £530,000. Budgets for 1992-93 have yet to be finalised.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by his Department during 1991-92, and for each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (a) the topic, (b) the commencement date, (c) the duration and (d) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Mr. David Hunt: The Welsh Office does not plan to run any television campaigns.

The Department will run five publicity campaigns in 1991-92 costing more than £100,000.

Campaign	Timing	Companies
Enterprise Wales	Ongoing	McCann Erickson Payne Golley/ Hall Harrison Cowley
Road Safety	Ongoing	Dragon Advertising/Hall Harrison Cowley
Drug and Alcohol Misuse	Ongoing	Hall Harrison Cowley
Parents Charter	Commenced 27 September 1991	None commissioned by Welsh Office
Patients Charter	Commenced 28 October 1991	None commissioned by Welsh Office

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether his Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. David Hunt: Yes. Such direct marketing to date includes distribution of agricultural information to farmers, valleys promotional literature, community charge information and promotional material for the Enterprise Wales scheme.

Infant Deaths

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what will be (a) the initial costs and (b) the annual running costs of confidential inquiries into stillbirths and infant deaths in Wales; and what additional funds he is making available to (i) the Welsh Office and (ii) health authorities to (a) set up and (b) run the inquiries.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The confidential enquiry into stillbirths and infant deaths was announced by my hon. Friend the Minister for Health on 2 July 1991. Wales will take a full part in the enquiry.

Heart Specialists

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will indicate where in the health authorities of Wales there is a shortage of consultant heart specialists;

(2) what steps he will take to eliminate the shortage of consultant heart specialists in order to reduce waiting lists; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The Welsh Medical and Dental Manpower Committee advises the Department on the relative priority of consultant appointments and reflects in its recommendations any shortages identified by district health authorities.

The latest information shows no shortage in this speciality.

Sports Clubs

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many non-profit making sports clubs in Wales applied for rate relief for each of the financial years 1979-80 to 1991-92 and as a total over the same period; and how many of these clubs were granted rate relief of (a) 25 per cent. or under, (b) 25 to 50 per cent., (c) 50 to 65 per cent., (d) 65 to 90 per cent. and (e) 90 to 100 per cent.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The information requested for the years 1979-80 to 1988-89 is not available. Information relating to discretionary rate relief for non-profit making clubs used for recreational purposes, including sporting organisations, for 1989-90 and 1990-91 is shown in the following table:

	Number of applications	Total number awarded relief	Number of properties granted relief of up to:
			20 per cent.	21-50 per cent.	51-80 per cent.	Over 80 per cent.
1989-90	Not known	744	19	408	156	161
1990-91	756	673	105	297	80	191

Information for 1991-92 will not be available before September 1992.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Mr. David Hunt: No.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers (Pension Scheme)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to equalise female contributor survivor benefits within the teachers' superannuation pension scheme.

Mr. Fallon: With effect from 6 April 1988 widowers' pension benefits and associated benefits for children are payable in every case, subject to completion of the necessary qualifying period. Individual female teachers had the option at the time to elect to purchase service before 1988 for benefits if they so wished.

Manchester Schools (Repairs)

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further recent representations he has had about the urgency of the need for additional funding for repairs to Manchester's school buildings; what response he has made; what action he is taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: I recently met an all-party delegation from Manchester city council to discuss its capital programme for 1992-93.

I was able to allocate funds through the issue of a supplementary credit approval over and above Manchester's existing capital allocation for this year, to enable the LEA to start urgently needed work in two of its primary schools—Chapel Street and Charlestown. This will entail a total government commitment of some £6 million for an immediate start in 1991-92.

Manchester's bid for 1992-93 is being considered in the normal way. Its allocation will be announced in December.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Mr. Eggar: No.

Adult Education

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consultation he has undertaken with those directly involved in educating adults, in relation to his White Paper proposals on adult education; and how many meetings have been held with adult educators.

Mr. Eggar: Among those my right hon. and learned Friend and I have met in this context are the National Institute for Adult Continuing Education, the National Federation of Women's Institutes, the Pre-Retirement Association, and the principals of Devon community colleges and Richmond adult and community college.

School Inspectors

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the procedure for the appointment of each of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools; what is the role of the Privy Council in such appointments; and by what procedure inspectors may be made redundant or otherwise have their employment terminated.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Her Majesty's inspectors are recruited by open competition after advertisements in the national and education press. The holder of my office recommends the names of prospective HMI through the Privy Council to Her Majesty the Queen. Any terminations of employment would be made in accordance with central guidance currently operating within the civil service.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Eggar: The expenditure figures for press and publicity by this Department for the financial years 1984-85 to 1991-92 are given in the table. Figures for 1979-80 to 1983-84 are not available on a comparable basis. The figure for 1991-92 is estimated expenditure. The Government's expenditure plans for 1992-93 will be announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his autumn statement. The Department does not incur expenditure on public relations.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by his Department during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (a) the topic, (b) the commencement date, (c) the duration and (d) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend launched a teacher recruitment campaign on 1 July which included advertising on television for a period of three weeks and advertisements in the national press for four weeks. The second phase of this campaign began on 27 September and included advertisements in the national press for four weeks and in cinemas in selected towns for six alternating weeks. The campaign has been designed by Saatchi and Saatchi Advertising Ltd.

The parents charter was launched on 27 September. Advertisements were scheduled to appear in national newspapers and women's magazines from 27 September until 31 October. In addition, it is planned to place some advertisements in the ethnic minority community press. The company involved is BMP DDB Needham.

An exhibition to provide parents with information about recent changes in education will also be launched in the current financial year. HP:ICM has been commissioned to mount the exhibition which will visit a number of venues across the country. The timing and duration of this campaign has yet to be finalised.

The professional, industrial and commercial updating (PICKUP) programme continues to support and encourage colleges, polytechnics and universities to improve and increase their provision to meet the training needs of employers and their employees. The Services to Business campaign, run as part of the PICKUP programme, is managed by Quadrangle Communications Ltd.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. Eggar: The Department has not sent unsolicited mail direct to members of the public. It is the practice of the Department, however, to send sample copies of publicity material for parents to libraries and to schools, offering the latter the opportunity to order additional stocks to distribute to pupils to give to their parents.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. Eggar: The expenditure figures for advertising and other promotional materials by this Department for the financial years 1979-80 to 1991-92 are given in the table. The figure for 1991-92 is estimated expenditure. The Government's expenditure plans for 1992-93 will be announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his autumn statement. The rise in expenditure since 1989-90 is the result of the teachers recruitment campaign and the parents charter.

Education Spending

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a series going back to 1978-79 in (a) cash prices, (b) 1990-91 prices and (c) as a proportion of GDP, Government spending on education, sub-divided into primary, secondary and others both in total and divided into (i) capital spending, net and gross of receipts, and (ii) current.

Mr. Fallon: The available information on actual expenditure by the Department of Education and Science is shown in the tables. The records do not show a breakdown of expenditure between the primary and secondary schools sector. The figures for receipts appropriated in aid are aggregated for schools and other education and do not distinguish between capital and recurrent receipts.

[1] Figures do not include annual maintenance grant to GM schools, recouped from LEAs. The cash figures for this were £15 million for 1989-90 and £59 million for 1990-91.
[2]Includes institutions transferred from LEA sector.

Devonport Schools

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will approve immediately the proposal by Devon county council to reorganise Devonport schools in Plymouth by closing St. Peter's and designating Devonport secondary school as a Church-aided four-form entry comprehensive school for 11 to 16-year-olds.

Mr. Fallon: The proposals under sections 12 and 13 of the Education Act 1980 to which my hon. Friend refers were published on 5 July and are currently before the Secretary of State. My right hon. Friend aims to reach decisions on such proposals within five months from the date of publication if possible.

St. Anne's School, Rock Ferry

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will approve plans for St. Anne's primary school, Rock Ferry, Birkenhead, which are now lodged with his Department.

Mr. Fallon: The capital plans put forward by local education authorities for 1992-93 are still under consideration and decisions will be announced in December.

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 11 July 1991.

Mr. Eggar: Since 11 July, the Department has not conducted any widespread public opinion surveys but has undertaken some market research.

Reading Standards

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to respond to the third report, Session 1990-91, of the Education, Science and Arts Committee on standards of reading in primary schools.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have written today to the Chairman of the Select Committee, setting out the Government's response.

The report is an important timely contribution to the current debate on reading standards in schools. Its conclusion that a fall in reading standards has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt provides no grounds for complacency. Rather it highlights the inadequacies of our present data, and the need for a reliable and consistent basis for the measurement of pupils' attainments. This is just what the national curriculum and the associated testing arrangements will provide.

Reading is the most fundamental of skills and the Government are determined to ensure that standards are improved in line with society's ever-more demanding needs for literacy. My response to the Select Committee sets out the steps we are taking to secure such improvements, notably through the implementation of the national curriculum which establishes clear national targets for pupils' reading across the full age range for compulsory education. Pupils' progress will be measured against those targets at the ages of seven, 11, 14 and 16. The results will help teachers to build up a detailed picture of each pupil's strengths and weaknesses to inform their teaching. They will also give parents the accurate information about their children's progress to which they are entitled under the parents charter. In aggregate they will in due course enable comparisons to be made of pupils' performance, for example, between the sexes, between local education authorities and between schools. I shall shortly publish an analysis of the results of the first tests of the performance of pupils at the age of seven.

The recent changes that I have announced to the system of testing of seven-year olds will give more detailed information to parents and the public next year. Teachers will be required to make a more precise grading of the reading attainments of those seven-year olds—roughly half the age group in 1991—who were assessed as of average ability for their age. We shall also be introducing for the first time in 1992 an optional written test of reading comprehension which will likewise be aimed at pupils of average ability and yield a finer grading of their attainments.

All schools should strive to match the standards of the best. The Government have taken a number of measures to promote good practice in the teaching of reading. HMI's findings on good practice based on a report produced last January have been circulated to schools, and discussed at regional conferences for LEA inspectors and advisers. HMI has also provided guidance for schools on how to improve their libraries. Substantial resources have been made available for books related to the national curriculum and the training of school library staff, as well as for in-service teacher training.

Local education authorities should ensure that reading standards in their area are kept under review. The Government have urged all education committees to take an active and critical interest in this. The report rightly emphasises the importance of the active engagement of parents. Schools will be required to include in all reports the name of a contact with whom parents can discuss their children's progress. The Government are also supporting projects designed to strengthen home-school links, particularly in inner-city areas.

Copies of the Government's response are being placed in the Library of the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Nursery

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will list the dates during last Session on which the hon. Members' staff's union, the Transport and General Workers Union parliamentary branch, has been consulted about establishment of a nursery for their children; and if he has any plans to consult their union in the coming parliamentary year.

Mr. MacGregor: In accordance with a decision on the Services Committee, no survey of potential demand will be undertaken until detailed advice is received on the feasibility of establishing a child care facility in the parliamentary estate.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Lord President of the Council what progress has been made in the last Session towards establishment of a nursery for the children of hon. Members' staff.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply of 22 July 1991, Hansard, column 386. Possible suitable accommodation for a child care facility in advance of phase 2 is still being sought. This will be an early matter for consideration by the Accommodation and Works Committee as soon as it is established.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the number of applications received from businesses in the north-west region for regional selective assistance in 1990-91 and 1991-92.

Mr. Leigh: In the financial year 1990-91 my Department received 354 applications for assistance from businesses in the north-west region under the regional selective assistance scheme. Between 1 April 1991 and 31 October 1991 a further 280 applications were received from businesses in that region.

Note: The north-west region includes the counties of Cheshire, Cumbria, Lancashire, Greater Manchester and Merseyside and the High Peak district of Derbyshire.

Computers

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will summarise the findings of his review of trade in computers; and what is his estimate of the percentage of exports imported in (i) the same form and (ii) after further processing in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sainsbury: This review has now been published and is available in the House of Commons Library, entitled "Broad Balance of Trade of Major Companies in the Electronics and Information Technology Sector". The further detailed information requested is not available, although the above review contains a reference to entrepot trade.

Mountain Rescue Teams

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to clarify and safeguard the position of volunteer mountain rescue teams under the European Community draft directive on the liability of suppliers of services; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh: The present draft of the services liability directive excludes public safety services, and we are seeking to have this exemption extended to private sector safety services run on a voluntary basis.

Post Office

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to remove the statutory exemption from liability for negligence from the Post Office.

Mr. Leigh: We have no present plans to do so. However, as we said in the citizens charter, we have asked the Post Office to carry out an urgent review of its redress schemes with POUNC, the statutory body representing the interests of all Post Office users. The review is looking at the scope of current compensation arrangements as well as at the levels of compensation offered.

As also set out in the charter, it is our intention that in future the Secretary of State will have powers to approve the arrangements for redress where service fails to meet the reasonable expectations of the Post Office's customers.

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will specify those transactions which are permitted in Post Office Counters Crown offices but not in privately owned sub-post offices or franchised outlets.

Mr. Leigh: The range of business transacted at Crown post offices and sub-post office agencies is an operational matter determined in negotiations between Post Office Counters Ltd. and each individual client.

I understand that, with the exception of those located at international airports, sub-post office agencies do not issue British visitors passports; and that the issue of motor vehicle licences is carried out by 2,825 offices, both Crown and agency, at the request of DVLA. Other transactions available in Crown offices and some but not all agency offices are acceptance of datapost and the re-setting of franking machines. There is no change in the range of transactions carried out by Crown offices which have been converted to sub-post offices.

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many Post Office Crown branch offices in (a) Britain and (b) south Wales are in each of the three categories A, B and C specified by Post Office Counters for (i) 1989 and (ii) projected by management for the end of 1992; and what is the proposed percentage change in each category.

Mr. Leigh: The numbers of Crown post offices in categories A, B, and C in (a) Britain and (b) south Wales counters district (B and C not separately identified) at 31 March 1989 were as follows:

	A	B	C
Britain	498	552	443
South Wales	20	—35—

An effect of the Crown conversion programme may be to change the percentage distribution of offices between these categories; in addition, the precise effect in any area will depend on negotiations with potential agency operators and the outcome of the local consultation procedure. It is therefore not possible to project numbers for the end of 1992.

Fireworks

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department issues advice on care for domestic pets where fireworks are used; what information his Department has on the law relating to the sale of fireworks in other countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh: I have been asked to reply.

The main thrust of the Government's annual firework safety campaign is to publicise the firework code, which urges the public to keep pets indoors. The law on fireworks varies greatly in other countries.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Leigh: I refer to the answers given to the hon. Member on 13 March 1990 (Official Report, column 172) and 30 April 1991 (column 127).

The final outturn for 1990-91 and estimated expenditure in the current year are as follows:

The figures include regional press officer and other support services. The budget for 1992-93 is not yet finalised.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by (a) the Department of Trade and Industry and (b) the Export Credits Guarantee Department, during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (i) the topic, (ii) the commencement date, (iii) the duration and (iv) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Mr. Leigh: The information is as follows:

(a) Department of Trade and Industry

I refer to the answers given to the hon. Member on 1 July (Official Report, column 20), 12 July (column 523) and 17 July (column 180-81). The Department continues to have no plans for television advertising in the current year.

(b) Export Credits Guarantee Department

Television advertising campaigns in 1991-92: None.

Other campaign:

(i) Topic: ECGD's strength in Europe.
(ii) Commenced: 22 April 1991.
(iii) Duration: four weeks.
(iv) Advertising agency: Leo Burnett.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total expenditure by the ECGD on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Sainsbury: The response for the years 1979-80 to 1989-90 is contained in the Official Report for 3 May 1991, columns 364-65. The figures for 1990-91 and 1991-92 are as follows:

1990-91	1,067
[1]1991-92	1,326

The budget for 1992-93 has still to be prepared.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. Leigh: My Department uses carefully targeted direct mail in support of a number of its objectives, including the stimulation of innovation, the promotion of exports and the provision of information to business about new methods, opportunities and management skills.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give separate figures for spending by the ECGD on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. Sainsbury: The response for the years 1979-80 to 1989-90 is contained in the Official Report for 8 May 1991, column 502. The figures for 1990-91 and 1991-92 are as follows:

	Total	Press advertising	Other
	£000	£000	£000
1990-91	1,067	692	375
[1]1991-92	1,326	875	451

No expenditure has been incurred on TV and radio advertising. The budget for 1992-93 has still to be prepared.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. Leigh: I refer to the answers given to the hon. Member on 13 March 1990 (Official Report, columns 173-74) and 29 April 1991 (column 55-56). Final outturn figures for expenditure from the Department's central publicity during 1990-91 were as follows:

Television advertising	3,938
Radio advertising	141
Press advertising	1,905
Other promotional materials[1]	3,778

[1] Publications, audio-visual materials and posters.

I expect expenditure on such activities this year to be well within last year's total. Media allocations are made according to need during the course of the year, but the Department has no plans for television advertising this year.

South Sefton Business Centre

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make an official visit to South Sefton business centre.

Mr. Leigh: I do not at present have any plans to visit the South Sefton business centre.

Thomson Consumer Electronics

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance his Department will offer to promote industrial activity (a) in the Gosport area in general and (b) at the Ferguson plant in particular in the light of the announcement by Thomson Consumer Electronics that it intends to close the Ferguson factory.

Mr. Leigh: The best way for the Government to support firms in the Gosport area is through its policies aimed at controlling inflation and encouraging sustained economic growth. Eligible firms there benefit from access to DTI schemes aimed at helping them to become more efficient, encouraging innovation and promoting exports. DTI's Invest in Britain Bureau and the English unit promote new direct investment by overseas firms to the United Kingdom. IBB can give individual inward investors information about locations where sites, premises and labour are readily available to meet their particular needs.

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 12 July 1991.

Mr. Leigh: The Department has carried out no general public opinion surveys in this period.

Exports

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will state the value and volume of exports in each year of the 1980's of (a) beryllium, (b) polonium and (c) bismuth, specifying in each case the countries stated as the destinations of the exports.

Mr. Sainsbury: Information is given in the table. Information on polonium is not available as it is not separately identified in the overseas trade statistics. To provide country details would involve disproportionate cost.

Businesses, North-West

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentages of businesses in the north-west have reported a decline in sales over the last six months.

Mr. Leigh: Statistical information of this nature is not collected by my Department.

Manufacturing Standards

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his policy for assisting British trade and professional organisations with travel and administration costs for meetings in connection with achieving Europeanwide standards of manufacture for 1993 onwards.

Mr. Leigh: We continue to make available through the British Standards Institution substantial financial support towards the travel costs of leaders of BSI delegations and of principal experts and other selected personnel attending standards meetings overseas.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Mr. Leigh: No.

British Shipbuilders

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on British Shipbuilders' external financing limit for 1991-92.

Mr. Leigh: British Shipbuilders' external financing limit for 1991-92 was set at £5·8 million as recorded in the Government's expenditure plans 1991-92 to 1993-94 published in February 1991. I am now able to announce a reduced EFL for 1991-92 of £3·6 million which amounts to a net improvement of £9·4 million. This is principally due to the release of the provision of legal fees totalling £6 million following the out-of-court settlement of the Scott Lithgow dispute in March 1991 and the deferred receipt of asset sales at North East Shipbuilders Ltd. (NESL) which included £2·075 million from the sale of Pallion, the only remaining NESL yard.

Telecommunications Council

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Telecommunications Council held in Brussels on Monday 4 November.

Mr. Redwood: The main item was a further discussion on the European Commission plans to apply "MAC" standards to direct-to-house satellite broadcasting. I continued to argue strongly for service provider freedom to follow their commercial judgment. Consumers should not have imposed on them the costs of these changes, especially where they do not derive benefits from new services on offer. I am pleased to say that opinion among EC states does seem to have shifted in this direction to some extent and I hope that the Commission's revised proposals, expected later this year, will show considerable improvement.

The Council reached political agreement on a resolution on satellite communications, which envisages future liberalisation of that sector. A common position was reached on a Council directive on the application of open network provision to leased lines, which will facilitate future liberalisation of the European telecommunication services market. Agreement was also reached on a Council decision on the harmonisation of the international access code, subject to approval by the United Kingdom parliamentary scrutiny committees and the availability of the opinion by the European Parliament.

The Commission announced that it hoped to produce a Green Paper on postal services for discussion at the next Telecommunications Council on 5 December 1991. The Commission also announced its intention to produce a Communication on a co-ordinated EC position for the world administrative radio conference (WARC), in February 1992. All member states agreed with the United Kingdom that CEPT should remain the principal European body dealing with international radio frequencies and that member states should where possible support the common CEPT proposals at WARC.

ENERGY

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Mr. Wakeham: No.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. Wakeham: The information requested for 1989-90 and earlier years was contained in my reply to the hon. Member on 25 April, Official Report, col. 500. Expenditure in 1990-91, and estimated expenditure in 1991-92, is as follows:

	1991-92	1990-91[1]
Television Advertising	—	—
Newspaper Advertising	606	559
Radio Advertising	—	—
Other Promotional Material	900	1,074

[1] Does not include expenditure on the privatisation of the Electricity Supply Industry.

Decisions on expenditure by media in 1992-93 have not yet been taken.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether his Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. Wakeham: Unsolicited direct mail has been used from time to time when it has been considered the best method of disseminating advice or information to specific audiences. A recent example was a mailing to head teachers of a booklet entitled "Energy Efficiency in Buildings—Schools".

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by his Department during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (a) the topic, (b) the commencement date, (c) the duration and (d) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Mr. Wakeham: My Department has a continuing programme of publicity to promote energy efficiency, including a joint campaign with the Department of the Environment on the environment and home energy efficiency and the "Making a Corporate Commitment" campaign, the United Kingdom offshore supplies industry and renewable sources of energy. None of these campaigns will involve television advertising in the current year.

The joint campaign which was launched on Monday 4 November and will run for three years is being handled by Collett, Dickenson, Pearce and Partners Ltd., and Maxima. The purpose of the campaign is to encourage householders to make their homes more energy efficient.

The "Making a Corporate Commitment" campaign was launched on 16 October 1991 and will run until 1992-93. The aim of the campaign is to encourage top management to make a corporate commitment to energy efficiency. The campaign is being handled by Laing Henry Ltd. and Network Ltd.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Wakeham: The estimated expenditure in 1991-92 is £675,000. This figure includes:

(i) forecast expenditure by the Press Office;

(ii) staff costs (salaries, accommodation and common services) for all the permanent information service and support staff in the Press Office (including the Speech Writing Unit), at 1 November 1991.

The corresponding expenditure for previous years was set out in my reply to the hon. Member on 30 April, Official Report, c. 107-8.

Details of proposed expenditure for 1992-93 are not available.

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 11 July.

Mr. Wakeham: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Trawsfynydd Power Station

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the problems being encountered at Trawsfynydd nuclear power station and its future life expectancy.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) on 14 October, (col. 6). I understand that Nuclear Electric plc's interim safety case for the restart of Trawsfynydd remains the subject of discussions between it and the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate.

Nuclear Material (Reprocessing)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement outlining the sequence of events leading to Her Majesty's Government offering to accept nuclear material from Iraq for reprocessing in Scotland; what offers of assistance in dealing with the material have been forthcoming from other countries; and what is the current position regarding the possible importation of the materials.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Following an approach from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Government indicated that facilities at Dounreay would be available if required for making safe certain nuclear materials which will be removed from Iraq in accordance with Security Council resolution 687. The IAEA requested tenders for this work and an alliance of British and French companies submitted bids. It will be for the agency to assess these and any other offers received on technical and economic grounds.

EMPLOYMENT

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give separate figures for spending by the Training Agency or Manpower Services Commission on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. Forth: (a) The information requested is given in the table:

	TV (£)	Radio (£)	Press (£)	Other (£)	Total (£)
Actual
1979-80	N.A.	N.A.	—	—	—

1990-91	6,115,000	—	3,803,000	9,912,000	19,830,000

All the figures refer only to expenditure by the former Manpower Services Commission, Training Commission and Training Agency. Following the abolition of the Training Agency, from 1991-92 the Department's advertising and publicity budget is held centrally.

(b) The total budget for 1991-92 (excluding HSE and ACAS) is £18·41 million. Estimate of the breakdown by media is as follows:

TV (£)	Press (£)	Others (£)	Total (£)
8,594,000	1,166,000	8,650,000	18,410,000

(c) Expenditure levels for 1992-93 are in the process of being set.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. Forth: (a) Expenditure on advertising and promotional material by the Department of Employment from 1979-80 to 1985-86 was as follows:

(b) From 1991-92 the Department's advertising and publicity budget has been held centrally. Details of expenditure for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93 are being provided for the hon. Member in a reply to a separate question.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Forth: The information requested is given in the table:

Year	Expenditure £ million
Actual
1979-80 to 1985-86	n/a
1986-87	1·080
1987-88	1·014
1988-89	3·185
1989-90	3·331
1990-91	3·507
1991-92	3·870

Figures for 1986-87 and 1987-88 are for Department of Employment information division only. Figures for TA are not available.

Figures for 1988-89 represent total expenditure separately incurred by DE information division and TA information services branch; the two merged to form DE information branch in November 1989. Figures for 1990-91 onwards represent expenditure by the DE information branch.

Expenditure levels for 1992-93 are in the process of being set.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by (a) the Department of Employment and (b) the Training Agency during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (i) the topic, (ii) the commencement date, (iii) the duration and (iv) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Mr. Forth: Two television advertising campaigns have been carried out for the Department so far in 1991-92, for TECs and for Just the Job. No further television advertising is planned by the Department during the remainder of the financial year. The Training Agency is now part of the Department.

Other publicity campaigns costing more than £100,000 carried out or planned during 1991-92 are set out in the table:

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether (a) the Department of Employment and (b) the Training Agency or Manpower Services Commission have sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. Forth: Direct mail containing information about the national training awards was sent to senior figures in British industry as part of the March to May 1991 campaign to encourage entries for the awards.

Working Hours

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will consider seeking derogations from the EC proposals for limiting working hours of employees for seasonal agricultural activities;

(2) if he will consider seeking derogations from the EC proposals for limiting working hours of employees for food manufacturing dependent on shift, night and weekend work;

(3) what derogations are currently being considered in the discussions with his EC counterparts on the proposals for limiting working hours of employees.

Mr. Forth: In discussions on the draft directive it has been proposed that member states should be able to make derogations from the main requirements of the draft directive in a number of circumstances. These include activities where the workplace is at a distance from the worker's place of residence; activities where continuity of production or service is necessary; unforeseen exceptional circumstances which are limited in time and predictable peaks of work such as in agriculture. In all such cases employees must be afforded equivalent periods of compensatory rest, or, where this is not possible, other forms of equivalent protection. The Government consider the draft directive unnecessary and unjustified, but will continue to seek to limit the damaging effects of the directive, if adopted, on all employers and employees in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's current position regarding EC proposals for limiting working hours of employees.

Mr. Forth: A draft directive on the organisation of working time was proposed by the European Commission under its social action programme in July 1990. It is under discussion in the Council. Various amendments have been proposed by other member states in discussions, including a limit of 48 hours on the working week and a requirement for the weekly rest period in principle to include Sunday.

The Government question the need for this proposed directive, which would have a damaging effect on the flexibility of firms in the United Kingdom and throughout the EC, increasing their costs and prejudicing their competitiveness. Hours of work are best decided between employers and employees. The Government did not consider the Commission's original proposals justified as minimum requirements for the protection of the health and safety of workers. The Government strongly question the justification for further restrictions on weekly hours and Sunday work.

Earnings

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his latest estimate of the average weekly earnings of (a) a male manual worker, (b) a female manual worker, (c) a male non-manual worker and (d) a female non-manual worker.

Mr. Forth: The available information for April 1991 is published in part A of the 1991 New Earnings Survey report, a copy of which is in the Library.

Unemployment Benefits

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was (a) the number of benefit staff units dealing with unemployment benefit claims in each of the Employment Service administrative regions, (b) the number of unemployed people claiming benefit in each of the administrative regions and (c) the benefit staff unit to claimant ratio in each of the administrative regions as at 1 March 1990, September 1990 and September 1991.

Mr. Forth: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 11 July.

Mr. Forth: The Department's various research branches do not commission public opinion surveys as such. However, they carry out research projects on a variety of employment-related issues which involve surveys of individuals. Listed are those research studies, commissioned or partly funded by the Employment Department Group—ED, Employment Service, Health and Safety Executive and the Advisory Conciliation and Arbitration Service—which have involved surveys of individuals commissioned since 11 July 1991.

Small Businesses

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proposals he has to increase the supply of qualified tradesmen, including mechanics and engineers, to small businesses located in rural areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The primary responsibility for training lies with employers, who must recognise that investment in training is essential to ensure the success of their business. This is just as relevant for all businesses, large or small, wherever they are based.

The Government are supporting and encouraging the efforts of employers in a number of ways. In particular, the employer-led training and enterprise councils and local enterprise companies have been charged with helping to ensure that local people develop the skills that businesses need. They also have particular responsibility for promoting the growth of small firms.

Employer-led industry training organisations also have a key role at industry level to develop strategies to meet the needs of particular industries and to work with TECS and LECS to encourage effective training.

Central European Time

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the benefits to the tourism industry of moving the United Kingdom into central European time.

Mr. Forth: The Department contributed towards the costs of the work leading to the Policy Studies Institute report "Making The Most Of Daylight Hours", published in 1988. This report concluded that the adoption of single/double summer time would bring a number of likely benefits to the tourism industry.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Mr. Forth: No.

Commission-only Work

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total number and percentage of commission-only jobs available at jobcentres on the most recent date for which information is available; if he will outline the procedures for clients viewing commission-only jobs; and if he will list the occupations likely to be offered on a commission-only basis.

Mr. Forth: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Youth Training

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish tables to show for each region and for Great Britain as a whole, the latest results of the YTS leavers survey, to show for male and female trainees and for each separate ethnic group and for those with a disability (a) those in full-time work with the same employer, (b) those in full-time work with a different employer, (c) those in part-time work, (d) those on a full-time course at a college or training centre, (e) those on another YTS, (f) those doing something else, (g) those who were unemployed, (h) those who had obtained a vocational qualification, (i) the number of questionnaires issued, (j) the usable percentage response rate and (k) the percentage of respondents who were early leavers; what were the numbers of accidents on YTS, fatal, major and minor, for the latest available three-month period; and how many YTS placements were closed or not accepted in that period and in the three preceding months.

Mr. Forth: The complete information requested can be provided only at disproportionate cost. Table 1 provides information about the situation of young people three months after leaving youth training in the period April 1990 to September 1990. Table 2 provides separate figures on the numbers of accidents for the period April 1991 to June 1991. Separate figures for closures and rejections of YT placements are no longer available.

(a) Employment Department figures have been compiled on a similar basis to those prepared by the Health and Safety Executive on employed persons. However, the Employment Department's figures include a number of accidents to trainees in educational establishments and road traffic accidents which would not have been reportable to the Health and Safety Executive had the individuals been employed.

(b) Major injuries are classified according to the severity criteria laid down in the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985. These regualtions which came into force on 1 April 1986 reclassified fractured wrists and ankles as major injuries which were not considered to be major under the previous regulations, the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1980 (NADOR).

Public Expenditure

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish updated versions of tables 6.5 and 6.6 of chapter 6 of the 1990-91 to 1992-93 public expenditure White Paper (Cm 1006) extending the series published there up to date.

Mr. Forth: Tables 6.5 and 6.6 of chapter 6 of the 1990-91 to 1992-93 Public Expenditure White Paper were published in an amended form as tables 6.6 and 6.8 of the 1991 departmental report.

It was necessary to change the format as TECs have taken over delivery of the youth training and employment training programmes. Entrant numbers and target outcomes for all these programmes will be negotiated with all 82 TECs in January, and TEC business plans will be agreed at the beginning of the financial year, after publication of the departmental report at the beginning of the year. The national aggregate of individual TEC targets will be announced to Parliament following completion of the negotiations with all the TECs.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his latest estimate of the total cost to United Kingdom consumer/taxpayers of direct and indirect support to farmers and horticulturalists.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the estimated cost per adult in the United Kingdom of the common agricultural policy for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Curry: The CAP system of agricultural support, in common with the support policies of other industrial countries, gives rise to substantial costs to taxpayers and consumers compared with a situation in which foodstuffs were imported at world market prices with no support to domestic producers. Estimates of these costs, and the savings that could be secured if current policies were ended, are possible only by making many assumptions. Important judgments are necessary about the current levels of world prices—no simple matter given the wide variations in quotations and substantial fluctuations from year to year—and the changes in these prices if present policies were abandoned. The latter depend on how producers and consumers throughout the world might respond to the new circumstances and on the impact on factors such as exchange rates.

Estimates made by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, using a particular set of assumptions, imply that the transfers from consumers and taxpayers in 1990 resulting from agricultural policies in the European Community as a whole—separate figures for the United Kingdom are not available—were equivalent to £4·4 per head of total population per week. It is not meaningful to express this per adult. This figure is derived from the OECD estimate of the aggregate cost of 105·1 billion ecu for 1990, assuming the EC12 population is 327·1 million and that 1 ecu=£0·7139. Corresponding estimates can be derived from OECD studies for 1986 to 1989 as follows, expressed per head per week: 1986, £4·0; 1987, £4·4; 1988, £4·0; 1989, £3·7. Consistently based estimates for earlier years have not been published.

The figure for 1990 is one estimate of the extent to which the CAP raised the cost of food and agricultural products, and incurs budgetary costs, compared to existing "world" prices. As I have emphasised on a number of occasions, and as the OECD has made clear, the estimate takes no account of the effect that removal of farm support would have on world prices, and other variables, and thus gives no indication of the extent to which taxpayers and consumers might be better off if current policies were removed. Consumers/taxpayers would benefit by considerably less than £4·4 per head per week if all agricultural support were removed.

"Our Farming Future"

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he intends to consult outside organisations prior to publishing his policy document "Our Farming Future"; and whether it will be a consultation document.

Mr. Gummer: "Our Farming Future" will be a policy statement by the Government, not a consultation document. Consequently we have not consulted outside organisations specifically in its preparation although our regular meetings with consumers, farmers, environmental organisations, manufacturers, distributors, and retailers have enforced our policies.

Fishing Vessels (Decommissioning)

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it the policy of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a decommissioning scheme for fishing vessels.

Mr. Curry: The Government are ready to consider industry proposals for decommissioning provided that these form part of a wider conservation package aimed at reducing fishing effort.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Mr. Curry: No.

Agricultural Marketing

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the organisations that his Ministry funded that promoted the marketing of agricultural produce giving the amount funded in each case in (a) 1980 and (b) 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: My Department contributes to a number of bodies concerned with marketing.

These contributions and the purposes concerned are shown for 1990-91 in respect of the main bodies. Information for 1980 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Food From Britain
£4·5 million to cover establishment costs and some marketing activities.

Meat and Livestock Commission
£240,000 to cover salaries and related costs.

Home-Grown Cereals Authority
£115,000 towards administrative expenses.

Potato Marketing Board
£300,000 for the provision of statistical information.

Healthy Eating

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when his catering working group expects to publish a report and make recommendations on healthy eating in different catering establishments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The group is conducting a review and will report to the MAFF/DH/HEA nutrition liaison group as and when it is appropriate to do so.

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 11 July 1991.

Mr. Curry: Public opinion surveys carried out by my Department since 11 July are as follows:

Food Sense Publications Campaign: pre-campaign market research.

MAFF Touring Exhibition: post-project evaluation research.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. Curry: Expenditure by the Department in the financial year 1982-83 and each subsequent year was as follows:

	Television	Radio	Press advertising	Other publicity material
	£	£	£	£
1982-83	Nil	Nil	3,000	n/a
1983-84	Nil	Nil	27,000	n/a
1984-85	Nil	Nil	26,000	575,000
1985-86	Nil	Nil	29,000	656,000
1986-87	Nil	Nil	54,000	825,000
1987-88	Nil	Nil	12,000	693,000
1988-89	Nil	Nil	380,000	1,004,000
1989-90	Nil	Nil	116,000	2,373,000
1990-91	Nil	Nil	53,000	2,379,000

[1] Forecast.

Figures for publicity advertising prior to 1982-83 are not available as the information for those years includes recruitment and other types of advertising. Information is not readily available to distinguish between expenditure on advertising in newspapers and that in the press generally.

Separate figures for expenditure on other publicity material prior to 1984-85 are available only at disproportionate cost. A figure for the overall publicity budget for 1992-93 is not yet available.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by his Department during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (a) the topic, (b) the commencement date, (c) the duration and (d) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Mr. Curry: Publicising the new "Food Sense" series of publications, launched in August this year, will include limited regional TV advertising in 1991-92. The production has been undertaken by Coleman RSCG, who were commissioned by the Central Office of Information.

A touring exhibition carried consumer information, on a wide range of food safety and environmental issues, to major shopping centres and agricultural shows between May and October this year. The exhibition was produced by Interactive Learning Productions of Newcastle upon Tyne.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Curry: The information required for the financial years 1979-80 to 1983-84 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The figures for the subsequent years are as follows:—

1984-85	3·2
1985-86	3·5
1986-87	3·0
1987-88	0·6
1988-89	0·8
1989-90	1·1
1991-92	0·5

Figures for the years 1984-85 to 1986-87 refer to the total cost of press services and paid publicity which could be separated to show expenditure on press services only at disproportionate cost. Figures for 1987-88 to 1991-92 relate to press services alone. The budget for press services for 1992-93 is not yet available.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether his Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. Curry: No.

Catering Working Group

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the different types of catering establishments that are being considered by his catering working group; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The group is considering ways of increasing the provision of healthier food in all types of catering outlets.

SCOTLAND

Sports Clubs (Rate Relief)

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many non-profit making sports clubs in Scotland applied for rate relief for each of the financial years 1979-80 to 1991-92 and as a total over the same period; and how many of these clubs were granted rate relief of (a) 25 per cent. or under, (b) 25 to 50 per cent., (c) 50 to 65 per cent., (d) 65 to 90 per cent. and (e) 90 to 100 per cent.

Mr. Allan Stewart: This information is not held centrally.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give separate figures for spending by the Scottish Development Agency on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is set out in the table.

Year	Television advertising	Radio advertising	Newspaper advertising	Other promotional material
	£'000	£'000	£'000	£'000
1982-83	—	—	1,620	1,629
1983-84	96	13	2,182	1,698
1984-85	147	154	3,153	2,133

Year	Television advertising £'000	Radio advertising £'000	Newspaper advertising £'000	Other promotional material £'000
1985-86	253	16	2,553	1,738
1986-87	152	5	1,860	1,339
1987-88	201	9	1,708	822
1988-89	—	—	1,430	1,877
1990-91	—	—	1,592	1,433

The information for 1979-80 to 1981-82 cannot be provided except at disproportionate cost. The Scottish Development Agency, along with the activity of the Training Agency in Scotland, was replaced by Scottish Enterprise on 1 April 1991.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Forestry Commission on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 8 May 1991, at column 537. The estimate for the current year is £260,000. No figure is available at this stage for 1992-93.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total expenditure by the Forestry Commission on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 3 May 1991, columns 346-47. The estimate for the current year is £2 million. No figure is available at this stage for 1992-93.

Mar Lodge

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it the policy of Her Majesty's Government to bring Mar Lodge estate into public ownership.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No. Our objective is to enable Scottish Natural Heritage to negotiate a management agreement with the new owner of Mar Lodge estate, whoever that may be, which will safeguard the conservation and other qualities of the estate.

Forresterhill Hospital

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy not to allow Forresterhill hospital, Aberdeen, to opt out of local health board control.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The application for NHS trust status submitted on behalf of the Forresterhill group of hospitals will be considered against the published criteria.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Mr. Lang: No.

Electoral Registers

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many first-time voters appeared on the electoral register (a) in each Scottish constituency and (b) in the whole of Scotland in each year since 1987.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information on the number of those attaining the age of 18 and appearing on the electoral register in Scotland for the first time, by parliamentary constituency and in total, is contained in the annual series "Electoral Statistics" compiled by OPCS. Copies are available in the House Library.

Dunoon General Hospital

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement concerning the future of Dunoon general hospital.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This is a matter for Argyll and Clyde health board, but any changes proposed by the board would require the consent of the Secretary of State.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Miss Widdecombe: No.

Income Support

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people he expects to change entitlement from income support to family credit as a result of the Income Support (General Amendment) Regulations, S.I., 1991, No. 1559.

Mr. Jack: We estimate that around 45,000 families on income support and working over 16 hours a week will become eligible for family credit in April 1992.

In the longer term we expect the reduction in the qualifying hours rule to attract many more people who are on income support into work and on to family credit.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what proportion of pensioners claim income support.

Miss Widdecombe: There are about 1·4 million pensioners claiming income support, some 14 per cent. of all pensioners.

Source: 1990 Annual Statistical Inquiry.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the categories of income support claimants (a) who have to sign on as unemployed, be available for work and be actively seeking work and (b) who do not; and if he will give in table form the numbers and the percentages of total income support claimants in each case.

Mr. Jack: All claimants who are not specifically exempt from the availability for work and actively seeking work requirements must satisfy these conditions in order to be entitled to income support.

The circumstances in which exemptions apply are set out in schedule 1 to the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987.

Detailed information on the number of IS claimants taking advantage of each of the exemptions is not available. However, the following table gives a general breakdown of claimant categories, based on entitlement to IS premiums, as at May 1990.

IS claimants by category

Category	Number	Percentage
Unemployed and required to sign	1,063,053	25
Not required to sign
In receipt of training allowance	125,075	3
Lone parents	793,099	19
In receipt of disability premium	330,076	8
Aged 60 or over	1,674,714	40
Other cases	193,883	5
Total	4,179,900	100

Note:
The table is based on information contained in table 3.1 of the "IS Annual Enquiry" for May 1990 which categorises IS claimants by premium entitlement.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of how many additional pensioners in receipt of the retirement pension will be eligible for income support as a consequence of the income support level being higher than the retirement pension as a result of his uprating statement.

Miss Widdecombe: It is estimated that around 400,000 people may become eligible to claim income support following the proposed uprating of benefits in April 1992. The majority of these are likely to be benefit units where one or more members is aged 60 or over, although it is difficult to be precise about the proportion, which is extremely sensitive to assumptions used in the estimating model.

Source: Modelled using data drawn from the 1986-87-88 Family Expenditure Surveys at 1992 prices.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish in the Official Report the number of people on transitional protection in April 1991.

Miss Widdecombe: It is estimated that, immediately after the uprating in April 1991, 25,000 income support claimants were receiving a transitional addition.[1] It is not possible to give an estimate of the number of income support claimants who were then receiving a boarder's protected sum. At that time housing benefit transitional protection payments were being made to 21,000 people.

[1] Source: Based on modelling using date drawn from the May 1990 Annual Statistical Enquiry of Income Support recipients.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many women and how many men were in receipt of each of the premia paid with income support, listed separately, at the latest date for which information is available.

Miss Widdecombe: The information for May 1990, the latest date for which it is available, is as follows:

	Single		Couples
Premium	Male	Female	Male	Female
Higher pensioner	86,946	490,815	102,324	8,186
Enhanced pensioner	38,039	238,755	35,418	1,792
Pensioner	90,767	307,342	94,929	2,987
Severe disability	10,485	50,713	1,095	100
Disability	108,127	145,774	68,585	8,491
Lone parent	34,119	759,180	199	—
Disabled child	698	10,683	5,995	399
Family premium	38,113	777,460	317,725	10,796

Notes:
(1) There is free choice of claimant between couples; either may claim. Classification by sex denotes the sex of the claimant, and does not identify which partner qualifies for the premium.
(2) Figures show the number of premiums in payment; a case may have more than one premium.
(3) The carer premium, introduced in October 1990, is not included.
(4) Source: Income Support Annual Statistical Enquiry 1990.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the effects on incentives to work of the Income Support (General Amendment) Regulations S.I., 1991, No. 1559 for people who receive income support for mortgage interest payments.

Mr. Jack: The change in the hours rule will mean that 30,000 families with children who are receiving income support and working between 16 and 24 hours a week—some of whom pay mortgage interest—will be better off by claiming family credit.

There will be some people working between 16 and 24 hours a week and receiving income support at the time of the change who will either not be eligible to claim family credit or will not be better off by doing so. These will include some with mortgages. They can continue to claim income support and their work incentives will not therefore be affected.

Benefits Uprating

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give precise details of the calculation he made before uprating means-tested benefits by 7 per cent. rather than 7·2 per cent. for April 1992.

Miss Widdecombe: The new index to be used in April 1992 differs from its predecessor in that water and sewerage charges, 20 per cent. of the community charge and miscellaneous housing costs—dwelling insurance and ground rent, repair and maintenance charges, do-it-yourself materials—will be included. Rent and mortgage interest remain wholly excluded. The new index shows a rise of 7 per cent. in September 1991 compared with its level in September 1990.

Marginal Tax Rate

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the marginal tax rate incurred by a combination of income tax, national insurance, housing benefit rent withdrawal taper and the community charge benefit withdrawal taper in 1990; and what is the contribution of each of these to the total.

Mr. Jack: The marginal deduction rate for a person paying standard rate income tax, national insurance and receiving both a rent rebate and community charge benefit as from April is 87 per cent.

The marginal deduction rate on total gross pay for each element is:

	Per cent.
Tax	25
NI	9
Housing Benefit	43
Community Charge Benefit	10

Widows

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what proportion of widows aged under 60 years in receipt of (1) widow's pension, (a) full and (b) reduced, and (2) widowed mother's allowance also claim (i) income support, (ii) family credit and (iii) housing benefit.

Miss Widdecombe: It is not possible to answer all the question. The most recent available data on widows' benefits are for March 1990 and for income support and housing benefit, May 1990. These two data sources have been combined to provide estimates of the proportion of those on widows' benefits on other benefits. Statistically valid figures of the number of widows receiving both widows' benefits and family credit are not available. A total of 18,000 or 6 per cent. of those in receipt of widow's pension and 6,000 or 9 per cent. of those in receipt of widowed mother's allowance were also in receipt of income support. A further 24,000, or 7 per cent., of those in receipt of either widow's pension or widowed mother's allowance also received housing benefit.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the composition of income for single pensioners and pensioner couples by quintile of income, using the 1988 family expenditure survey, broken down by average gross weekly income, and the proportion derived from social security benefits, occupational pensions, savings and investment and earnings.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is in the tables.

2. Quintiles used are of net equivalised income gross of housing costs.
3. Quintile groups used are for all pensioners, rather than for singles and couples separately.
4. Pensioners are defined as single people over state pension age, or couples in which the man is over pension age.
5. Figures may not sum to totals due to rounding.
6. All averages in Tables 1 and 3 are means.
7. '*' denotes a figure of less than 0·5 per cent.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what steps he is taking to notify those pensioners who qualify for income support as a result of his uprating statement that they now have rights to this additional entitlement, and the consequent passported benefits;

(2) what steps he is taking to inform and assist local authorities to ensure that all those individuals entitled to additional benefits, including housing benefit, community charge benefit and other passported benefits, arising from pensioners becoming entitled to income support, are notified of their rights by local authorities.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department has written to the local authority associations to tell them that we shall issue a circular asking local authorities to bring to the attention of pensioners receiving the maximum rate of community charge benefit that they might become entitled to income support when benefits are uprated next April.

We are considering what further steps, through the Benefits Agency or otherwise, can be taken to bring the possibility of new or renewed entitlement to income support for pensioners arising from the uprating.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners received income support and/or housing benefit to top up retirement pension reduced following a stay in hospital of more than six weeks in 1990-91; and what was the cost.

Miss Widdecombe: The annual statistical inquiry for 1990 did not reveal any such cases. The inquiry is based on a 1 per cent. sample of all cases.

Eating-out Allowance

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the cost of the boarders' eating-out allowance in its final year of operation; how many households received it; and how many individuals received it.

Miss Widdecombe: No data are available on either cost or the number of boarders receiving an additional allowance for meals.

Benefit Claimants

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish the number of claimants and their dependants living below the supplementary benefit and income support line in each year since 1979.

Miss Widdecombe: Numbers of individuals and their dependants with incomes below supplementary benefit levels for the years 1979, 1981, 1983 and 1985, are held in the low income family tables, copies of which are available in the Library. In October 1990, the Institute for Fiscal Studies published data for 1987. This is the latest available information as these tables are no longer published. Any further figures could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish the number of claimants and their dependants on supplementary benefit and income support for each year since 1979.

Miss Widdecombe: This information is published annually in the supplementary benefits or income support statistics. Copies of these reports are available in the Library.

Pensioners

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what the gross additional cost of increasing the period from six to 12 weeks would be before cutting the retirement pension of pensioners who become in-patients; and what the cost would be net of other benefit savings.

(2) how many (a) retirement pensioners and (b) dependants of retirement pensioners had their retirement pension reduced after staying in hospital for more than six weeks in 1990-91;

(3) what was the net saving to his Department in 1990-91 from reducing retirement pensions to pensioners or their dependants who became hospital in-patients for in excess of six weeks.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not available in the form requested. Statistics show the percentage rate by which the pension is reduced rather when it is reduced. Furthermore, data on the number of pensioners whose pensions have been reduced is available only on the basis of the number of reductions being made at specified dates during the year—31 March and 30 September. Separate information on dependants of retirement pensioners is not collected.

At 30 September 1990, the latest date for which figures are available, the number of pensioners whose retirement pensions were being reduced as a result of receiving in-patient treatment under the national health service was 55,700.

Staff Health

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the organisations which were invited to tender for the health checks on his Department's staff aged 35 years or over.

Miss Widdecombe: Disclosure of the names of the organisations invited to tender for these health checks could cause commercial damage to the unsuccessful tenderers and jeopardise the Department's future relationship with its suppliers.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) who paid for distribution of the leaflet informing his Department's staff of the health checks on those aged 35 years or over; and what was the cost;

(2) who paid for the leaflet informing his Department's staff of the health checks on those aged 35 years and over; and what was the cost.

Miss Widdecombe: The cost of the production and distribution of publicity material was included in the tender and formed an integral part of the contract. This element of the work was not costed separately.

Severe Disability Premium

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many individuals will be prevented from claiming severe disability premium by the proposed change to regulation 3 of the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987; and what saving the Department expects.

Miss Widdecombe: The amendment regulation restores the policy intention that the severe disability premium goes to people who live alone or with others on a commercial basis. The number of people who might have tried to establish a commercial relationship with members of their family who are close relatives, but for the amendment regulation, is not known. No savings are anticipated; the amendment avoids unplanned expenditure. Further, the amendment regulations contain preserved rights to the premium, at a cost of £5 million.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people currently claim the severe disability premium on income support by having tenancy agreements with their families; how much it would cost to continue to allow such claims; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not available in the form requested. An estimated 3,000 people may be receiving the premium, or have taken steps to obtain it, on the grounds that since April 1988 they have become joint tenants or co-owners with close relatives with whom they live. The regulations laid on 21 October 1991 provide preserved rights to the premium for this group at an estimated cost of £5 million.

Mortgage Assistance

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the comparable figures to those contained in his answer of 22 October, Official Report, columns 577-78, for 1987, 1988 and 1989; and if he will give unemployed claimants receiving mortgage assistance as a proportion of unemployed claimants.

Mr. Jack: The information is given in the table:

Income Support

Year	Unemployed	As proportion of all claimants receiving help with mortgages Per cent.	As proportion of all unemployed claimants Per cent.	Lone Parents	As proportion of all claimants receiving help with mortgages Per cent.
1987	207,000	28	12	74,000	10
1988	114,000	38	8	62,000	21
1989	88,000	31	8	67,000	24

Notes: Figures for numbers of claimants are rounded to the nearest 1,000.

Mr. G. P. Simmons

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will ensure that Mr. G. P. Simmons of 13 Hartley street, Bethnal Green, London E2 ONR receives a pension book this week plus a Girocheque for any money owed since his book was returned to the Bawhill office in July 1991.

Miss Widdecombe: The administration of income support is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and copies will be placed in the Library and the Public Information Office.

Occupational Pensions

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of pensioners retiring in each of the past 11 years have retired with an occupational pension.

Miss Widdecombe: Such information as is available is given in the table. The definition of newly retired pensioners is the one normally used when quoting figures from the Family Expenditure Survey: single women aged 60-64, single men aged 65-69 and couples where the man is aged 65-69, in each respective year.

Proportion of Newly-retired Pensioner Units in receipt of an Occupational Pension, by Year.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will update his answer, Official Report, 27 March 1990, columns 161-63, concerning pensioners with occupational pensions using the 1988 Family Expenditure Survey.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is in the table.

Table 2: Pensioners with occupational pensions

2. All figures refer to pensioner units. A pensioner unit is defined as a single person of pensionable age or a couple in which the man is of pensionable age.
3. £s per week at 1988 prices.
4. Mean and median amounts are for those pensioners actually in receipt of occupational pensions.

Unemployment

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish the full cost to his Department of every extra 100,000 unemployed people in (a) 1991-92 and (b) 1992-93.

Mr. Jack: The information is in table 24 of the departmental report, "Social Security—The Government's Expenditure Plans 1991-92 to 1993-94" (Cm. 1514), a copy of which is in the Library.

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 11 July 1991.

Mr. Jack: Public opinion surveys carried out by the Department of Social Security since 11 July 1991 are listed in the table.

Survey	Purpose
1. National Customer Survey	Continuing evaluation of customer opinion of benefits delivery by local and central offices of the Benefits Agency.
2. Family Credit Campaign Evaluation	A continuing evaluation of the campaign. Surveys conducted in August and October.
3. Child Support Agency	Target market study.

Mrs. Teresa Byrne

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will ensure that Mrs. Teresa Byrne of 46 Linden place, Bispham, Blackpool FY2 0QY, who was widowed on 30 October 1990, receives a pension book in the next week.

Miss Widdecombe: I understand from Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency, that an invalidity pension order book was sent to Mrs. Byrne on 1 November 1991.

SERPS

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will take steps to quantify the contribution of the state earnings-related pension scheme to pensioners' incomes derived from (a) social security benefit and (b) occupational pensions in each year since 1978-79.

Miss Widdecombe: Administrative data on the average amount of additional pension (SERPS) has been collected since 1978-79, but this is not linked to data on other incomes apart from retirement pension and other benefits paid with it. Questions were added to the 1987 and subsequent annual family expenditure surveys asking for information on the amount of net additional pension (SERPS) paid to each individual and their contracted-out deductions to try to expand the details available on pensioners' incomes. So far, the proportion of those pensioners able to respond accurately to these questions does not appear to be sufficient to estimate the contribution of SERPS to pensioners' total incomes. There is no way of discovering this contribution in any earlier years.

Child Benefit

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the additional administrative cost of (a) introducing a two-tier child benefit in April 1991 and (b) making a half-year increase in child benefit in October; and what was the yearly cost difference between paying a flat rate child benefit to every child and a two-tier benefit.

Mr. Jack: The administration of child benefit is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and copies will be placed in the Library and the Public Information Office.

Benefit Offices

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many benefit claim offices were closed to the public at any time during the past year during official opening hours because they were becoming overcrowded or because staff were over-pressed; which offices closed; and for how many days.

Miss Widdecombe: I understand from Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency, that the information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Sickness Benefit

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he last reviewed eligibility to sickness benefit for a person with an untreatable condition and incapable of work within the first six months of the benefit period who wishes to travel abroad; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The special conditions for eligibility to sickness benefit for a person going abroad are contained in regulation 2 of the Social Security Benefit (Persons Abroad) Regulations 1975. These conditions, along with all the other conditions for eligibility to sickness benefit, whether in the United Kingdom or overseas, are kept under constant review. We have no plans to amend these regulations.

Domestic Violence

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the number of district offices in which women fleeing domestic violence are classified as a high, medium and low priority, respectively, for the purpose of community care grants paid under the social fund.

Mr. Scott: I understand from Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency, that the information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Each district manager constructs his guidance, taking into account guidance issued by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and a variety of local factors. This specific grouping may not always occur within the high priority band of a district's guidance because of the need to ensure payment for even more needy cases. However, all the circumstances of an application will still be considered and discretion can be used to raise the priority of an individual application, allowing a payment to be made.

Social Fund Loans

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what proportion of districts are now paying social fund loans only where there is considered to be serious risk to health and safety.

Mr. Scott: I understand from Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency, that the information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Student Refugees

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what financial support is available from his Department to a student with refugee status who is barred from taking paid work but unable to claim income support or housing benefit.

Miss Widdecombe: I understand that students with refugee status are not barred from taking up paid employment. The social security system is not intended to support students, who should look to the educational maintenance system for any necessary financial support.

Community Care Grants

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will issue guidance to area social fund officers reminding them that their guidance on community care grants should specify the priority of needs.

Mr. Scott: We are currently considering the need for extending and amending existing guidance. I will write to the hon. Member with details of any action that we decide to take.

Lower-paid Families

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table showing the numbers of lower-paid families with and without children, whose marginal tax rates including benefit withdrawal will be (a) 90 to 100 per cent., (b) 80 to 90 per cent., (c) 70 to 80 per cent., (d) 60 to 70 per cent., (e) 50 to 60 per cent. and (f) 40 to 50 per cent., taking into account the tax changes for 1991-92.

Mr. Jack: The information requested is set out in the table.

Marginal Deduction Rates Including Social Security

[1] There are no families facing marginal deduction rates of 100 per cent. or more.

Mortgage Interest

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in what circumstances payments of income support for mortgage interest are made to the mortgagee rather than the mortgagor.

Mr. Scott: Income support for mortgage interest may be paid direct where such payments are in the interest of the mortgagor and his family. To strengthen these arrangements we shall in future be asking all claimants with mortgages to provide evidence of the state of their loan account at the outset of their claim, and annually thereafter. This will enable the Department quickly to identify people who have arrears and for whom direct payment to the lender will be appropriate. We expect to have the new administrative arrangements in operation before the new year.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Test Sites

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his most recent assessment of radioactive surface contamination through venting and cratering at the Nevada nuclear bomb test site.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) on 29 October 1990, Official Report, column 416.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the outcome of the talks at his Department with the delegation of aboriginals from South Australia on 30 October about compensation for the effects of British nuclear tests at Maralinga.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A delegation representing the Maralinga aborigine population met my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces and senior officials on 30 October. They presented their views on the further rehabilitation of the former nuclear test sites at Maralinga and Emu field, and on the question of compensation for any remaining restrictions on access that might remain once any rehabilitation is complete. Both sides found the meetings useful.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The earliest year for which figures are available is 1982-83. Figures for the period 1982-83 to 1990-91 are as follows:

	£ million
1982-83	5·1
1983-84	6·3
1984-85	6·8
1985-86	6·7
1986-87	7·3
1987-88	7·0
1988-89	7·1
1989-90	8·0
1990-91	8·4

The estimated expenditure figure for 1991-92 is £9·0 million and for 1992-93 £9·5 million.

The figures provided include staff costs and expenditure on films, exhibitions, publications and equipment.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

Service Accommodation

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of the report of the working party report on service accommodation requirements.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No. The Government's conclusions on the recommendations of the task force on service housing will be made public by announcements in the usual way.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many service married quarters he plans to make available for purchase by members of the armed forces; and where they are located.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: All surplus married quarters which are suitable for individual sale are normally offered for sale to service personnel through the services' discount scheme in the first instance. Those currently being offered for sale include properties in Exmouth, Devizes, Kirkudbright, Edinburgh, Barton Stacey, Gosport, Peterhead, Ripon, Lower Quinton, Uckfield, Southend, Chatham, Forres, Ely, Folkestone, Portsmouth and Plymouth.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discount will be offered to service personnel wishing to buy their service married quarters.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Service personnel purchasing surplus married quarters through the services' discount scheme are given a 30 per cent. discount.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many service married quarters are currently vacant; and where they are located.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As at 30 September 1991, the latest date for which figures are available, 9,834 service married quarters were vacant.

The regional breakdown is as follows:

Region	Total vacant
Northern	98
Yorkshire	731
East Midlands	745
East Anglia	622
South East	3,604
South West	1,659
West Midlands	289
North West	121
Wales	273

Region	Total vacant
Scotland	1,191
Northern Ireland	501
Total	9,834

Many of these properties were either undergoing or awaiting major works or modernisation, some were already allotted to service families who were due to move in shortly, and others were being considered for disposal. In addition, 1,613 houses were in the process of being sold.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether service personnel leaving the armed forces will have the same right to purchase their service married quarters as those continuing in the services.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Service personnel in general do not have a right to purchase their service married quarters. There is, however, a scheme under which service personnel may apply to purchase surplus vacant married quarters at a discount. We are examining the scope for giving personnel who will be made redundant a degree of priority under this discount scheme.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of service personnel are married; and what proportion live in service married quarters.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Approximately 52 per cent. of service personnel are married and approximately 20 per cent. of service personnel live in service married quarters.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many service married quarters he is planning to make available to housing associations; for how long they will be made available; whether the housing associations will be charged; and where the properties are located.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Discussions with housing associations are continuing. It is too soon to provide details of any scheme that may be adopted.

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 11 July 1991.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I will write to the hon. Member.

Gordon Highlanders

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review the White Paper proposals concerning the Gordon Highlanders.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to my statement during the debate on the Address on 1 November 1991, Official Report, column 186.

Worcester and Sherwood Foresters

Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement regarding the absence without leave since 4 October of Private Patrick Callaghan of Tylder road, Worksop and Private Byron Dent of Kilburn road, Belper now stationed in the Worcester and Sherwood Foresters at Lichfield following their allegations of brutality by non-commissioned officers while stationed in Cyprus this summer; if he will ensure that any disciplinary hearings and sentence will be made in this country and that they will not be sent back to Cyprus.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The two soldiers are no longer absent. The special investigation branch of the Royal Military Police is undertaking a full investigation into the allegations of bullying they have made.

Bullying is not tolerated in the Army, and anyone found responsible for such behaviour will be appropriately disciplined. Any charges that may follow from the SIB investigation will be dealt with in Cyprus, and the two soldiers may have to return there to give evidence.

Charges arising from the soldiers' absence will also be dealt with in Cyprus, and their attendance will be necessary. With regard to future postings, as soldiers must be available for duty anywhere in the world, I cannot give the undertaking sought.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Mr. Tom King: No.

Mortgages

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence with which financial institution his Department has arranged the provision of mortgages for service personnel; at what rates will the mortgage be offered; and whether they will be made available to service personnel leaving the armed forces.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The company concerned has asked that such details are not made public.

Merchant Ships (Emergency Use)

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his policy for having available a pool of British registered merchant ships for emergency defence use.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Current policy for providing merchant ships for defence purposes during crisis and war is to charter commercially on the open market or, where this is not possible, to requisition ships on the British register.

Thames House, Millbank

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Government Departments' workers will be located, and what work will be carried out, at Thames house, Millbank, which is currently being refurbished.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Staff will be moved into Thames house from a number of buildings currently occupied. Details will not be finalised for some time yet.

WEU Satellite Centre

Sir Michael Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action is being taken by his Department to ensure that the proposed Western European Union ground sector data management sector is based in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The UK is one of three countries to have bid for the location of the proposed WEU satellite centre. All three bids are currently under consideration and await the decision of WEU Ministers on 18 November.

HEALTH

NHS Trusts

13. Mr. Bidwell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has of the financial difficulties being experienced by trust hospitals.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: All the NHS trusts submit details of their financial performance to the NHS management executive on a quarterly or monthly basis. The returns received to date indicate that all trusts are planning to meet their financial duties this year.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list his estimate of the start-up cost for each of the first and second wave hospital trusts; and which budget has met this cost in each instance.

Mr. Dorrell: A sum of £190,000 was allocated for each trust in the first wave and £15,000 towards conveyancing costs. A similar figure will be allocated to the second wave of trusts. This is a top-sliced budget to support expenses arising from the reforms and is a non-recurring revenue addition paid to regions to help cover expenditure incurred by trusts during their shadow running period.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many trust boards are without female representation; and if he will list them.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: None.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the female trust chief executives and the trusts they manage.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The appointment of the chief executive and other executive directors is a matter for the NHS trust board. The hon. Member may wish to contact the individual NHS trust boards for this information.

Immunisation and Smear Testing

14. Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will report on the extent to which doctors in the Northern health region have achieved the targets for immunisation and smear testing.

Mr. Dorrell: At 1 October 1990, the latest figures available, 74 per cent. of GPs in the Northern regional health authority area had achieved the higher target level for immunisations and 20 per cent. had achieved the lower target level. The corresponding figures for cervical cytology targets were 72 per cent. and 27 per cent. I congratulate all those involved in this splendid achievement.

Prescription Charges

15. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the percentage increase in the NHS prescription charge, since May 1979.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The figure is 1,600 per cent.

Care of the Elderly

16. Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give the number of beds for the continuing care of the elderly in 1979 and currently.

Mr. Dorrell: The average daily number of available geriatric beds in national health service hospitals in England fell from 55,000 in 1979 to 49,000 in 1989-90 —the latest figures available. These figures include all beds under the supervision of a geriatric consultant; beds for long-stay patients are not separately identified.

In the same period, the numbers of elderly patients treated rose from 243,000 to 447,000.

Patients Charter

17. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how the patients charter will affect health care for patients.

Mr. Waldegrave: The key aim of the charter is to improve the service provided to patients. Patients will be clear what their rights are under the national health service. They will know the standards of service they can expect to receive and what to do and who to contact if standards of service do not meet expectations. They will also be encouraged to give their views on services to help the NHS to do even better in the future.

Waiting Lists

18. Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he next plans to meet representatives of health authorities to discuss waiting lists.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I meet representatives of health authorities regularly to discuss a whole range of NHS issues.

28. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on how the length of time for waiting lists is to be calculated.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Waiting time is calculated from the date on which a patient's name is added to a waiting list for in-patient or day case treatment by a hospital doctor.

Under the patients charter, from 1 April 1992, all patients—except for special cases—are to be guaranteed admission within two years from the date on which their name is added to the waiting list. Health authorities will also set local charter standards on waiting times for first out-patient appointments.

27. Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he is proposing to provide patients with more information about waiting times for treatment at hospitals before they undergo the initial consultation.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The patients charter, published last week, sets out a new right for patients to be given detailed information on local health services, including waiting times for treatment. From 1 April 1992, health authorities must provide information about waiting times for in-patient, day case and out-patient treatment by hospital, specialty and individual consultant, set out in a standard way. Health authorities will also set and publicise local charter standards on waiting times for first out-patient appointments.

GP Fund Holders

19. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of general practitioners became budget holders on 1 April.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A total of 1,720 general practitioners became budget holders on 1 April in England. This represents 6·8 per cent. of the total number of GPs in England.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioners' practices are interested in acquiring fund-holding status from April 1992.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced to the House on 13 March that 306 GP practices in England became fund holders this year. It is anticipated that a similar number will acquire fund-holding status from April 1992.

Cardiologists

20. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will obtain a copy of the review into cardiology staffing published jointly by the British Cardiac Society and Royal College of Physicians; and what steps are being taken by his Department to ensure that each district is served by a full-time cardiologist.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We received the report on 29 October. Its implications are being considered.

Gynaecology and Obstetrics, Liverpool

21. Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about the proposed reorganisation of the gynaecology and obstetrics service in Liverpool.

Mr. Dorrell: We have received a letter from the hon. Member about the £16 million development proposed for the new women's hospital that will bring together at last in one place all the services for women and expectant mothers in Liverpool.

GP Earnings

22. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the average current earning levels of general practitioners.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: From 1 December 1991, general practitioners are intended to earn, on average, £37,975 per annum. In 1988-89, the latest year for which actual earnings are known, general practitioners earned, on average, £28,979.

Dorset Health Authorities

23. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the real level of resources available to (a) West Dorset and (b) East Dorset district health authorities in 1979 and currently.

Mr. Dorrell: Total revenue expenditure by Dorset health authority for the financial year 1979-80 equates to some £116,807,000 at 1990-91 prices.

The total revenue expenditure by the successor East and West Dorset health authorities in the financial year 1990-91 was £165,860,000.

These figures represent an increase in real terms of some 30 per cent.

NHS Trusts, Essex

24. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on progress towards self-governing trust status for hospitals in Mid-Essex.

Mr. Dorrell: I am happy to report that the Mid Essex Hospital Services NHS trust was established on 1 November and will become fully operational on 1 April 1992. The unit has an excellent record and I am sure that it will use its new freedoms to bring even greater benefits to its patients.

NHS Public Finance

25. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of expenditure by the NHS is raised by public finance in 1991-92, and what was the comparable figure in 1978-79.

Mr. Dorrell: It is estimated that public expenditure will account for 94·3 per cent. of NHS expenditure in England this year. The comparable figure for 1978-79 was 97·5 per cent.

Manchester NHS Trust

26. Mr. Litherland: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the financial viability of Manchester Central Hospitals and Community Care NHS Trust in Manchester.

Mr. Dorrell: The Manchester Central Hospitals and Community Care NHS trust was financially viable when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State established it last year and continues to be so.

Stillbirths

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give, for the most recent year, the percentage of birthweights under 1500g and the stillbirth and neonatal mortality rates for babies whose mothers (a) delivered at a domestic address and originally intended to do so, (b) originally intended to deliver in a national health service hospital but delivered at a domestic address as a result of circumstances which occurred unintentionally during labour, (c) originally intended to deliver at a domestic address but delivered in a national health service hospital as a result of a decision made during labour for clinical or other reasons or (d) delivered in a national health service hospital and originally intended to do so.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is not available. Data relating to maternity episodes are collected via the hospital episode statistics—HES—system which will in future years provide some of this information. HES data for 1989-90, the latest year currently available, are not of sufficient quality to allow analysis at this level of detail.

Midwifery

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he intends to include basic and post-basic midwifery education within the terms of reference for the special investigation into how London's health care should be planned in the 1990s.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Sir Bernard Tomlinson, who has been appointed to advise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the development of London health services, has been given a wide-ranging remit to look at the provision of health care, the organisation and provision of undergraduate medical teaching, postgraduate medical education and research and development. If, in the course of his investigation, issues arise which have implications for midwifery education, he would be free to offer advice on this area.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the concern expressed in the eighth report of the Nurses, Midwives and Health Visitors and Professions allied to Medicine Review Body with regard to regional discrepancies in the allocation of clinical grades to posts, particularly in midwifery, is being addressed in his Department's evidence to the forthcoming review body report.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We are aware of the concerns expressed by the review body in its eighth report about the outcome of the clinical grading review. The Health Departments' evidence to the review body is not published.

Hospital Closures

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by national health service region for each of the last five years the number of national health service maternity beds which have been lost to the service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is contained in "Summary of Bed Availability—England" a copy of which is available in the Library. This includes the numbers of NHS maternity beds and the annual average percentage change in each region from 1984 to 1989-90.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether his Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department has used direct mail to every household to inform the public about AIDS and the NHS reforms. A summary of the patients charter will shortly be issued to each household.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. Dorrell: Information for the years 1979-80 to 1987-88 is not available in the form requested.

The Department's budget for communications and publicity includes provision for nurse recruitment, blood donor recruitment and drug misuse campaigns. The other information is set out in the table.

	£ million
Expenditure for 1988-89 is as follows
Television	1·662
Radio	0·205
Newspaper	1·196
Other Material	7·736
Expenditure for 1989-90 is as follows:
Television	3·549
Radio	0·127
Newspaper	2·258
Other Material	10·828
Expenditure for 1990-91 is as follows:
Television	1·900
Radio	0·005
Newspaper	2·739
Other Material	16·845
Estimated expenditure for 1991-92 is as follows:
Television	3·200
Radio	0
Newspaper	2·030
Other Material	18·853

The budget for communications and publicity for 1992-93 has yet to be decided.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by his Department during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (a) the topic, (b) the commencement date, (c) the duration and (d) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the replies that I gave him on 1 July at column 54, 10 July at column 414 and 11 July at column 459. In addition to that information, other campaigns for 1991-92 costing more than £100,000 are:

Advice to elderly people—commencing shortly and will be ongoing.
The Patient's Charter —commenced October and will continue to January 1992.

The only additional major company involved is Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

Television advertising is currently being used for the nursing campaign and will be used in early 1992 for the solvent misuse campaign.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Dorrell: Functions that are commonly associated with press and public relations are carried out by the Department's information division. Manpower and running costs of this division are:

	£ million
1989-90 Expenditure	0·890
1990-91 Expenditure	1·250
1991-92 Expenditure[1]	1·540

[1] Estimated.

Information for the years 1979-80 to 1987-88 is not available in the form requested. Budgets for 1992-93 have yet to be decided.

Abortion

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when his Department first approved the practice of using a macerator to dispose of the bodies of aborted unborn babies into the sewage system.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This method has been used in a small number of private sector approved places since the early 1970s.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the methods of disposal of the bodies of unborn babies by private clinics licensed to perform abortions.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is one of the conditions of approval of private sector places under section 1(3) of the Abortion Act 1967 that the method of foetal disposal is agreed by the Department and that no change is made without prior consultation.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on how many occasions and for what reasons his Department has withheld approval of the use of a macerator to dispose of the bodies of aborted unborn babies.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: None. The use of maceration following termination of pregnancy will not be approved in future.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement regarding the disposal of the bodies of unborn babies following abortion.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Incineration is the preferred method of disposal following termination of pregnancy.

Sugar

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those diseases, ailments or other disorders, other than tooth decay, recognised by his Department as being solely or primarily caused by consumption of sugar.

Mr. Dorrell: The Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy—COMA—in its 1989 report "Dietary Sugars and Human Disease", identified the consumption of non-milk extrinsic sugars or NMEs, principally sucrose, as the primary cause of tooth decay. It found insufficient evidence to identify dietary sugars as either the sole or primary cause of any other disease or disorder. However, it recommended that intakes of sucrose in excess of about 200g per day should be avoided, since this may be associated in normal adults with elevations of blood cholesterol, glucose and insulin concentrations. It also recommended restriction of intakes of NMEs in the obese and those becoming obese.

COMA further advised that people with diabetes or hypertriglyceridaemia should restrict their intake of NMEs to less than about 25g to 50g per day, unless otherwise instructed by their own physician or dietitian. It also recommended the intensification of research into links between sucrose intake and colo-rectal cancer, renal and biliary calculi and Crohn's Disease as evidence in these areas is inadequate to justify any general dietary recommendations.

COMA's report, "Dietary Reference Values for Food Energy and Nutrients for the United Kingdom", published in July of this year, endorsed the findings of the 1989 report. Both reports are available in the Library.

Birth Statistics

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each national health service region the number of babies that were born in 1990.

Mr. Dorrell: The number of live births occurring in each regional health authority in England and Wales in 1990 is given in the table.

Regional Health Authorities	Total live births
Northern	40,446
Yorkshire	51,084
Trent	59,399
East Anglian	28,206
North West Thames	47,332

Oxford	36,211
South Western	40,464
West Midlands	76,103
Mersey	33,008
North Western	60,447
Wales	37,193

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each national health service region (a) the number of babies born weighing less than 1500g and (b) the proportion of births under 1500g in 1990.

Mr. Dorrell: The number of low birth weight babies under 1500g, and the proportion of births under 1500g, by regional health authority, in 1990, is as follows:

RHA by residence of mother	Total births Under 1500g	Proportion under 1500g per 100 [1]total births
Yorkshire	541	1·1

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each national health service region (a) the number of low birth weight babies, under 2500g, and (b) the proportion of births under 2500g in 1990.

Mr. Dorrell: The number of low birth weight babies under 2500g, and the proportion of births under 2500g, by regional health authority, in 1990 is as follows:

Regional health authority by residence of mother	Total births under 2500 g	Proportion under 2500 g per 100 total births
Northern	2,795	6·8
Yorkshire	3,660	7·1

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each national health service region (a) the number and rates of perinatal deaths, (b) the number and rates of neonatal deaths and (c) the number and rate of post neonatal deaths in 1990.

Mr. Dorrell: The numbers and rates of perinatal, neonatal and post neonatal deaths for each regional health authority in 1990 are as follows:

RHA by residence	Perinatal deaths		Neonatal deaths		Postneonatal deaths
	number	rate	number	rate	number	rate

Perinatal mortality: stillbirths and deaths in the first week of life. Rates per 1,000 live and still births.
Neonatal mortality: deaths in the first 28 days of life. Rates per 1,000 live births.
Postneonatal deaths: deaths at ages 28 days and over but under one year. Rates per 1,000 live births.

Aromatherapists

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the number of unqualified aromatherapists practising in England.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to introduce a licensing system for practitioners of herbal medicine, aromatherapy and other forms of alternative or complementary medicine.

Mr. Dorrell: There are no such plans.

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 11 July.

Mr. Dorrell: The information readily available relates to the register of surveys maintained by the Central Statistical Office. Titles of surveys carried out since 11 July are as follows:

Public perception of family doctor services.
Anti-Drugs Misuse Campaign 1991-92: Strategy.

Clinical Waste (Disposal)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance has been issued to regional health authorities and district health authorities with regard to the upgrading of existing facilities for the disposal of clinical waste, following the removal of Crown immunity from hospitals.

Mr. Dorrell: Guidance, under cover of an executive letter ELM(91)M/1, was issued to the NHS on 20 March 1991 in a document entitled "Strategic Guide for Waste Management", a copy of which is available in the Library.

Cot Deaths

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what was the recommendation to mothers on whether to lie babies down to sleep on back, front or side in the "Pregnancy Book" issued to all mothers (a) in the version issued in 1990, (b) as revised in 1991, (c) as reprinted in 1991 and (d) as intended now; and how many copies of it were printed for distribution;

(2) what steps he is taking to inform health care professionals, doctors, midwives, and maternity homes of how to advise mothers on avoiding cot deaths;

(3) when his Department was informed about the New Zealand research and the factors associated with cot deaths; what steps he then took to assess that research; and what other action was taken.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I shall let the hon. Member have such information as is available as soon as possible.

Criminal Justice

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance has been given to the national steering group on social service departments' role in the Criminal Justice Act on the need for an early report; and what studies are being conducted into the resource implications.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The first meeting of the national steering group is to be held on 8 November. A detailed timetable for the production of an action plan will be considered at that meeting. Members are aware of the need to complete their work by the time the main provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 are implemented in October 1992. Part of the group's remit will be to make an assessment of the additional resources required to enable the practice of remanding juveniles to penal establishments to be abolished.

Adoption

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the difficulties facing social workers undertaking inquiries into the proposed adoption of children brought into the United Kingdom from other countries; and what guidance has been issued by his Department on procedures to be followed.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: As part of its responsibilities for liaising with local authority social services departments on all child care matters, the Department's social services inspectorate is in contact with local authorities on intercountry adoption. The inspectorate is available to advise on intercountry adoption in general and on any particular matters of difficulty.

Detailed guidance on intercountry adoption is contained in letters CI(90)17 and CI(91)14 issued by the chief inspector of the social services inspectorate to directors of social services in England. Copies of which are available in the Library.

South Yorkshire Ambulance Service

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the hospitals offered in the consultations on the application of the South Yorkshire ambulance service for trust status expressed opposition or criticism of the proposal.

Mr. Dorrell: The public consultation exercise was organised by Trent regional health authority; the results are available from the authority.

Health Authorities

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each national health service region (a) the total number of health authority members and (b) the number of female health authority members.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Each regional health authority has five non-executive members. The number of female members in each is as follows:

	Number
Northern	1
Yorkshire	1
Trent	1
East Anglian	2
North West Thames	2
North East Thames	2
South East Thames	1
South West Thames	2
Wessex	3
Oxford	1
South Western	1
West Midlands	1
Mersey	1
North Western	1

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each national health service region (a) the number of health authorities without female representation and (b) the district health authorities without female representation.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information about the number of district health authority members who are female is not collected centrally. The appointment of district health authority members is the responsibility of regional health authorities.

Hospital Social Workers

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the implications of recent changes in the national health service, including the creation of hospital trusts, for the roles and responsibilities of hospital social workers.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The NHS reforms have not changed the collaborative arrangements whereby local authorities provide social work services to the NHS without charge or the responsibilities of the individual social workers concerned. Local authority circular LAC(91)14 issued in October 1991 made this clear; a copy of the circular is available in the Library.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether any member of his Department's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Mr. Dorrell: No.

Dentures

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many sets of complete upper and lower synthetic dentures were supplied under the national health service during the financial years 1988-89, 1989-90 and 1990-91.

Mr. Dorrell: In 1988-89 there were 439,630 sets of complete upper and lower synthetic dentures provided under the national health service in England. The figure for 1989-90 was 345,430. The figure for 1990-91 is not yet available. The decline in numbers is likely to continue as people retain their natural teeth for longer.

Lowermoor (Pollution)

Sir Gerrard Neale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he received the report of the Lowermoor incident health advisory group of their assessment of reports on the health effects on people resident in the Lowermoor distribution area at the time of the pollution incident in 1987 which have become available since the group reported in July 1989; when it will be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: I am pleased to say that the Lowermoor incident health advisory group has completed its report following careful assessment and evaluation of all available information. It has consulted extremely widely on all the matters before it. Its report is being published today, and I am placing copies in the Library.

The group has concluded that the research reported to it does not provide convincing evidence that harmful accumulation of aluminium has occurred, nor that there is a greater prevalence of organic abnormalities in the exposed population. It does not expect lasting physical harm from the toxicity of the contaminated water itself. Nevertheless, it acknowledges that the incident was unique and although it has no reason to predict any late consequences, it cannot exclude them categorically.

The group states that it has no doubt that the accident itself and subsequent events have led to real mental and physical suffering in the community. Such a situation is well recognised following major accidents. The district health authority is arranging the continuation of counselling services for at least two years.

The advisory group has recommended that preliminary work which suggests that some residents are "sensitised" to aluminium, so that they experience increased absorption of aluminium and a worsening of symptoms, be repeated. Agreement in principle has been reached for the Medical Research Council to commission and manage this research, and for the Department of Health to provide funding. The Medical Research Council will provide the mechanism for the development of protocols, and provision of peer review for this research.

The Government welcome the group's advice, and I have asked the health authority to act on those recommendations for following up the health of local people that the group have made.

I am grateful to the chairman, Professor Dame Barbara Clayton, and the members of her group for the thorough way in which they have produced such an authoritative report. The Department, the health authority, and the people of the Camelford area have been well served by the group.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 6 November 1991

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

House of Fraser

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Attorney-General what action he has taken following the report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry to the effect that criminal offences may have been committed by persons interested in the outcome of that Committee's report into the takeover of House of Fraser; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: On 13 September I informed the Chairman of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry that some further inquiries would be necessary before a firm view could be reached about possible criminality of those mentioned by the hon. Member. On the same day the Director of Public Prosecutions asked the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police to undertake those inquiries. The police report is awaited.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Attorney-General if the Crown prosecution service has received a report from the Metropolitan police concerning possible criminal offences by persons interested in the outcome of the report by the Select Committee on Trade and Industry into the takeover of House of Fraser; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: A report has not yet been received by the Crown Prosecution Service; the Metropolitan police are conducting their inquiries as quickly as the circumstances allow and will submit a report as soon as possible.

Cash Limits

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Attorney-General whether any changes have been made to the class X, vote 3 cash limit and running costs limit for the Northern Ireland court service.

The Attorney-General: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for class X, vote 3 has been increased by £560,000 from £17,996,000 to £18,556,000 and the running costs limit by £120,000 from £13,498,000 to £13,618,000. The increase is within the forecast out turn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today. The increases arises because of additional costs incurred in respect of bomb damage to a court building, a judicial removal and computer costs for a fixed penalty/penalty points scheme. Additional appropriations-in-aid of £725,000 will offset the increase in the provision.

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Attorney-General whether any changes will be made to the class X, vote 12 cash limit and running costs limit for the Public Record Office.

The Attorney-General: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for class X, vote 12 will be increased by £254,000 from £21,997,000 to £22,251,000. This includes £169,000 for part take up of the £880,000 capital end year flexibility entitlement announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 17 July 1991; and £85,000 towards the pay and associated expenses of the additional staff recommended in the recent Efficiency Scrutiny report. The running costs limit for the Public Record Office will as a result be increased by £85,000 from £19,207,000 to £19,292,000.

These increases are within the forecast out turn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement.

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Attorney-General whether any changes will be made to the Lord Chancellor's Department's running costs limit for 1991-92.

The Attorney-General: Yes. Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the running costs limit for the Lord Chancellor's Department, class X, vote 1 will be increased by £7,413,000 from £347,899,000 to £355,312,000.

The Supplementary Estimate gives effect to an increase of £1,419,000 in running costs under end year flexibility arrangements.

It is also required to increase the running costs provision for certain tribunals by £391,000 and to regularise arrangements for management charges in respect of the common investment funds scheme by an increase to provision of £300,000.

The Supplementary Estimate is required to increase provision in running costs by £5,125,000 to meet the cost of PSA bills carried over from 1990-91 that have been paid in 1991-92 or that remain outstanding.

Finally the Supplementary Estimate gives effect to a running costs transfer of £18,000 from Her Majesty's Stationery Office for work by the Statutory Publications Office and a running costs transfer of £160,000 from the Home Office for training material to be provided through the Judicial Studies Board.

The increase is within the forecast out turn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement.

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Attorney-General whether he proposes any changes to the Serious Fraud Office's cash and running costs limit for 1991-92.

The Attorney-General: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for class X vote 7 will be increased by £1,070,000 from £7,792,000 to £8,862,000. Within this total the Department's running costs limit will be increased by £793,000 from £7,339,000 to £8,132,000.

This increase will enable the Serious Fraud Office to meet the additional costs arising from the investigation into the affairs of the Bank of Credit and Commerce International. The increase is within the forecast out turn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

DEFENCE

Ocean Hound

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information is in his possession which would indicate whether any naval ships from countries other than the United Kingdom were in the proximity of the Ocean Hound when it sank off the Kent coast on 10-11 August; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Records of the movements of non-United Kingdom naval ships in and around United Kingdom waters are not maintained unless they are operating in conjunction with Royal Navy vessels. There were no such joint operations in the vicinity of the Ocean Hound on 10-11 August.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether he has arranged for all records held by his Department with regard to the location of naval vessels in the area where the Ocean Hound sank on 10-11 August, to be made available to the marine accident investigation branch of the Department of Transport;

(2) if he will make available all records indicating which naval vessels were in the area off the Kent coast in which the Ocean Hound sank on 10-11 August; and what evidence there is that none of the naval ships in the area collided with the Ocean Hound.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There were no Royal Navy ships or submarines at sea within 300 nautical miles of the area at the estimated time of the loss of the Ocean Hound. The marine accident investigation branch has been advised accordingly.

Departmental Land Holdings

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the hectarage, number of holdings and numbers of tenants of agricultural land owned by his Department in each county or Scottish region in (a) 1980 and (b) 1991.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: This information could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Meteorological Office

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will announce the identity of the next chief executive of the Meteorological Office.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: My right hon. Friend has decided, following an open competition, to appoint Professor Julian Hunt as the chief executive of the Meteorological Office Executive Agency. He is currently the professor of fluid mechanics at the university of Cambridge. He will take up the appointment on 2 January 1992, in succession to Sir John Houghton.

TRANSPORT

Railway Junctions

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all the locations which British Rail has identified at which enhanced protection arrangements, to which he referred in his answer of 22 October, Official Report, column 477, are being introduced; and if he will set out for each location what specific measures are being adopted.

Mr. Freeman: British Rail have identified the following 10 locations as requiring changes to the protection: Ashford (junction with Appledore line), Bellgrove, Doncaster (junction with Sheffield line), Dorchester, West, Hanwell, Hydem, Newton, Paddock Wood, Shipley and Wimbledon (junction with Merton line).

At present, BR has amended the signalman's instructions in eight cases, so that if it is not possible to permit a train to leave a station platform, trains will be held at the previous signal (ie will not be allowed to enter the station). In the other two cases, that instruction is not applicable, as the train starts from a dead-end platform. The instructions given to platform staff on the starting of trains from those platforms have been reinforced by special instructions and monitoring.

Other options under consideration include modifying the signal inter-locking to achieve that precaution automatically, and modifying the track layouts to reduce the effect on services of these precautions. BR is evaluating the options in each case, and will discuss proposals with the Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate before taking further action.

Seat Belts

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which other countries of the European Community fit seat belts to all seats in coaches and minibuses.

Mr. Chope: None. EC legislation does not require seat belts or anchorages to be fitted other than on front seats or exposed seats.

The Government have been seeking to have the EC directives on seat belts and anchorages amended so that fitment to all seats in minibuses and coaches can be required.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the impact of the fitting of seat belts to all seats in coaches and minibuses on the incidence of death and injury in coaches in the event of an accident.

Mr. Chope: The number of injuries to seated bus and coach passengers in Great Britain in 1990 was 4,670, of which 289 were serious and nine fatal. The average annual total of injuries in the years 1986-1990 was 4,202.

It is believed that the fitting of seat belts could significantly reduce the minority of injuries which are due to passenger ejection or vehicle rollover. The benefit of seat belts in the case of frontal impact accidents is less clear, since the nature of the seat or surface in front of the occupant has to be taken into account. Research into this problem is continuing.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the provision of seat belts in coaches and minibuses.

Mr. Chope: We have received a great many letters from individuals, schools and other organisations on this question, the vast majority of whom are in favour of the provision of seat belts in these vehicles.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions have taken place between his Department and coach manufacturers and operators about the fitting of seat belts.

Mr. Chope: The Department meets representatives of the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders and the Bus and Coach Council on a regular basis. Whenever the question of seat belts is raised, we emphasise the importance of making seat belts in coaches more readily available to the travelling public. Seat belts can already be fitted in most large coaches.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the likely additional cost of fitting seat belts to all seats in coaches and minibuses.

Mr. Chope: The estimated cost of fitting lap belts to every seat in a new coach is about £1,000, approximately £20 per seat.

Comparable figures for minibuses are not available but would probably be higher because of the additional floor strengthening work necessary to secure the seat belt anchorages.

Road Construction

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will quantify the savings expected this year in the road construction budget; what percentage of these savings has been reallocated to (i) road building and (ii) rail investment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The Government always seek to secure best value for money from its road construction budget. Estimated provision for new construction and renewal of national roads systems in England is £1,842 million gross (£1,755 million net) in the current financial year. We expect to start more than 150 miles of new roads this year.

A12, Chelmsford

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects emergency telephones to be installed on the A12 Chelmsford by-pass; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: During 1992.

BR (Bus Services)

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what powers British Rail has to run bus services to link in with and complement its rail services.

Mr. Freeman: Section 118 of the Transport Act 1985 gives the British Railways Board powers to secure the provision by other persons of services for the carriage of passengers by road where a railway service has been temporarily interrupted, or has been discontinued. The board has no power to run bus services themselves.

Road Schemes

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what changes he proposes to make in updating COBA 9 to COBA 10 to be used in evaluating possible road schemes on a cost benefit analysis basis.

Mr. Chope: The basic parameters, assumptions and methodologies incorporated in COBA are continually reviewed and researched. Since COBA 9 was released, there have been several parameter changes which have been considered necessary, and users have accordingly been notified of changes they need to make when running COBA 9. COBA 10 will incorporate these changes in to the default parameter set, thus simplifying the task of running the program. These changes include revised national road traffic forecasts (1989), values of time, accident rates, discount rate, GDP and petrol price forecasts.

Occasionally research may indicate the need for change to parameters or methodologies which cannot be incorporated by the user, and which therefore require a revised version of the program to be released. COBA 10 will incorporate some changes of this kind.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what basis his Department uses in cost benefit analysis terms on the valuation of time savings in relation to different methods of commuting to work when considering possible road schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: In cost-benefit analyses of road schemes, time savings for commuting to work are given the same value, whatever the method of commuting. Commuting time is valued at the standard appraisal value for non-work time, which is based on research into what people are willing to pay to save time.

A27

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to announce possible routes for the proposed A27 Polegate-Lewes dual carriageway; how many options he intends to publish; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I hope to consult the public on a number of possible options for improving the A27 Lewes-Polegate route around the end of the year.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much British Rail has invested, and is planning to invest, in Scotland's railway infrastructure in preparation for the opening of the channel tunnel.

Mr. Freeman: British Rail plans to invest, with the private sector, in a channel tunnel freight terminal in Strathclyde. It considers the existing infrastructure is otherwise adequate for the channel tunnel services it plans to run to and from Scotland. Its substantial investment in passenger and freight rolling stock for these services will benefit Scotland as well as other parts of Great Britain.

Railways (Bus Services)

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those countries in Europe whose publicly-owned railway undertakings operate bus services to complement their railway services.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is not available within the Department.

Public Service Obligation Grant

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what will be the public service obligation grant ceiling for 1991-92.

Mr. Freeman: The cash ceiling on public service obligation grant for 1991-92 will be £900 million.

Cash Limits

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what changes he proposes to make to the cash limit and running costs limit for his Department.

Mr. Freeman: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit in class VII will be changed as follows:

Class and vote	Current cash limit	Changes	Revised cash limit £'000s
VII, 1	1,968,824	[1] −15,160	1,953,664
2	232,444	[2] 1,994	234,438

[1] There is a reduction of £15,000,000 in the cash limit on this Vote to cover part of a shortfall on class VII, vote 3 and additionally £160,000 running costs has been transferred to class VII, vote 2 in respect of certain relocation costs.

[2] Take up of entitlement to end year flexibility announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 17 July 1991, Official Report, columns 186-89. There are additions in respect of repayment services of £80,000 from Department of Trade and Industry (class IV, vote 2) and £15,000 running costs from Civil Service Commission (class XIX, vote 1) together with an addition of £1,000,000 for consultancy work connected with the sale of the Trust Ports. There is a reduction of £325,000 in Appropriations on Aid as a consequence of the transfer of Offshore Safety responsibilities to Department of Employment. There are reductions on this Vote in respect of the transfer of running costs to Department of Employment for Offshore Safety (£300,000) and to the Lord Chancellor's Department (class XIX, vote 1) for pensions (£21,000).

The running costs limit of the Department of Transport has been reduced by £306,000 from £379,290,000 to £378,984,000 as a consequence of the above.

The increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

Ocean Hound

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will release the video film taken last week by agents acting on behalf of the Marine Accident Investigation Bureau, and in particular the shots of the damage primarily to the starboard and portside of the Ocean Hound which is currently lying on the sea bed off the Kent coast; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Marine accident investigation branch inspectors are examining the video film. The nature of the damage to the vessel is such that very thorough analysis is required.

To release the film to be viewed generally would be inappropriate both because it is an important item of evidence for the inquiry in progress and because general release might be offensive to the feelings of the bereaved. It has already been shown to near family of those lost.

The hon. Gentleman and I have exchanged letters, and we are to meet soon to discuss the Ocean Hound.

Departmental Land Holdings

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the hectarage, number of holdings and numbers of tenants of holdings of agricultural land owned by (a) his Department and (b) British Rail in each county or region in the United Kingdom in (a) 1980 and (b) 1990.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information is not held in the format mentioned by the hon. Member and records of the 1980 holdings would not exist. The latest information on the Department's holdings is shown in our Register of Unused and Underused Land for 1990-91 in the Library. Details of individual tenancies are not held centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

The Department does not hold information on agricultural land owned by British Rail and the hon. Member is advised to contact the British Rail Property Board for this information.

Breath Testing

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the number of drivers breath-tested for alcohol in 1989-90; how many tests proved positive; and what was the comparable position in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I have been asked to reply.

Statistics of breath tests for England and Wales are published in Home Office statistical bulletins. The most recent annual statistics, for the calendar year 1990, were published in issue 16/91 on 23 July 1991. A copy of this bulletin is in the Library.

The following table shows for England and Wales the number of screening breath tests reported and the number of these with positive results for the financial years 1984-85 to 1989-90.

Number of screening breath tests and those with positive results—England and Wales

	Screening breath tests
	Total tests Thousands	Number positive Thousands
1984-85	203·0	[1] 74·0
1985-86	263·3	[1] 80·0
1986-87[2]	321·1	[1] 86·0
1987-88	420·0	103·3
1988-89	455·0	99·9
1989-90	557·6	98·3

[1] Estimate using monthly figures for total tests and percentage negative.

[2] Improvements in the comprehensiveness of reporting were made from 1 January 1987 so that figures for earlier years are not comparable.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Taxi and Hire Car Licences

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will bring forward proposals to ensure that local authorities issuing taxi and hire care licences are aware of any criminal record of the applicants.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Section 47 of the Road Traffic Act 1991 makes provision for this. It is due to come into effect on 1 April 1992.

Correspondence

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne can expect replies to his letters of 10 July, 24 July and 24 September regarding the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I wrote to the hon. Member on 29 October.

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne can expect a reply to his letter of 2 September on behalf of Mr. W. M. Dewdney, of Cairngorm Cottage, Treluswell, Penryn, Cornwall.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: A reply was sent to the hon. Member on 1 November 1991.

Court Hearings

Mr. Butcher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prosecutions for murder in the last 10 years have been terminated before or during court proceedings as a result of failure of material witnesses to attend;

(2) how many proceedings for malicious wounding and grievous bodily harm have been terminated during the last 10 years as a result of failure of material witnesses to attend.

Mr. John Patten: Information collected centrally does not identify the number of court cases which are terminated because of a failure of material witnesses to attend.

Prisoners (Psychiatric Care)

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners in the United Kingdom are receiving psychiatric care; how many of these were previously in long-term psychiatric hospitals; how many of those who receive psychiatric care or were previously in long term psychiatric hospitals have been imprisoned for crimes of violence; and what percentage of the prison population received psychiatric care in each of the last five years.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Prisoners (Suicides)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the recent proposal by the governor, medical officers and staff at Lewes prison that suicidal prisoners should be kept with others and supervised on a 24-hour basis by prison staff.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is the general policy of the prison service that, where prisoners are identified as being at risk of suicide, they should wherever possible be kept in shared accommodation to reduce feelings of isolation, facilitate support and ensure more effective monitoring and supervision. The options include location in a multi-cell or in a dormitory or hospital ward. Some prisoners, however, cannot always be held with others because of their difficult or violent behaviour. It is a matter for governors and their staff to decide where individual prisoners should be located, taking into account the needs and behaviour of the prisoner, the degree of suicide risk (which will vary from time to time), and the facilities and staffing which are available. It is desirable for local prisons and remand centres to have the option of holding acutely suicidal prisoners in a ward with 24-hour supervision by staff. This is not yet feasible at a number of establishments, including Lewes, but it is the prison service's intention to work towards the introduction of such wards as the necessary resources become available.

House of Fraser

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Metropolitan Commissioner on the progress of inquiries by the Metropolitan police into possible criminal offences by persons interested in the outcome of the report by the Select Committee on Trade and Industry into the takeover of House of Fraser.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. Any question of possible criminal offences arising out of the Department of Trade and Industry's report into the takeover of House of Fraser would be a matter for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Illegal Camping

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will introduce legislation to give additional powers to the police to curb illegal camping by itinerants.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend has no such plans.

Departmental Land Holdings

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the hectarage, number of holdings and numbers of tenants of holdings of agricultural land owned by his Department in each county or Scottish region in (a) 1980 and (b) 1990.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Home Office has the following agricultural land holdings in England and Wales:

Hectarage of agricultural land owned and managed by the prison service

County	Number of Holdings	1980	1990
Cambridge	1	51	28
Devon	3	751	559

Cash Limits

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to make any changes to the 1991-92 cash limits within his responsibilities.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The cash limit for class IX, vote 3 will be reduced by £365,000 from £891,317,000 to £890,952,000 to reflect transfers of provision to the Department of Education and Science for additional resource units for probation students at universities (£205,000) and to the Lord Chancellor's Department for training material for magistrates on the Criminal Justice Act 1991 (£160,000).

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid Budget

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the Government's spending on aid in 1990, expressed both in actual sum spent and as a percentage of gross national product; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Official development assistance in 1990 was £1,490 million, which was 0·27 per cent. of gross national product. We plan the aid programme on financial years, so that figures based on calendar years may not reflect the planned level of expenditure. Our planning figure for 1991-92 as a proportion of estimated GNP is 0·31 per cent.

Cash Limits

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what changes have been made in the 1991-92 cash limit for expenditure by the Overseas Development Administration.

Mrs. Chalker: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit on the Overseas Aid Vote (class II vote 5) will be increased by £65,225,000 from £1,573,117,000 to £1,638,342,000. The increase provides for humanitarian relief responses in respect of Iraqi refugees, the African famine and the Bangladesh cyclone, and balance of payments support for India. It also takes account of two small transfers of resources in respect of eastern Europe involving the Department of Education and Science and the Department of Health. The running costs cash limit for the ODA has also been increased by £50,000 from £44,843,000 to £44,893,000. The increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Hong Kong

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the new obligations and undertakings contained in the recently agreed memorandum of understanding between the United Kingdom and Chinese Governments.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The details of the memorandum of understanding were placed in the Library of the House on the same day as my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary made a statement to the House on this subject.

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the autonomy of Hong Kong before and after 1997.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Hong Kong has in practice long enjoyed substantial autonomy in most areas, particularly in economic, commercial and financial matters. Under the joint declaration, from 1 July 1997 the Hong Kong special administrative region of the People's Republic of China will enjoy a high degree of autonomy except for foreign and defence affairs. It will be vested with executive, legislative and independent judicial power.

Cambodia

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress in Cambodia arising from the Paris peace agreement of 23 October.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer the honourable Member to the answer that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) on 22 October. Since then, on 31 October, the UN Security Council has adopted resolution 718 authorising the UN Secretary General to designate a special representative for Cambodia and carry out preparatory work for the establishment of UN transitional authority in Cambodia.

Mr. Mariusz Kuziak

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why Mariusz Kuziak, a Polish citizen, was denied an entry visa to spend a fortnight with his relatives in Bury St. Edmunds.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

European Community

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration the intergovernmental conferences have given to increasing the membership of the Community; and what adjustment, if any, has been made to draft treaties on environment and political union to accommodate future new members.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The agenda of the intergovernmental conference includes consideration of extended Community action on environment, but enlargement of the Community is not formally under discussion. It is expected to be debated after the conclusion of the conference.

Nuclear Weapons (Ukraine)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what negotiations Her Majesty's Government are engaged in with the Republic of Ukraine to reduce or eliminate nuclear weapons.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: None. In addition to President Kravchuk's earlier assurances to the United Nations General Assembly, the Ukrainian Supreme Soviet recently adopted a declaration affirming its commitment to observing the provisions of START and achieving eventual non-nuclear status, including accession to the non-proliferation treaty. We have, however, had contacts with Ukrainian representatives and are urging them to adhere to these commitments.

Albania

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement concerning government policy towards Albania, its economy and the establishment of democratic institutions there.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We warmly welcome the progress towards full democratisation and the establishment of a free market economy in Albania. In pursuit of this, the Government support the help being given by international institutions and maintains contact with members of the Government and opposition in Tirana.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to establish a British embassy in Albania; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: This matter is currently under review. I will inform the hon. and learned Member when a decision is taken.

Cash Limits

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he proposes to make any changes in his Department's diplomatic wing cash limits for 1991-92.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Subject to parliamentary approval of the Supplementary Estimate the cash limit for class II, vote 2 (Other External Relations) will be increased by £8,500,000 from £156,931,000 to £165,431,000 to reflect increased costs due to our contributions to the United Nations Iraq/Kuwait observer mission, United Nations observer mission in Western Sahara, United Nations human rights verification unit in El Salvador and the United Nations special commission in Iraq.

This increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total as announced in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Footwear Imports

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the representations he has received from the footwear industry concerning footwear imports from China; whether he has replied; and what measures he plans to take to address their concerns.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have received a number of letters, including an application from the British Footwear Manufacturers' Federation for my Department to ask the European Commission for the suspension, under article 115 of the treaty of Rome, of free circulation of imported footwear originating in the People's Republic of China. After careful consideration of the industry's case I decided that the facts were not sufficient to warrant such a step. The federation has been informed and I have agreed to meet their representatives on 13 December.

RETEXT Scheme

Mr. Lee: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has been consulted by the European Commission on proposals for a RETEXT scheme to encourage economic development of areas of textile and clothing concentration; and whether the United Kingdom will be eligible for EC assistance under such a scheme.

Mr. Leigh: I have not yet been consulted. If such a scheme proceeds, however, I would expect textile areas of the United Kingdom to be eligible.

Uruguay Round

Mr. Lee: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress in the GATT Uruguay round, with particular reference to the textile and clothing trade.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Government are continuing to work with our European Community partners for an early successful conclusion to the Uruguay round. This would involve, among other things, an agreement to reduce barriers to world trade in textiles and to integrate this sector into GATT on the basis of strengthened rules and disciplines.

CIVIL SERVICE

Cash Limits

Mr. Wolfson: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service if there are any proposals to change the 1991-92 cash limit for the office of the Minister for the Civil Service.

Mr. Renton: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate the cash limit for the Office of the Minister for the Civil Service (class XIX, vote 1) will be increased by £4,173,000 from £37,548,000 to £41,721,000.

The increase is required to cover the increased cost of the London economic summit; the cost of launching the citizens charter and the take up of capital expenditure provision under end year flexibility arrangements. In addition certain capital expenditure provision has been reallocated to current expenditure to cover reimbursing former Prime Ministers for the cost of maintaining an additional office.

Some of the above changes in provision have a consequent effect on the Department's running costs limit which will be increased by £3,776,000 from £45,276,000 to £49,052,000.

The increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Index-linked Gilts

Mr. Lawson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing, for each year since their inception, the proportion that index-linked gilts represented of the total amount of gilt-edged stock in the hands of the public, that is, all holdings other than official.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The proportion of market holdings of gilts in indexed form is as follows:

End-March
1981	1·3
1982	3·1
1983	6·5
1984	7·0
1985	8·4
1986	9·1
1987	11·3
1988	11·3
1989	13·7
1990	16·0
1991	17·7

Note: Calculated using nominal values plus accrued uplift for indexed gilts divided by the total.

Mortgages

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people are currently repaying a mortgage.

Mr. Maples: According to figures published by the Council of Mortgage Lenders, 9,628,000 mortgages were outstanding at the end of June 1991. A figure for the number of people repaying a mortgage is not available because a proportion of mortgages are joint or second mortgages.

European Central Bank

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what substantial differences Her Majesty's Government have identified between the model set out by the Dutch EC Presidency for an independent European central bank and the Bundesbank.

Mr. Maude: The model to which the hon. Gentleman refers is set out in a document produced by the EC Presidency as a basis for further negotiation at the Inter-Governmental Conference on Economic and Monetary Union. The United Kingdom and other member states are not committed to any particular part of its contents.

The Government have not sought to draw comparisons between the institution proposed in that document and the German Bundesbank.

Bankruptcy

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many bankruptcy petitions have been brought by Customs and Excise this year.

Mr. Gillian Shephard: In the calendar year to 1 November 1991 Customs and Excise have presented 5,486 bankruptcy petitions in England and Wales, 255 in Scotland and a further 178 in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many bankruptcy petitions have been brought by the Inland Revenue this year.

Mr. Maude: The number of bankruptcy (individuals) and winding-up (Companies) petitions filed by the Inland Revenue in England, Wales and Northern Ireland for the period 1 January 1991 to 30 September 1991 is:

	Number
Bankruptcy petitions	2,013
Winding-up petitions	592

The precise equivalent figures for Scotland cannot be ascertained without disproportionate cost but do not exceed 74 individuals and 20 companies.

EC Economic Growth

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing the average rate of economic growth of the six founder members of the EC from 1964 to 1973 and since 1979.

Mr. Maples: Table R1 in "National Accounts ESA Aggregates 1970-1989 Theme 2 Series C" published by Eurostat gives annual growth rates for gross domestic product at market prices for 1970 to 1989. Data for earlier years can be calculated from Table 25 in "National Accounts Main Aggregates Volume 1 1960-1989" published by OECD or can be obtained from the Statistical Office of the European Communities.

Copies of these publications are available in the Library of the House.

Taxpayers Charter

Mr. Beith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the differences between the 1986 taxpayers charter and the 1991 taxpayers charter represent changes in Government policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: The new charter seeks to convey the aims of the 1986 charter more clearly, by expressing them in a fresh and more focused way.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what alteration to the statutes governing the Bank of England's relationship with the Government would be required to comply with the Dutch Government's proposed draft treaty on economic and monetary union and the independence of member states' central banks.

Mr. Maude: The model to which the hon. Gentleman refers is set out in a document produced by the EC Presidency as a basis for further negotiation at the Inter-Governmental Conference on Economic and Monetary Union. The UK and other member states are not committed to any particular part of its contents. The issues raised by the hon. Gentleman are still under discussion and no conclusion has yet been reached.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consideration was given by participants in the intergovernmental conference on economic and monetary union to including among the convergence measurement criteria the levels of unemployment and investment.

Mr. Maude: The Inter-Governmental Conference on economic and monetary union has considered a range of criteria. The Dutch Presidency text reflects the view that convergence of inflation and interest rates, successful membership of the narrow band of the ERM, and the avoidance of excessive budget deficits are the appropriate tests.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the lastest available index figures for real output in manufacturing industry together with figures for the time period or periods since 1973 for the United Kingdom, France, Italy and the Federal Republic of Germany.

Mr. Mellor: The latest available information of manufacturing output at 1985 prices, seasonally adjusted is as follows:

	United Kingdom	France	Italy	Germany
1973	110·5	93·7	85·5	87·9
1991
Q2	112·6	110·9	114·2	124·3
July	113·4	not available
August	112·2

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing manufacturing output less food, drink, tobacco, paper, printing and publishing in 1973, 1979, 1989 and the second quarter of 1991.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested on manufacturing output less food, drink, tobacco, paper, printing and publishing cannot be provided without incurring disproportionate cost.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing for each year since 1970 imports and exports of semi-finished and finished manufactures, less erratics, at 1990 prices.

Mr. Mellor: Information from which trade in semi-manufactures and finished manufactures less erratics at 1990 prices may be derived is available on the Central Statistical Office database which may be accessed through the Library of the House.

Unemployment

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the effect on the balance of payments on current account in terms of £ billion of an increase of 1 million in the number of unemployed.

Mr. Mellor: There is no straightforward relationship between unemployment and the current account.

Money Supply

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing for each of the years 1961 to 1990 the percentage increase in the supply of money plus quasi-money as defined by the International Monetary Fund in its International Financial Statistics Yearbook.

Mr. Maples: The information is given in the IMF's International Financial Statistics Yearbook for 1991 (pages 94 and 95) and for 1989 (also pages 94 and 95), copies of which are available in the Library.

House Prices

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effect the increase in the real price of houses since 1979 has had on the level of economic activity.

Mr. Maples: Increases in real house prices raise real personal sector wealth and hence probably consumer spending. But both real house prices and economic activity will to some extent be influenced by the same underlying factors.

European Parliament

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what reasons a majority of member states in the intergovernmental conference has given for preferring a consultative and not a legislative role for the European Parliament, as set out in the letter to him of 25 October from the Dutch Minister of Finance.

Mr. Maude: The views of the member states expressed in the Inter-Governmental Conference on Economic and Monetary Union are a matter for their respective Governments. The Treaty provisions on EMU as presently under discussion in the IGC will encompass relatively little legislation. Instead, they will develop the coordination of national economic policies between the member states, and will establish a European central bank to be responsible for monetary policy.

Guest Houses

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his Department has any plans to give Inland Revenue officials the power to carry out spot checks on premises not registered for uniform business rate which can accommodate six or more paying guests.

Mr. Maude: Inland Revenue valuation officers and their staff have powers to enter premises in pursuance of their statutory duties, provided at least 24 hours notice in writing is given, and the authorised person produces his other authority on request. There are no plans to extend these powers.

VAT

Mr. Grylls: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the aggregate amount of bank guarantees currently provided by registered traders to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in respect of VAT on imports and the proportion thereof that relates to imports from other EC member states.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Under the duty deferment scheme Her Majesty's Customs and Excise hold guarantees given by banks and insurance companies in respect of combined import VAT, customs and excise duties and levies. The total value of these guarantees fluctuates daily but the element attributable to import VAT is currently estimated to be about £2,600 million, of which some £1,600 million can be attributed to imports from other EC Member States.

Exchange Rate Mechanism

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect of membership of the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system on economic growth.

Mr. Maude: Membership of the exchange rate mechanism helps to secure lower inflation, thereby providing the necessary climate for healthy sustainable growth.

Citizens Charter

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his citizens charter includes measures taken by Government Departments prior to the publication of the document; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: The citizens charter builds on the earlier successes of the financial management initiative and, more recently, the Next Steps programme of management reform which has led to the creation of 56 agencies. It draws on the efforts of individual Departments and agencies to improve the services they offer to their customers. The charter aims to raise the quality of public services and make them more responsive to their users through increased choice, the extension of competition and accountability, and the provision of more information on the standards of service that they can expect to receive. The citizens charter contains a wide range of new proposals for this.

Cash Limits

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any changes will be made to the Department for National Savings' cash limit and running cost limit for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for class XVIII, vote 9 (expenditure of the Department for National Savings on administration, publicity costs and certain other expenses) will be increased by £2,082,000 from £181,732,000 to £183,814,000. The running costs limit for the Department for National Savings will be increased by £2,082,000 from £175,118,000 to £177,200,000. The increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

£582,000 of the increase is in respect of the take-up of end-year-flexibility on running costs as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 17 July 1991 at columns 186-190. The remaining £1,500,000 of the increase is in respect of additional expenditure on marketing activities to support the Government's funding objectives.

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is proposing any change to the Central Statistical Office's cash or running costs limits for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for class XVIII, vote 13 will be increased by £2,126,000 from £31,741,000 to £33,867,000 and the running costs limit by £1,336,000 from £31,101,000 to £32,437,000. These increases reflect measures to improve the quality of economic statistics including the redevelopment of computer systems following a review of the Department's information systems strategy, the take up of both capital and running costs end year flexibility entitlements, and transfers from Property Holdings (£78,000), class VIII, vote 7, the Office of the Minister for the Civil Service (£65,000), class XIX, vote 1, the Department of Trade and Industry (£11,000), class IV, vote 2 and Her Majesty's Treasury (£9,000), class XVIII, vote 1. The increase is within the forecast outturn for the planned total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any changes are proposed to the cash limit and running cost limit for 1991-92 for the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Maude: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate the cash limit for class XVIII, vote 6 will be increased by £6,509,000 from £1,543,608,000 to £1,550,117,000 and the Department's running cost limit by £82,574,000 from £1,521,011,000 to £1,603,585,000. The change in both the cash limit and the running costs limit arises because of the work being undertaken by the valuation office in setting up the valuation lists for the council tax.

This increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes are proposed in the cash limit and running cost cash limit for 1991-92 for Customs and Excise.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for class XVIII, vote 5 will be increased by £8,656,000 from £729,600,000 to £738,256,000 and the running cost limit for Customs and Excise by £3,096,000 from £629,800,000 to £632,896,000. The increase in the running costs limit arises from the take up of full end-year flexibility entitlement announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 17 July 1991 at columns 185-90 and the costs associated with a programme for the training of overseas customs officers, the costs of which are being met by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (class II, vote 1), the Home Office (class IX, vote 3) and the Overseas Development Administration (class II, vote 5). The increase in the cash limit otherwise includes take up of the full end-year flexibility entitlement for capital expenditure; the need to pay interest on refunds of VAT being made as a result of legal decisions prior to Royal Assent to the 1991 Finance Act (from which date payments can be made from revenue); and increased expenditure on legal fees and payments to the civil superannuation vote. The increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is proposing any change to the Central Office of Information cash limit for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate the cash limit for class XVIII, vote 14, will be increased by £7,400,000 from £20,709,000 to £28,109,000.

The increase is made necessary as a result of the difference between the actual value of assets and liabilities transferred to the Central Office of Information (trading fund) and those anticipated at the time the Trading Fund Order was passed by the House. The increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

Press and Publicity Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any member of the Treasury's press and publicity staff accompanied him in Blackpool during the Conservative party conference.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 5 November 1991]: No.

Public Opinion Survey

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by Her Majesty's Treasury since 12 July 1991.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 5 November 1991]: The following public opinion surveys have been carried out on behalf of HM Treasury in connection with the forthcoming sale of shares in BT:

August 1991, surveys covering public attitudes to BT, privatisation and awareness of the forthcoming BT sale;

October 1991, Survey covering public expectations about level of incentives in BT sale;

October and November 1991, further surveys covering awareness of and interest in participation in BT sale.

ENERGY

Departmental Land Holdings

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give the hectarage, number of holdings and numbers of tenants of holdings of agricultural land owned by (a) his Department and (b) British Coal in each county or region in the United Kingdom in (a) 1980 and (b) 1990.

Mr. Wakeham: My Department has no holdings of agricultural land; holdings by British Coal are a matter for the corporation.

Cash Limits

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether any changes will be made to his Department's cash limits for 1991-92.

Mr. Wakeham: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary winter supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class V, vote 9 will be increased by £4,000,000 to £5,000,000. This extra provision is sought to meet further expenditure on advisers' fees in connection with the privatisation of the coal industry.

The increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Correspondence

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne can expect replies to his letters of 18 January, 29 March and 24 September regarding funding for the Falmouth school of art and design.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My hon. Friend has received interim replies. I will write again to him as soon as possible and no later than the end of November.

Development Education

Mr. Lester: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether development education falls within the remit of Her Majesty's inspectorate for schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Her Majesty's inspectorate inspects all aspects of pupils' learning within and across the national curriculum. The national curriculum offers pupils considerable opportunity to develop ideas, knowledge and understanding about development education particularly within the study of geography, but also in their study of cross-curricular themes and issues.

Mandatory Grants

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the local education authorities which were more than seven days late in sending cheques for mandatory grants to students in higher education.

Mr. Alan Howarth: This information is not available centrally. Most local education authorities are coping with the record numbers of students seeking grants for higher education. I am, however, most concerned by reports that some students may be in difficulty because their grant cheques have not arrived from certain authorities. My officials are following up such reports and seeking assurances that the authorities concerned are taking action, including making provisional payments where necessary, to ensure that students do not suffer hardship.

World Affairs (Teaching)

Mr. Lester: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how his Department utilises the resources and information from the Foreign Office to teach British schoolchildren about world affairs.

Mr. Eggar: It is for schools to determine how best to deliver the statutory requirements of the national curriculum so as to meet the needs of all pupils. It is they who are therefore charged with selecting the most effective teaching methods and the resources and information necessary to support them.

Mr. Lester: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what scope there is within the national curriculum for world development issues to be studied in British schools.

Mr. Eggar: The national curriculum allows ample scope for world development issues to be studied. National curriculum geography is the main vehicle for this, although other subjects may play a part. The attainment targets and programmes of study in geography afford a balanced perspective of development—its causes, constraints and effects—in a wide range of countries at different levels of economic development.

Health Education

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to protect school children from exploitation by commercial groups sending teaching materials into schools by setting up a national accreditation scheme for health education materials.

Mr. Atkins: No. My right hon. and learned Friend believes that judgments about the use of such materials are best left to individual schools.

Hearnville School

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will ask for all of the views expressed by parents of children attending Hearnville school, Balham, London SW12 before approving any decision made by Wandsworth council to close this school; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Wandsworth council has not published proposals relating to the closure of Hearnville school. If it does so, parents of children attending the school will have the opportunity to make their views known during the two-month objection period following publication. My right hon. Friend will take those views into account in determining any proposals which come before him.

School Buildings (Regulations)

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps his Department is taking to review the Education (School Buildings) Regulations 1981; which bodies are being consulted; and when new draft regulations will be proposed.

Mr. Eggar: Work is currently in progress on a range of topics as part of the review of the School Premises Regulations. The following organisations were sent a consultation letter by DES. Others were consulted by the Welsh Office.

GCSE

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consultations he conducted and what evidence he assembled for his appraisal of the function of course work as a part of the GCSE; and if he will place the material in the Library.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the honourable Member to my reply of 21 October to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett), Official Report, column 362.

My right honourable and learned Friend is currently considering advice on GCSE coursework from the School Examinations and Assessment Council.

Parents Charter

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will make a statement on the reasons for the differences in the form and substance of the parents charter commitments on the publication of examination and test results in England, Wales and Scotland;

(2) whether performance tables on school examination results will be published in the same way throughout Great Britain if the parents charter is enacted.

Mr. Eggar: The parents charters for England, Scotland and Wales all contained a commitment that performance information about schools would be published in order to help parents choose a school for their child and monitor the school's performance. The necessary new powers are included in the Education (Schools) Bill which was introduced today. Detailed arrangements for implementing the commitment will be set out in regulations in due course; these may vary according to the particular circumstances in each country, but will all be subject to parliamentary scrutiny.

Expenditure Plans

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about his Department's expenditure plans for the financial years 1992-93 to 1994-95.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his statement today, the provision for the Department of Education and Science's own spending programme in 1992-93 will be £7,947 million, which is £627 million or 8·6 per cent. higher than the estimated outturn for 1991-92. This figure includes central Government expenditure on higher education, science, schools, and sport; it also includes specific grants to local authorities and credit approvals for capital expenditure by LEAs.

Capital Expenditure in Schools and Colleges

Local authority capital programmes at schools and colleges—annual capital guidelines and supplementary credit approvals—rise from £538 million in 1991-92 to £590 million in 1992-93. The total for local authority schools rises from £472 million to £524 million—an increase of 11 per cent. Provision for building grants for voluntary aided schools increases from £130·8 million to £150·7 million, a rise of over 15 per cent. £28·5 million has been allocated for capital expenditure in grant-maintained schools, up from £10·5 million in 1991-92, reflecting the rapid increase in the number of schools entering this sector. The total for school building work rises to £703 million in 1992-93: up by some 10 per cent. in real terms over the equivalent figure for this year. The increase should also be seen against continuing downward pressure on building tender prices, which should enable sums allocated to new work this year and next to go even further. This level of provision underscores the Government's commitment to give priority to improving school buildings and to implementing the national curriculum, in particular science and technology.

For the third year running, available recurrent public funding for universities, polytechnics and colleges is planned to increase by some 10 per cent. outturn in the previous year—to £3·9 billion in 1992-93. Total recurrentand capital spending on all higher education—UFC, PCFC and other higher education—funded through fees and grant will be £4·4 billion in 1992-93.

These plans will enable the continued expansion of the number of students in higher education described in the White Paper "Higher Education: A New Framework" (Cm. 1541). More than one in four of all young people in Britain are expected to enter higher education in autumn next year and one in three by the end of the century. As the White Paper explained, the plans envisage additional public funding to support this expansion while also expecting institutions to take advantage of the efficiency gains available to them as they take on more students.

Based on actual enrolments to each sector up to October 1990, the plans allow for the following distribution between sectors of the projected number of students for 1992-93 given in the White Paper:

Projected Home and EC student numbers (FTE) (Financial years)

	thousands		Percentage
	1991-92	1992-93	increase
UFC	343	363	5·8

Under the Government's proposals to bring together universities, polytechnics and colleges into one higher education sector, the funds for 1993-94 will be made available to the new higher education funding councils. On a comparable basis to 1992-93, the planned available recurrent funding for 1993-94 and 1994-95 is £4·2 billion and £4·4 billion, some 17 per cent. and 22 per cent. respectively more than in 1991-92. Subject to the passage of the necessary legislation, there will be adjustments from 1993-94 to the planned funding for these years to take account of the changes in territorial responsibilities of the new funding councils.

These plans confirm that the Government are providing for the cost of the extra students enrolled as well as for an increase in resources for the funding councils. Universities, polytechnics and colleges remain free to take on, and finance through the tuition fee, as many qualified students as they are able to accommodate.

The level of fees which will be reimbursed through public funds in the academic year 1992-93 will be up to these limits:

Classroom based courses: £1,855.

Laboratory/workshop based courses: £2,770.

Clinical medicine, dentistry and veterinary science courses: £4,985.

Postgraduate fee: £2,200.

The plans allow for an increase in fee income and capital and recurrent grant to the universities of £144 million in 1992-93, compared with estimated outturn for 1991-92. They will also benefit from extra income from tuition fees for every additional student enrolled beyond these plans.

The total planned recurrent grant for the Universities Funding Council in 1992-93 will be £1,585 million. The plans allow for a further transfer of resources to provision for science as part of the new boundary for dual support. Taking account of the dual support transfer, total planned available recurrent funding in 1992-93 is nearly 8½ per cent. higher than the expected level in 1991-92.

It will be for the universities to determine what can be afforded for academic pay within their overall resources, having regard to other cost increases, the scope for efficiency improvements and the need for additional staff. The Government will hold back £24 million of grant in 1992-93 for release only in the event of a satisfactory pay settlement for non-clinical academic staff which makes provision to relate pay more closely to performance.

Capital funding for the universities will be £9 million more than plans for 1991-92. This should allow a start to be made on an upgraded academic computer network, SuperJANET.

The plans allow for an increase in fee income and capital and recurrent grant to the polytechnics and colleges of £175 million in 1992-93, compared with estimated outturn for 1991-92. They will also benefit from tuition fee income for every additional student enrolled beyond these plans. The total planned recurrent grant for the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council in 1992-93 will be £898 million. Planned available recurrent funding in 1992-93 is some 12 per cent. higher than the expected level in 1991-92.

It will be for the polytechnic and college employers to determine what can be afforded for academic pay having regard to other cost increases, the scope for efficiency improvements and the need for additional staff. The Government will hold back £11 million of grant in 1992-93 for release only in the event of a satisfactory pay settlement for the lecturers to whom national negotiations currently apply which makes provision to relate pay more closely to performance.

Capital funding for the PCFC sector is increased to £137·5 million, a level over 50 per cent. higher than in 1989-90 when the polytechnic and college sector was established.

We will increase by 4½ per cent. the level of support to each student next year from grant and loan combined, thus maintaining its value in real terms. Mandatory awards and loans will be available for all eligible students who apply for them.

Public expenditure provision for the DES science programme, including expenditure financed by EC receipts, has been increased significantly to £1,054 million in 1992-93, £1,184 million in 1993-94 and £1,274 million in 1994-95. These figures include transfers from higher education funding of £48 million, £125 million and £154 million respectively, which will enable the research councils, from August 1992, to meet the full costs of the projects which they support in higher education institutions.

Within these totals, the sums available for distribution by the Advisory Board for the Research Councils will be £1,050 million, £1,181 million and £1,270 million. The totals for 1992-93, 1993-94 and 1994-95 are £29 million, £50 million and £85 million higher than previous plans for those years. Total science provision for each year will be 7, 12 and 19 per cent. higher in cash than the estimated outturn in 1991-92, excluding the sums transferred and after allowing for the one-off saving of £8 million in 1991-92 on postgraduate fees. This gives an excellent basis for the research councils to plan and manage basic and strategic research.

I am inviting the Advisory Board for the Research Councils to advise me on the distribution of these resources which will best advance the Government's aims for civil science in the interests of the nation as a whole.

The plans provide for the successful establishment and development of the 15 city technology colleges announced, and for a start from 1993-94 on spreading CTC principles and practices into other secondary schools.

The 1992-93 settlement for recurrent provision for grant-maintained schools takes account of the rapid increase in projected school numbers; there are already over 100 grant-maintained schools operating, and numbers are projected to double by April 1992.

We shall make available, subject to the passage of the Further and Higher Education Bill, £25 million in 1992-93 for the costs of establishing the Further Education Funding Council and preparing further education and sixth form colleges for independence from local authority control.

Economic and Social Research Council

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he received the annual report of the Economic and Social Research Council for 1990-91; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The annual report of the Economic and Social Research Council has been submitted to me under the requirements of the Science and Technology Act 1965 and a copy is being laid before the House today.

I was most interested to read about the council's achievements during its 25th anniversary year. I would note in particular its publication of new "Postgraduate Training Guidelines" issued after widespread consultation to help establish higher standards of training for research students in the social sciences; and the launch of the ESRC's largest-ever research initiative to examine the causes and consequences of global environmental change.

I congratulate the council on these and its other achievements during its silver jubilee year.

Cash Limits

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any changes to announce to cash limits on votes within his responsibility for 1991-92.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimates, the cash limits for class XI, vote 1, schools, research and miscellaneous services, class XI, vote 2, higher and further education, and class XI, vote 4, administration will be changed. The cash limit changes are as follows:

Class and vote	Current cash limit £	Change £	Revised cash limit £
Class XI, vote 1	712,863,000	+5,607,000	718,470,000
Class XI, vote 2	2,916,285,000	+518,000	2,916,803,000
Class XI, vote 4	98,692,000	+7,925,000	106,617,000

The increase on class XI, vote 1 includes the full take-up of capital end-year flexibility entitlement of £6,085,000 announced by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 17 July 1991, columns 186-89. It takes account of the transfer to the Overseas Development Administration of £300,000 towards covering the shortfall between the contribution from the European Commission and the level of fees levied by higher education institutions for students coming to the United Kingdom from central and eastern Europe under the trans-European mobility scheme for university studies (TEMPUS) for which the British Council is undertaking administration of United Kingdom participation; and a transfer of £178,000 to class XI, vote 2.

The increase on class XI, vote 2 includes provision for a transfer of responsibility to the Universities Funding Council for course costs in training for social work. This is offset by decreases in provision for the Department of Health (class XIII, vote 3), the Home Office (class IX, vote 3) and the Welsh Office (class XVI, vote 5). The vote 2 increase also makes provision for the preparatory costs of establishing new funding arrangements for further education in England, offset by a reduction in provision on vote 1 and in provision on vote 2 for bursaries for the training of teachers in shortage subjects.

The increase on class XI, vote 4 includes the full take-up of capital (£2,000,000) and running costs (£404,000) end-year flexibility entitlement. It provides for slippage of expenditure associated with the Department's new headquarters building. It also provides for a further transfer (£200,000) from the Department of the Environment towards the costs of the sport and recreation directorate following the transfer of responsibility for sport to my Department. The increase is net of a transfer of £78,000 to the Department of Employment to reflect that Department's responsibility for the secretariat of the School Teachers' Review Body. The net effect of the changes to running costs is to increase the limit by £526,000 from £96,445,000 to £96,971,000.

These changes are within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Public Appointments

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give the numbers of persons or bodies appointed by him or by departments subject to his direction and control; and the date of creation of each such body.

Dr. Mawhinney: At 31 August 1991, there were 147 such public bodies with a total of 2,358 appointments. Further details of these bodies may be found in "Public Bodies" and "Public Appointments: A Handbook for Women's Organisations", copies of which are available in the Library.

Departmental Land Holdings

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give the hectarage, number of holdings and numbers of tenants of holdings of agricultural land owned by his Department in each county in Northern Ireland in (a) 1980 and (b) 1990.

Mr. Hanley: The Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland owns agricultural land which it farms for educational and research purposes. Its forest service also owns areas of agricultural land which are surplus to its current planting plans or which it is holding pending the availability of adjoining land; this land is generally let out to neighbouring farmers under short-term lets. The figures for 1990 are shown below (1980 figures in brackets):

Areas of agricultural land owned and the number of holdings owned and let by the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland, 1990 (1980)

County	Hectares owned	Holdings owned		Holdings let
Antrim	1,691 (1,490)	20	(10)	18	(8)
Armagh/Down	658 (1,179)	27	(31)	23	(27)
Fermanagh	1,768 (1,753)	36	(50)	34	(48)
Londonderry	1,148 (868)	16	(27)	16	(27)
Tyrone	1,367 (2,480)	45	(14)	44	(13)
Northern Ireland	6,632 (7,770)	144	(132)	135	(123)

EMPLOYMENT

Manufacturing (Earnings)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will publish a table showing the increase in, respectively, the average real earnings of full-time adult male and female manual workers in manufacturing industry, whose pay was not affected by sickness, in the 12 years to April compared to full-time male and female manual employees (i) in the public sector and (ii) not in the public sector;

(2) whether he will publish a table showing the increase in the average real earnings of full-time adult male manual workers in manufacturing industry, whose pay was not affected by sickness, in the 12 years to April 1991 relative to full-time male adult manual workers in (i) the public sector other than the nationalised industries, (ii) the nationalised industries and (iii) the private sector;

(3) whether he will publish a table showing the increase in the average real earnings of full-time adult female manual workers in manufacturing industry, whose pay

was not affected by sickness, in the 12 years to April 1991 relative to full-time adult female manual workers in (i) the public sector other than the nationalised industries, (ii) the nationalised industries and (iii) the private sector;

(4) if he will publish a table showing the increase in, respectively, the average real earnings of full-time adult male and female manual workers in manufacturing industry, whose pay was not affected by sickness, in the 12 years to April compared to full-time adult male and female non-manual employees in (i) the public sector and (ii) not in the public sector;

(5) whether he will publish a table showing the increase in the average real earnings of full-time adult female manual workers in manufacturing industry, whose pay was not affected by sickness, in the 12 years to April and the same data for full-time adult female non-manual workers in (a) manufacturing, (b) the public sector other than the nationalised industries, (c) the nationalised industries and (d) the private sector;

(6) if he will publish a table showing the increase in the average real earnings of full-time adult male and female manual workers in manufacturing industry whose pay was not affected by sickness, in the 12 years to April compared to full-time adult male and female non-manual employees in (i) the public sector and (ii) not in the public sector;

(7) whether he will publish a table showing the increase in the average real earnings of full-time adult male manual workers in manufacturing industry, whose pay was not affected by sickness, in the 12 years to April 1991 relative to full-time adult male non-manual workers in (a) manufacturing, (b) the public sector other than the nationalised industries, (c) the nationalised industries and (d) the private sector.

Mr. Jackson: Information on the average gross earnings of manual and non-manual male and female employees by sector and of manual employees in manufacturing can be found in tables 1, 4 and 6 of part A of the new earnings survey reports from 1979 onwards, apart from those in the "Public Sector other than the nationalised industries" for 1979 which are given in the table below.

Information on the retail prices index (all items) to convert 1979 figures to 1991 prices is published in table 6·4 of the latest Employment Gazette for April 1991, and in table 26 of the annual supplement to Economic Trends for April of earlier years.

Copies of the publications are available in the Library.

Average gross weekly earnings of full-time adult employees whose pay was not affected by absence. Public sector other than public corporations

	April 1979 £
Manual women	52·9
Manual men	79·5
Non-manual women	74·5
Non-manual men	111·0

Employees (Underpayments)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many employers in the east midlands have been prosecuted for underpaying their employees since 1979; and if he will list the name, offence and penalty in each case.

Mr. Forth: Maurice's Discount of Nottingham is the only employer in the east midlands to have been prosecuted since 1979. The employer was prosecuted in 1989 under section 16 of the Wages Act 1986 for failing to pay at least the statutory minimum remuneration. The court imposed a fine of £100 and costs of £100 were awarded against the employer. Arrears of wages amounting to £429·71 were paid by the employer to the worker concerned.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the number of jobs lost in manufacturing since 1970, 1973, 1979 and 1988, respectively; and what is his estimate of the number of jobs in each case lost as a result of (i) lack of training and (ii) lack of capital investment.

Mr. Jackson: The number of employees in employment in manufacturing in the United Kingdom at June 1991 has fallen by:

Since	Number
1970	3,456,000
1973	2,959,000
1979	2,375,000
1988	332,000

It is not possible to estimate the causes underlying the falls, but manufacturing has accounted for a declining share of total employment in most other industrial countries over the last twenty years, and has seen substantial increases in output per employee over the period.

Mr. Lee: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish the level of employment in the United Kingdom apparel, knitting and textile industries (classes 26, 43, 453 and 455; including Northern Ireland) at September 1988, September 1989, September 1990 and September 1991.

Mr. Jackson: Estimates of employees in employment in the apparel, knitting and textile industries in the United Kingdom are only available at census of employment dates. The following table shows Great Britain estimates for the dates requested together with United Kingdom estimates for the latest two censuses.

Employees in employment

[1] The Great Britain figures include:
(i) group 255, manufacture of paints, varnishes and printing ink, and;
(ii) activity heading 4560, manufacture of fur goods.

Youth Training

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what criteria are used to justify different unit prices for youth training places, or weeks; and what is the range of prices paid.

Mr. Jackson: Targets for numbers of training weeks and outputs to be delivered on youth training (YT), the payment for each and the overall budget are agreed by negotiation between the employment department and individual training and enterprise councils (TECs). TEC volume targets and unit prices are influenced by past performance and by a range of local factors.

TECs are responsible for all contractual and financial arrangements with individual organisations which provide training.

Car Industry

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his estimate of the increase since April 1979 in (a) output per head and (b) the average weekly earnings in real terms of adult male manual workers in the car industry.

Mr. Jackson: The increase in output per head in the motor vehicles and parts industry between the second quarter of 1979 and the second quarter of 1991 is estimated to be 57 per cent.

Information on the average gross weekly earnings of manual male employees in the motor vehicle industry can be found in table 4 of part A of the new earnings survey reports for 1979 and 1991.

Information on the retail prices index (all items) to convert 1979 figures to 1991 prices is published in table 6.4 of the latest Employment Gazette for April 1991, and in table 26 of the annual supplement to Economic Trends for April of earlier years.

Copies of the publications are available in the Library.

Cash Limits

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether any changes will be made to his Department's cash limits or running costs limits for 1991-92.

Mr. Howard: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, the following changes will be made:

The cash limit for class VI, vote (programmes and central services) will be increased by £81,066,000 from £2,357,241,000 to £2,438,307,000. The increase principally reflects additional provision for the package of employment measures which I announced to the House on 19 June 1991. The changes for this vote relating to the package are: £43,520,000 provision for the new employment action (EA) programme; an increase of £29,900,000 for employment training (ET); increased provision of £1,000,000 for publicity to promote the June measures; increased receipts from the Welsh Office (class XVI, vote 4) to recover increased expenditure on EA and ET in Wales; and increased running costs associated with the delivery of EA, of which £1,315,000 is for training and enterprise councils and departmental area offices in England and Wales and local enterprise companies in Scotland, and £342,000 is for Employment Department headquarters. The increase in the cash limit as a result of these measures is partially offset by reduced requirements by the Department of Social Security (class XIV, vote 1). Other changes to the cash limit reflect: a transfer of £3,100,000 from the Scottish Office (class XV, vote 3) for residual expenditure by my department mainly on Youth Training (YT) in Scotland; increased provision of £1,599,000 (running costs) and £2,000,000 (capital) for full take up of end year flexibility entitlement, to carry forward unspent provision from 1990-91 to 1991-92 as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 17 July 1991 at columns 186-190; an increase of £2,585,000 running costs for payment to Property Holdings for opportunity cost rents; an increase of £1,168,000 running costs for payment to the Treasury Solicitor's Department (TSD) for legal services and £17,000 new receipts for recovery of costs and awards from legal cases following the move to a repayment system with the Treasury Solicitor's Department; a transfer of £78,000 running costs from the Department of Education and Science (class XI, vote 4) for secretariat services to the school teachers review body; increased receipts of £300,000 from the sale of capital assets from the former National Dock Labour Board; a transfer of £45,000 to the Scottish Office (class XV, vote 13) to fund a grant to the Scottish Council on Alcohol; and a reduction of £20,000 for tourist projects to reflect an excess in expenditure on tourism in 1990-91.

The cash limit for class VI, vote 2 (employment service), will be increased by £35,031,000 from £453,849,000 to £488,880,000. The increase is the net result of an increase of £15,715,000 running costs for measures to assist the unemployed; an increase of £5,408,000 running costs for administration of payments to ET, YT and EA participants; an increase of £2,800,000 for job review and restart courses programmes; an increase of £10,060,000 running costs in respect of opportunity costs rents; an increase of £3,106,000 for full take up of running costs end year flexibility entitlement to carry forward unspent provision from 1990-91 to 1991-92 as announced by the Chief Secretary on 17 July 1991; an increase of £5,000,000 in running costs for increased funding for fraud investigation, offset by equivalent receipts from the Department of Social Security (class XIV, vote 4); increased receipts of £1,651,000 relating to VAT refunds on contracted out services and increased VAT receipts of £407,000 in respect of programmes for priority groups.

The running costs limit for the Department of Employment will be increased by £44,725,000 from £1,057,699,000 to £1,102,424,000.

The increases are within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

WALES

Pupils (English)

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to ensure parents who wish their children to be educated through the medium of English in maintained primary schools in Dyfed will receive such an education for their children.

Mr. David Hunt: This is the responsibility of the local education authority.

Cancer Specialists

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will indicate where there are health authorities in Wales with a shortage of consultant cancer specialists;

(2) what steps he will take to deal with a shortage of consultant cancer specialists.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The Welsh medical and dental manpower committee advises the Department on the relative priority of consultant appointments and reflect in their recommendations any shortages identified by district health authorities.

The latest information shows no shortages in this speciality.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he will take to speed up treatment for cancer sufferers.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: We are continuing to make available central funds to improve the accessibility and quality of the regional radiotherapy and oncology service. We are also encouraging an exchange of information and ideas between those interested in the development of an effective cancer service in Wales.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people were in employment in the Holyhead travel-to-work area in (a) June 1987 and (b) June 1991.

Mr. David Hunt: In September 1987 there were 13,800 employees in employment in the Holyhead travel to work area. In September 1989 (the latest date for which information is available) the number of employees in employment had increased to 15,000. Employment data for the area are available only from biennial censuses of employment.

Cash Limits

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to make any changes to the cash limits for his Department in the current year.

Mr. David Hunt: Yes. Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, the cash limit for class XVI, vote 4 will be increased by £5,159,000 from £151,408,000 to £156,567,000; the cash limit for class XVI, vote 5 will be reduced by £6,590,000 from £399,875,000 to £393,285,000; the cash limit for class XVI, vote 8 will be increased by £12,783,000 from £1,130,677,000 to £1,143,460,000; the cash limit for class XVI, vote 10 will be increased by £10,521,000 from £1,764,799,000 to £1,775,320,000. In addition, the cash limit for WO/UA will be increased by £8,061,000 from £74,091,000 to £82,152,000 and the cash limit for WO/LACAP will be reduced by £4,879,000 from £379,541,000 to £374,662,000.

The increase in vote 4 is in respect of the Welsh share of the increased provision for measures to help unemployed people, announced by the Secretary of State for Employment on 19 June 1991. The Welsh share is mainly for employment training and the new employment action programme.

The reduction to vote 5 allows for the transfer to class XVI, vote 10 of payments to the Valuation Office Agency for rating list work (£5,158,000). There are also further reductions of (i) £735,000 in the provision for rating list work and (ii) £697,000 in respect of the running costs of the valuation and community charge tribunal offices (including associated receipts) which are being accommodated from offsetting savings within vote 10.

The additional resources for vote 8 are for (i) the increase in VAT announced on 19 March 1991 (£7,500,000), (ii) full take-up of end year flexibility entitlement for capital carryover as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 17 July 1991 (cols. 186 to 190) (£5,086,000) and (iii) the transfer from class XIII, vote 1 (Department of Health) of the Incentive Bonus Scheme Policy Group (£197,000).

The increase to vote 10 takes account of (i) the transfer of provision for rating services from class XVI, vote 5 (£5,158,000) and (ii) additional provision for payments to the Valuation Office Agency in respect of council tax banding work (£5,363,000).

The increase to the urban aid capital cash limit (WO/UA) takes account of (i) the take-up of end year flexibility entitlement on capital expenditure (£3,182,000) as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 17 July 1991 at columns 186 to 190 and (ii) the transfer of provision for the rural initiative from WO/LACAP (£4,879,000).

The reduction in the local authority capital cash limit (WO/LACAP) relates to the transfer of provision to WO/UA in respect of the rural initiative.

The net increase represented by these changes is within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

Non-domestic Rates

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what will be the national non-domestic rate poundage for Wales for 1992-93 and the distributable amount of non-domestic rates which will flow from this.

Mr. David Hunt: We propose that the national non-domestic rate poundage for Wales should rise in line with the increase in the retail price index for the 12 months to September 1991 giving a poundage for 1992-93 of £0·425. This represents an increase of just over 4 per cent. compared with just under 11 per cent. between 1990-91 and 1991-92. We believe this is fair and reasonable, and will be widely welcomed. It reflects the Government's success in reducing inflation, and will demonstrate to business the benefits of the uniform business rate. We propose that the distributable amount of non-domestic rates income will be £536 million.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. T M French

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne can expect a reply to his letter of 14 August on behalf of Mr. T M French, of Portobello boarding cattery, Portobello, Troon, Camborne, Cornwall.

Mr. Jack: A reply was sent to the hon. Member on Tuesday 5 November.

Benefits (Claimants' Savings)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will state (a) the present tariff income schedule of attributed interest on savings held by benefit claimants, (b) the interest rate and annual percentage rate on savings implied by the schedule, (c) when the schedule was last revised and (d) whether he proposes to revise it again in the light of recent falls in interest rates.

Miss Widdecombe: The tariff income rules in the income-related benefits do not imply any particular return on savings. They ensure that help is targeted on those who need it most, while gradually reducing the amount of benefit paid to those with higher amounts of capital.

The level of income assumed from capital is calculated by ignoring the first £3,000 and taking into account £1 a week for every £250, or part of £250, between £3,000 and the upper capital limit for the particular benefit. The tariff income rule has not been revised since it was introduced in 1988. The maximum amount of capital that a claimant can have and still be entitled to benefit was increased in income support and family credit from £6,000 to £8,000, and doubled in housing benefit and community charge benefit from £8,000 to £16,000 in April 1990.

The capital rules continue to be kept under review.

National Insurance Contributions

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has yet completed the review of National Insurance contributions for 1992-93.

Mr. Newton: I have completed the annual review under section 120 of the Social Security Act 1975. My proposals will take effect from 6 April 1992.

Employers and employees

As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in his statement earlier today, I do not propose to change the standard rates of contributions for either employees or employers, which remain at 9 per cent. and 10·4 per cent. respectively.

In line with the Social Security Pensions Act 1975, the lower earnings limit for class 1 contributions is to be raised to £54 a week, which is the nearest whole pound to the basic retirement pension rate for a single person from April 1992. The upper earnings limit is to be raised to £405 a week, which is slightly less than seven and a half times the new basic pension rate as provided by the Social Security Pensions Act. These new earnings limits will replace the current ones of £52 and £390 respectively.

Under the structure for employees which came into force in October 1989 people whose earnings reach the lower earnings limit will continue to pay an initial contribution of 2 per cent. of that limit and standard rate contributions of 9 per cent. on that portion of their earnings which exceeds the lower but not the upper earnings limit. For employers the reduced contribution rates of 4·6 per cent., 6·6 per cent. and 8·6 per cent. for the lower paid will continue unchanged. However, the ceilings for these rates will be raised so that from April 1992 they apply to weekly earnings which fall below the ceilings of £90, £135, and £190 respectively, compared with £85, £130 and £185 at present.

Not contracted-out employees and their employers

Neither the employee nor his employer will have to pay any contribution if earnings are less than £54 a week. Those whose earnings do not exceed £390 (the former upper earnings limit) will pay 14 pence a week less in contributions than at present. This is because a further £2 of their weekly earnings will be subject to a deduction of 2 per cent. rather than 9 per cent. For employees with earnings above £390 a week the maximum possible increase will be £1·21 a week. Employers' contributions will generally be unchanged although there will be some gains where employees' earnings which were above the former ceilings fall below the new ceilings. There will be no increase for employers of the higher paid since there is no upper earnings limit for employers' contributions.

Contracted-out employees and their employers

Contracted-out employees will gain in the same way. The contributions due from employees earning less than £390 a week will drop by 10 pence a week. For employees earning over £390 the maximum possible increase will be 95 pence a week. Their employers will generally pay 7 or 8 pence a week more than at present because they will have to pay not contracted-out contributions on the first £54 of earnings rather than the present lower limit of £52 a week, although there will be gains in respect of lower paid employees whose earnings fall between the old and new ceilings for reduced rate contributions.

Self-employed people

The flat rate class 2 contribution will be raised by 20p to £5·35 a week.

There will be no increase in the rate of class 4 contributions currently 6·3 per cent. The annual limits of profits between which class 4 contributions are paid will be raised £6,120 and £21,060 from £5,900 and £20,280 respectively. Self-employed people who pay only class 2 contributions will pay an extra £10·40 a year in 1992-93.

For people with profits between £6,120 and £20,280 (the former upper profits limit) class 4 contributions will be reduced by £13·86 per year assuming an unaltered level of profits. For those self-employed people with profits at or above the new upper profits limit the annual charge for class 4 contributions will be £35·28 higher.

Class 3 (Voluntary) contributions

The rate of class 3 contributions will be raised by 20p to £5·25 a week.

National Health Service Allocation

The allocation to the national health service, currently 1·05 per cent. from employees and 0·9 per cent. from employers, remains unchanged.

The draft order, together with a report by the Government Actuary, will be laid before Parliament shortly.

National Insurance Contributions on Shares

I am also today laying before Parliament regulations concerning the payment of national insurance contributions on certain financial instruments including shares and unit trusts, which are at present treated as payments in kind and are not therefore subject to such contributions, and which in some cases have clearly been used by employers as a means of avoiding them.

As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made clear in his Budget statement when announcing the changes in respect of company cars and free fuel, subsequently enacted in the Social Security (Contributions) Act 1991, in the Government's view there is no reason why payments in kind should necessarily be treated any differently from payments in cash for national insurance contribution purposes. The regulations laid today, which will come into effect at midnight tonight, accordingly provide that both primary and secondary contributions will be payable on the value of financial instruments and certain short-term insurance policies which form part of an employee's remuneration. There will however be an exemption for shares and options to acquire shares in the company for which an employee works, so that employee share ownership schemes will not be affected.

Cash Limits

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether there are any proposed changes in the cash-limited programme expenditure of his Department for 1991-92.

Mr. Scott: Subject to parliamentary approval on the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for class XIV vote 3 (housing benefit administration and community charge benefit administration, and other grants) will be increased by £32,918,000 from £292,625,000 to £325,543,000. The revision takes account of a transfer from class XIV vote 4 (Administration and Miscellaneous Services) for housing benefit administration and community charge benefit administration costs (£1,070,000), an increase in the grant towards Motability's administrative costs (£38,000), an increase in the grant-in-aid to Motability to help with high cost car adaptations for war pensioners (£60,000) and an increase in the subsidies to local authorities for housing benefit administration (£1,750,000). There is also an increase in payments into the social fund to finance budgeting loans, crisis loans and community care grants (£30,000,000). The increases are within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether there are any proposed changes in the cash limits or running costs limit of his Department for 1991-92.

Mr. Scott: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate the cash limit for class XIV, vote 4 (Administration and Miscellaneous Services) will be increased by £19,789,000 from £1,881,428,000 to £1,901,217,000. The revision takes account of increased requirements to meet the additional administrative expenditure arising from higher unemployment (£34,736,000), additional expenditure within the child support unit (£4,000,000), an increase in Agency Payments to Department of Employment (class VI, vote 2) (£5,000,000), £2,434,000 in respect of the end of the year flexibility arrangements for capital expenditure, a transfer to Housing Benefit Administration (class XIV, vote 3) of £1,070,000, a transfer to Department of Health (class XIII, vote 3) of £69,000 and a transfer from Inland Revenue (class XVIII, vote 6) of £76,000. The additional requirements are partially offset by an increase in receipts of £25,318,000 and the balance is within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

In addition to the running cost increases of £35,213,000 included above there is a transfer to Department of Health and Social Services (Northern Ireland) of £445,000 for the running costs of the Belfast Social Security Centre. There will be a corresponding increase on Department of Health and Social Services (Northern Ireland) vote 3 Administration and Miscellaneous Services. Also a reduction of £677,000 to take account of a variation from a previously anticipated outturn of expenditure.

As a result of these changes the running cost limit of the Department of Social Security will be increased by £34,091,000 from £2,115,817,000 to £2,149,908,000.

Benefits Uprating

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list each of the measures announced in his uprating statement of 21 October, giving the gross cost or saving for each, and the net cost or saving net of other benefit expenditure, in 1992-93.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 5 November 1991]: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced earlier today, the increase in total expenditure on social security between 1991-92 and 1992-93 is planned to be some £5·5 billion.

Increases in rates for contributory and non-contributory benefits generally will be with reference to the September 1990 to September 1991 increase in the retail price index (RPI) and for income-related benefits with reference to the revised Rossi index which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, announced on 21 October. The cost of these increases over unchanged rates of benefit amounts to over £3 billion in 1992-93.

On 21 October my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was also able to announce measures to extend or increase provision in 1992-93 in a number of important areas. The benefit costs of these are listed below (except in the case of the social fund, the difference between the net and gross costs is negligible and does not affect the figures given).

	£ million
Increase in income support premium for pensioners who are disabled or over 80	+ 57
Changes in attendance allowance/disabled living allowance giving additional benefit to people in voluntary hospices	+ 2
Direct funding of hospices (through the Department of Health)	+ 1
Social fund discretionary budgets (increase in gross budgets)	+ 67
Minor measures to improve war pensions, severe disability allowance, disability living allowance, invalid care allowance provision and to provide protection for changes in the severe disability premium	+ 10
Increased provision for independent living fund	[1]+ 23
Increases in income support limits for residential care	+ 190

Note:

[1] Subject to confirmation in the light of later information on caseload.

In reviewing the level of statutory sick pay my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State decided to increase the lower rate by RPI but not to increase the higher rate which goes to many people covered by occupational schemes.

The overall cost of this is £19 million less than if both rates were increased. He also announced a restructuring of the system for calculating the contributions which could be reasonably expected from non-householders living with those householders on income-related benefits. This would reduce the contribution expected from those on lower incomes and would increase the contribution expected from those with significant incomes from full-time work. The net effect would be to reduce benefit expenditure by £50 million.

The uprating statement also covered extra help in 1992-93 for disabled people through disability living allowance at a cost of £120 million and for the families of those in work, through the hours change in family credit and the introduction of a maintenance disregard, at a net cost of £70 million.

Pensioners

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the net cost to the Exchequer of the measures announced in the uprating statement.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) earlier today.

ENVIRONMENT

Poll Tax

4. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received to date advocating the abolition of the minimum payment requirement of 20 per cent. for poll tax payers.

Mr. Key: I have received a number of representations.

Broadleaved Trees

19. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what initiative his Department is currently taking for the protection and provision of broadleaved trees.

Mr. Baldry: My Department is currently undertaking a comprehensive review of tree preservation policies and legislation. We have also made available resources for the Countryside Commission to provide grants for amenity planting, and have supported initiatives to create community forests near towns and cities and to establish a proposed new national forest.

Local Government Finance

20. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has made any assessment of the amendments in local services that will be needed if his total standard spending target is to be achieved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: The £41·8 billion which we have proposed for total standard spending in 1992-93 is sufficient to cover the full range of local authority services.

30. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to confirm his proposed 1992-93 financial settlement for local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

36. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to confirm his proposed 1992-93 financial settlement for local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: Shortly.

28. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any proposals to strengthen the ability of his Department to restrict the spending of local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: The Local Government Finance and Valuation Act enacted earlier this year removes the exemption capping for those authorities setting budgets below £15 million. In future we shall be able to protect all chargepayers from high bills caused by their authorities' excessive spending, and we shall not hesitate to do so should it prove necessary.

Building Work

21. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his most recent assessment of activity in the building and construction industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Output rose every year from 1981 to 1990. It fell back during 1990, but still reached a new record level. Output is expected to continue falling in the remainder of this year. However, the first indications of a recovery are now appearing.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he has had with representatives of the construction industry over the effect the recession has been having on building works.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is closely in touch with representatives of the construction industry and frequently discusses this and other matters of interest with them.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he has had with the Royal Institute of British Architects over planning for building work over the next six months.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has had no such consultations.

Beaches

22. Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which was the English beach in the summer of 1991, designated as a bathing beach under the terms of the 1976 European Commission's bathing waters directive which had the sample containing (a) the highest number of E. Coli per 100 ml of water and (b) the highest number of total Coliforms per 100 ml of water.

Mr. Baldry: This information will be available in the detailed summary of the 1991 bathing water quality monitoring results which will be placed in the Library when available from the National Rivers Authority.

Thames Corridor

23. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce his decision for consultancy for the placing of his Thames corridor initiative.

Mr. Heseltine: I shall announce the names of the consultants who will undertake the Lower Thames study shortly.

Local Government (Internal Management)

24. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he has so far received to the consultation paper on the internal management of local authorities.

Mr. Portillo: The Department has received about 150 responses so far.

Empty Council Properties

25. Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the latest figure for the number of council properties left empty by the 10 worst councils.

Mr. Heseltine: Local authorities reporting the highest percentage of their stock empty in housing investment programme returns for April 1991 were: Liverpool, Manchester, Salford, Burnley, Brent, Hackney, Tower Hamlets, Knowsley, Newcastle upon Tyne and Wolverhampton. In total, these 10 authorities had some 24,000 properties lying empty.

Waste Regulation

26. Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the effect of the transfer of local authorities' waste regulation role to the new environment agency, on the functions of that service.

Mr. Baldry: The Government's proposals for transferring waste regulation to the new Environment Agency are set out in the consultation paper issued on 3 October—copies of which have been placed in the Library. The new agency will be able to ensure that standards of waste disposal are applied consistently across the country, and develop the necessary expertise to deal with the increasingly sophisticated waste disposal techniques. It will also ensure better co-ordination with the agency's other regulatory responsibilities.

Commonhold

27. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to introduce legislation concerning commonhold; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: As soon as parliamentary time allows.

City Challenge

29. Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the impact on housing in inner city areas of the Government's city challenge initiative.

Mr. Heseltine: The 11 city challenge pacemakers have yet to prepare detailed action plans for their areas. Housing initiatives can, however, be expected to be included in these plans, their number and type depending on the needs and characteristics of the individual city challenge areas.

Environment Agency

31. Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received on the form that the proposed environment agency should take.

Mr. Baldry: The Government's proposals for an Environment Agency were set out in a consultation paper published on 3 October. We have invited views on these proposals by 31 January 1992. So far we have received representations about the role of the National Rivers Authority, the arrangements for waste regulation, and the drinking water inspectorate.

Water Quality

33. Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the progress of the privatised water companies programme to improve water quality.

Mr. Baldry: Progress on the water companies' improvement programmes was checked in the course of the drinking water inspectorate's first round of annual inspections. The chief inspector concluded in his report that the programmes were found generally to be running to timetable. This is consistent with the findings of the Director General of Water Services.

Street Lighting

34. Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider making additional finances available to local authorities to deal with the problems of inadequate street lighting.

Mr. Key: Local authorities' responsibilities for street lighting are taken into account in each year's local authority finance settlement. It is for authorities themselves to decide how much to spend.

Tyne and Wear UDC

34. Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will report on the progress made by the Tyne and Wear urban development corporation.

Mr. Portillo: Tyne and Wear Development Corporation has made excellent progress in transforming and regenerating the riverside areas of Tyneside and Wearside. It has attracted over £250 million of private investment and created more than 3,000 jobs since it was set up in 1987.

Water Rates

37. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his long-term proposals for the future of water rates.

Mr. Baldry: The Water Act 1989 already prohibits water companies from fixing their charges wholly or partly by reference to rateable value after the year 2000. It is for individual companies to choose their preferred alternative method of charging, in the light of guidance which the Director General of Water Services will be issuing following his consultation exercise.

EC Environment Directives

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next proposes to meet the European Commissioner for the Environment to discuss compliance with EC environmental directives.

Mr. Baldry: I plan to attend the Environment Council when it next meets in December, when a variety of topics will doubtless be on the agenda.

Community Charge (Bailiffs)

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will make a statement on the responsibilities of local authorities for giving advice to community charge payers who do not pay their charge in full on how to handle bailiffs when they visit their home;

(2) what information he has on the number of local authorities issuing guidance to community charge payers on dealing with bailiffs who call to recover unpaid community charge.

Mr. Key: There is no requirement on local authorities to inform community chargepayers about their rights when bailiffs visit their home and we have no information on the number of authorities who issue guidance on this. The majority of local authorities do have, however, a code of practice which governs the way their bailiffs undertake distress action.

Water Abstraction

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in tabular form, by National Rivers Authority region, the amount of water abstracted in 1990 for (a) water supply, (b) spray irrigation, (c) other agricultural purposes, (d) electricity generating companies and (e) other industrial purposes, respectively.

Mr. Baldry: These statistics are published annually in chapter 7 (Water Supply and Use) of the Digest of Environmental Protection and Water Statistics. The next volume (No. 14) will be published in February/March 1992.

Public Bodies (Audits)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether external audit for public bodies and local authorities can be carried out by panels of auditors working collectively;

(2) what guidance he has given to local authorities and other public bodies on the appointment of external auditors; and what efforts he has made to ensure that small accountancy practices are able to take up the position of external auditors to public bodies.

Mr. Key: The appointment of external auditors to local authorities, related bodies and the national health service is the responsibility of the Audit Commission. Section 13 of the Local Government Finance Act 1982 states that an auditor may be an officer of the commission, an individual who is not such an officer or a firm of such individuals. It is for the commission to determine its own policies on audit appointments.

The appointment of external auditors to public bodies is made in accordance with the relevant statute and is a matter for the relevant Secretary of State or the National Audit Office. Appointments made by the Secretary of State may consist of a qualified individual or a firm whose members are qualified individuals. Any applicant, whether an individual or a firm, with relevant qualifications or experience may be considered for such appointments.

Flats

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the Government intend to introduce for England and Wales a scheme providing for the freehold ownership and communal management of flats including the collective right to buy from the freeholder at market value; when legislation to implement the proposals will be introduced; and whether the title of the Bill will allow an amendment to the Leasehold Reform Act 1967, so as to allow long leaseholders of higher rateable value houses to enfranchise.

Sir George Young: The Government intend to introduce legislation to provide for the communal management of flats, including a collective right to buy the freehold interest at market value, as soon as parliamentary time can be found. The Government are currently considering sympathetically the case for including in the Bill provision to allow long leaseholders of higher rateable houses to enfranchise, but I can in any case confirm that the long title of the Bill will be so drawn as to allow amendments to the Leasehold Reform Act 1967.

Social Housing

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to encourage local authorities to repair and replace social housing stock.

Sir George Young: Local authorities are already responsible for the maintenance and repair of their own housing stock. The building of new social housing is now mainly the responsibility of the Housing Corporation, with local authorities assuming an enabling role.

European Commission

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will raise with Commissioner Ripa di Meana the issue of the extent to which the Commission intends to exercise powers relating to his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The European Commission's powers and functions and its relationship with the Governments of member states are set out in the treaties establishing the European Communities. I encourage constructive communication between my Department and the Commission's directorate general XI.

Non-domestic Rates

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what will be the national non-domestic rate poundage for 1992-93 and the distributable amount of non-domestic rates which will flow from this.

Mr. Heseltine: We propose that the national non-domestic rate poundage for England should rise by 4·1 per cent., the September increase in the retail price index, giving a poundage for 1992-93 of 40·2p. We believe this is fair and reasonable. It reflects the Government's success in reducing inflation, and will demonstrate to business the benefits of the uniform business rate. We propose that the distributable amount of non-domestic rates income will be £12,306 million.

Eco-labelling

Mr. Knowles: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the Government's response to the eighth report from the Environment Committee (HC 474-1) will be published.

Mr. Baldry: We have today published our response to the Environment Select Committee's report on eco-labelling (Cm 1720). We welcome this comprehensive and helpful report from the Select Committee, which is a valuable contribution to the ongoing debate on eco-labelling, and are grateful for its endorsement of much of the work we have done towards the development of an official scheme of environmental labelling.

We are particularly pleased that the Committee has chosen to back our quest for agreement on an acceptable European Community-wide scheme of eco-labelling. We have aired the Committee's concerns in the continuing negotiations over the scheme and are optimistic that these will be addressed in the final text of the Regulation.

The Government's response backs many of the specific recommendations made by the Committee. In particular, my colleagues at the Department of Trade and Industry have given a commitment to amending the Trade Descriptions Act at the earliest opportunity to put beyond doubt that the Act embraces environmental claims.

The response outlines action that we have already taken to address some of the Committee's concerns. By commissioning further logo designs and market testing them against the Commission's proposed logo, we have persuaded the Commission to undertake further work to ensure that a more appropriate logo is adopted. The UK is also working with the Commission to develop detailed guidance to assist in the development of product criteria on a cradle to grave basis.

I would also echo the Committee's praise for the immensely valuable contribution the National Advisory Group on Eco-Labelling have made to the development of our ideas on eco-labelling over the past year.

PSA Services

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes to make any changes to the running cost limit on PSA Services' Vote in 1991-92.

Mr. Heseltine: Yes. Subject to parliamentary approval, and as part of wider changes to my Department's cash limits for 1991-92, the cost limit for class VIII, vote 13 will be reduced by £13,691,000 from £83,307,000 to £69,346,000 mainly due to lower than previously forecast expenditure on severance. In addition, the following changes will be made to my Department's cash limits:

i) the DOE/UA non-voted cash limit will be increased by £28,781,000 from £855,033,000 to £883,814,000. This includes increased grant-in-aid of £23,000,000 to the London Docklands Development Corporation for the Eastern extension of the docklands light railway. A further £11,581,000 is required for various projects by other urban development corporations and to meet a backlog of urban programme grant claims. The costs will be met, in part, from full take up of entitlement of £8,781,000 under the end year flexibility scheme for capital projects. There are also some offsetting savings amounting to £5,800,000 on the city grant programme;

ii) the cash limit for class VIII, vote 5 (Central environmental services, etc.) will be reduced by £9,450,000 from £327,290,000 to £317,840,000. Of this decrease £7,000,000 reflects reduced grant-in-aid requirement by the National Rivers Authority, and £2,450,000 reflects adjustments to the grant-in-aid payable in 1991-92 to the Nature Conservancy Council and English Nature. The latter offsets in part an increase in the cash limit on class VIII, Vote 6 (Royal palaces, royal parks, historic buildings, etc.) as described below;

iii) the cash limit for class VIII, vote 6 (Royal palaces, royal parks, historic buildings? etc.) will be increased by £3,450,000 from £173,034,000 to £176,484,000. An increase of £2,450,000 is required to meet payments arising from contracting out the gardening services in the royal parks, in accordance with the plans I announced to the House on 18 July. This increase is offset by a reduction in the cash limit on class VIII, vote 5 as outlined above. The additional associated running cost provision of £2,450,000 will be offset by an equivalent reduction in running cost provision on class VIII, vote 8 (Department of the Environment: Administration) so that the Department's running cost limit of £190,061,000 remains unchanged. There will be a further increase of £1,000,000 for improving public facilities in the royal parks that will be met from part take up of entitlement of £1,048,000 under the end year flexibility scheme for capital projects;

iv) the cash limit for class VIII, Vote 9 (Revenue support grant, payment of non-domestic rates, Valuation Office rating service, etc., England) will be increased by £78,232,000 from £22,681,112,000 to £22,759,344,000. The increase is required for the implementation of Council Tax; and

v) the DOE/LACAP non-voted cash limit will be reduced by £3,867,000. The reduction is due to lower than expected claims by local authorities of specific current grants.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury, announced in a written answer on 17 July 1991 at columns 186-190 the entitlements for 1991-92 cash limits allowed under the end-year flexibility schemes.

These changes are reflected in the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

Council Tax

Mr. Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about the treatment under the council tax of district councils in England whose budgets are less than their entitlement to redistributed non-domestic rates and revenue support grant.

Mr. Portillo: Under our council tax proposals some district councils, because of prudent housekeeping, are likely to receive more redistributed non-domestic rates and revenue support grant than they wish to spend. We do not propose to claw back non-domestic rates or revenue support grant in such circumstances. Instead we are seeking Parliament's approval, in the Local Government Finance Bill, to permit district councils in this position to use surplus non-domestic rates and revenue support grant for the benefit of local taxpayers, by offsetting the county precepts in their areas.

Development Plans

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to commence the development plans provisions of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: On 4 September, the Department published proposals for the implementation of the development plans provisions of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991 and invited views on a draft of planning policy guidance note 12. The consultation period closed on 1 November. The Department is carefully considering all the responses made but it would clearly assist those local planning authorities at critical stages of plan preparation to have as much notice as possible of the intended date of commencement of the new development plans system.

Accordingly, I am announcing today that, subject to Parliamentary considerations, we propose to commence the new system early in February 1992. We shall try to lay the regulations setting out the details as early as possible before that date, and I expect to announce a firm commencement date within the next month or so. The Department is today writing to all local planning authorities in England to confirm that information. The Welsh Office are writing similarly to authorities in Wales.

Loan Charge Grants

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to commute specific loan charge grants to local authorities.

Mr. Portillo: We will commute specific loan charge grants for housing and urban programme expenditure in England on 1 October 1992. The Department will pay a lump sum equivalent to the present value of future grants for each local authority to the Public Works Loan Board (PWLB), or to the local authority itself if any authorities have insufficient PWLB debt though such payments are expected to be small. Annual loan charge grants will then cease. As the commuted sums will repay local authority debt, cancelling out the loss of annual grant, the effect on local authority resources will be neutral. The commutation payment is expected to be around £4·5 billion in England, but the effect on general government expenditure will be negligible because virtually all the transfer payments involved are within general government. Similarly, the effect on the central government borrowing requirement, the public sector borrowing requirement (PSBR) and monetary aggregates will be negligible, since virtually all the commuted sums will return to the PWLB. Within the PSBR, central government borrowing on own account will be increased and the local authority borrowing requirement will be reduced by the amount of debt repayment. There is no effect on the planning total. The various transfer payments involved have been taken into account in my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's autumn statement.

Abortion

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidelines he has issued to the National Rivers Authority on the disposal of bodies of aborted unborn babies into the sewerage system.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 5 November 1991]: Human tissue is disposed of as clinical waste. Guidance on the treatment and disposal of such waste is given in Waste Management Paper No. 25 (published 1983) which also refers to the recommendations given in the Health and Safety Commission guidance note: The Safe Disposal of Clinical Waste (1982).

Paragraph 5.1.4 of Waste Management Paper No. 25, which is based mainly on the conclusions of the HSC guidance document, states that incineration should be the preferred disposal route for human tissues.

Advice is given on discharges to the sewers in Chapter 6. Discharges of certain other clinical wastes can be made to the sewer but only with the consent of the sewerage authority.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give (a) the number of confirmed cases and (b) the number of expected cases of BSE between (i) April 1990 and March 1991 and (ii) April 1991 to date.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give (a) the actual amounts and (b) the estimated amounts of money paid out in compensation for BSE in (i) 1990-91 and (ii) to date in 1991-92.

Mr. Gummer: The numbers of confirmed cases of BSE by date of clinical onset is as follows:

(i) between April 1990 and March 1991	15,869 cases
(ii) in April 1991	1,708 cases

More recent information is not available for the reason given in my reply to the hon. Member on 23 May 1991 col. 559.

The amount of money paid in compensation for BSE is as follows:

(i) 1990-91—£10·8 million, compared with a forecast in early April 1990 of £12·1 million.

(ii) 1991-92 to the end of September 1991—£8·0 million from an expected total annual spend of £14·6 million.

It is impossible to predict accurately the number of expected cases over particular periods and forecasts are regularly revised as more data comes in. Nevertheless the number of cases is in line with the epidemiological forecast that they will continue to increase until a peak is reached some time in 1992. Thereafter a decline in the number of cases is expected leading to the eradication of the disease around the end of the decade.

Ministry Land Holdings

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the hectarage, number of holdings and numbers of tenants of holdings of agricultural land owned by his Ministry in each county in England in (a) 1980 and (b) 1990.

Mr. Gummer: The information requested for 1980 could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. The information requested for 1990 is as follows.

Agricultural land owned by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (excluding land managed by the Forestry Commission) 31 March 1990

County	Hectarage	Number of holdings	Number of tenanted holdings
Bedfordshire	26	12	12
Cambridgeshire	404	4	2
Cornwall	50	1	0
Essex	38	1	1
Hampshire	653	4	2

County	Hectarage	Number of holdings	Number of tenanted holdings
Hereford/Worcester	176	1	0
Hertfordshire	10	1	0
Kent	75	1	0
Lincolnshire	42	1	0
North Yorkshire	500	2	0
Norfolk	119	1	0
Nottinghamshire	199	1	0
Somerset	200	1	0
Suffolk	5	1	1
Surrey	133	2	0
Tyne and Wear	21	1	0
Warwickshire	280	2	0
Total	2,931	37	18

No central record is kept of the number of holdings or of the distribution by county, but information is available on the number of tenancies and grazing lets for each of the commission's conservancies. This is set out in the table.

Agricultural land owned by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and managed by the Forestry Commission—31 March 1990

Conservancy	Hectarage	Number of tenancies	Number of grazing lets
North	7,900	57	126
East	1,300	48	49
West	800	59	50
Total	10,000	164	225

Farmhouse Cheeses

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all the EC member states that have applied the recent reduction in milk quotas to farmhouse cheesemakers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: All member states are obliged to apply the quota reductions agreed by the Council of Ministers in May, which apply equally to all categories of producer.

Cash Limits

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether any changes are proposed in the cash limits for the Intervention Board executive unit.

Mr. Gummer: Yes. Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for class III, vote 2 (administration) will be increased by £2,046,000 from £55,042,000 to £57,088,000. Within this limit running costs including VAT recovery will be increased by £117,000 from £28,814,000 to £28,931,000 and capital will be increased by £306,000 from £2,400,000 to £2,706,000 both in respect of end of year flexibility as announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 17 July 1991 at columns 185-89; agency services will be increased by £1,650,000 from £24,572,000 to £26,222,000, and appropriations in aid, excluding VAT recovery on running costs, will be increased by £27,000. These increases in administration costs reflect Meat and Livestock Commission redundancy costs following the ending of the sheep variable premium scheme offset in part by various savings, and take up of running cost and capital end year flexibility entitlement. The increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

Fisheries Council

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EC Council of Fisheries Ministers meeting on 28 October 1991.

Mr. Curry: I attended the EC Council of Fisheries Ministers on 28 October 1991 with my noble Friend, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Scottish Office.

This specially convened Council met to discuss the 10th, 11th and 12th amendments to the Community's technical conservation measures regulation 3094/86. The measures which the Council agreed were primarily designed to reduce the catches of immature fish to secure better conservation of fish stocks and to control strictly the use of drift nets. The measures will come into effect on 1 June 1992.

In the North sea and west of Scotland areas there will be an increase in the minimum mesh size from 90 mm to 100 mm diamond mesh. Additionally, all EC fishermen may use a 90 mm square mesh panel; the acceptance by the Community of the value of such a panel, which we introduced unilaterally this summer, for the benefit of the conservation of fish stocks is very welcome. Further, new net design specifications which we worked out with the industry will be introduced to prevent the ballooning of nets and so improve selectivity.

These changes in mesh size and new net design are major steps forward in the conservation of cod and haddock stocks which are of great importance to this country but currently at a low ebb.

A derogation from the 100 mm mesh provision will permit the use of 90 mm diamond mesh only in respect of a directed whiting fishery for which there must be a minimum percentage of 50 per cent. whiting and a maximum percentage of 10 per cent. cod, haddock and saithe. The details will be subject to review in the first half of next year in the light of trials being conducted this year.

In the Irish sea we achieved the increase in mesh size from 70 mm to 80 mm which we and our industry have been pressing for and which should lead to better conservation.

In the North sea the derogation provisions in respect of sole are to be rationalised to allow vessels to use 80 mm mesh all year round south of 55°N with a minimum percentage of sole of 5 per cent. and no than 10 per cent. cod, haddock or saithe. This should ease enforcement and the introduction of a minimum percentage of sole, which previously did not apply to the large beam trawls, should also assist conservation.

There will be a uniform mesh size of 40 mm, instead of the 16 or 32 mm requirement, for fishing for the pelagic species of herring, mackerel, horse mackerel, blue whiting, pilchard and squid. Associated with this mesh size will be a minimum percentage of 50 per cent. for any one of these species or a minimum cumulative percentage of 80 per cent. of a mixture of these species. The maximum percentage of other protected species will be 10 per cent.

In order to reduce the waste of fish by discarding, it will be prohibited for vessels using purse seines or towed gear to carry automatic sorting equipment on when fishing for mackerel, herring and horse mackerel. This rule will not apply to freezer vessels but the sorting equipment on such vessels will have to be installed and used under strictly controlled rules.

There will be a number of changes in minimum landing sizes of fish. These will include whiting reduced from 27 cm to 23 cm in line with the new directed fishery, 20 cm introduced for mackerel (except 30 cm in the north sea), 15 cm for horse mackerel and 110 mm for scallops (Pecten spp.) in ICES division VIId. It will be permitted to land only entire scallops and not parts, which is designed to prevent the landing of undersized scallops.

We rejected the proposal put to the Council that there would be an automatic increase in mesh sizes in 1995. The Council will instead consider a proposal in due time from the Co mmission, to be made if scientific analysis confirms that stocks have not been restored, to increase mesh sizes from 100 mm to 110 mm in the North sea and west of Scotland and from 65 mm to 80 mm in the region from the bay of Biscay southwards from 1 January 1995.

A number of other changes to rationalise the very detailed technical conservation measures regulation and to upgrade conservation aspects were also in the final package.

Most importantly the Council agreed, in response to the United Nations Resolution on large-scale drift nets, that Community vessels should not be able to use drift nets longer than 2·5 kilometres wherever they fish. The only exception to this will be those vessels which have been fishing in the north-east Atlantic tuna fishery for two years or more. No United Kingdom vessel meets this qualification. Qualifying vessels may, until 31 December 1993, use up to 5 km of net which is less than the nets of up to 8 or 10 km which have been in use. The nets are to be submerged 2 metres in depth to help avoid the catch of dolphins and porpoises. The fishery will be closely monitored throughout and in 1993 the data obtained will be reviewed. Unless it is shown that the fishery is not environmentally damaging the derogation will cease at the end of 1993. This important decision means there can be no development of large scale drift netting by European Community vessels anywhere in the world.

There are a few elements in the package which we fought strongly against, in particular the whiting derogation and reduction in the minimum landing size for whiting. However, the Government believe that it would have been wrong to oppose what is otherwise a very good package, which incorporates gains which we have sought for two years.

We have secured a substantive and positive basis on which to work for the recovery and stability of fish stocks for the longer-term benefit of the fishing industry.

Low-fat Milk

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what answer he has made to the recent reasoned opinion from the European Commission about low-fat milk.

Mr. Gummer: In its reasoned opinion the Commission asserts that the exclusive purchasing rights granted to the milk marketing boards under Community legislation extend to whole milk only. It takes the view that the actions undertaken by the milk marketing boards to assert exclusive purchasing rights over low-fat milk, and the extension of the three Scottish milk marketing schemes in 1982 and 1984 to cover low-fat milk are contrary to Community law. It also states that the United Kingdom Government have failed in their obligation to ensure that the boards comply with Community requirements.

We are today informing the Commission that the Government consider that skimmed and semi-skimmed milk should be regarded as falling within the exclusive purchasing powers of the boards. We therefore do not accept that we are in breach of our obligations under the EC treaty or Community law.

Our response to the reasoned opinion in no way reduces the need for progress to be made on ending the milk marketing boards' present statutory monopoly. The need for change is as great as ever and we are looking to the boards to advance rapidly towards voluntary co-operative status. I shall therefore be urging the milk marketing board for England and Wales to complete its current proposals.

SCOTLAND

Examination Costs

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the estimated cost of presenting a pupil for an SCE standard grade exam.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Scottish Examination Board's charge for each examination presentation in 1991 was £15·68.

Infant Mortality Statistics (Cot Deaths)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what is the total infant mortality rate for Scotland;

(2) what is the infant mortality rate attributed to respiratory disorders up to one year old in Scotland;

(3) what is the sudden infant death syndrome rate of death per 1,000 live births in Scotland;

(4) what the incidence of cot deaths each year since 1969 was in Scotland;

(5) what are the cot death rates for Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The terms sudden infant death syndrome and cot death are synonymous. I have therefore grouped the questions together and the answers are given in order.

Sudden infant death syndrome was first defined in 1969, but until 1979 there was no specific code under the World Health Organisation international classification of diseases to which to allocate such deaths. Before sudden infant death syndrome became an accepted term for use on death certificates, many cot deaths would have been assigned to "bronchopneumonia", "accidential suffocation in the cot" or "regurgitation and inhalation of milk". It is therefore not possible, with any certainty, to provide numbers or rates of sudden infant deaths in Scotland prior to 1979.

1. The infant mortality rate in Scotland in 1990 was 7·7 deaths per 1,000 live births, the lowest figure ever recorded.
2. The infant mortality rate attributed to respiratory disorders (ICD* Nos 450-519, 769 and 770) in Scotland in 1990 was 1·5 deaths per 1,000 live births.
3. The sudden infant death syndrome rate of death in Scotland in 1990 was 1·9 deaths per 1,000 live births.
4. The numbers of sudden infant deaths in Scotland since 1979 are as follows:

	Male	Female	Total
1979	66	51	117
1980	72	58	130
1981	95	59	154

	Male	Female	Total
1982	89	55	144

1988	75	57	132
1989	83	55	138
1990	83	45	128

5. The sudden infant death rates per 1,000 live births in Scotland since 1979 are as follows:

	Male	Female	Total
1979	1·9	1·5	1·7
1980	2·0	1·7	1·9
1981	2·7	1·7	2·2

Housing

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will set out the number of (a) housing starts and (b) housing completions carried out in the private housing sector in (i) Edinburgh, (ii) Dundee, (iii) Glasgow and (iv) Aberdeen districts in each year from 1974-75;

(2) what was the number of (a) housing starts and (b) housing completions carried out in the non-council public sector in (i) Edinburgh, (ii) Dundee, (iii) Glasgow and (iv) Aberdeen districts in each year from 1974-75;

(3) what was the number of (a) housing starts and (b) housing completions carried out by (i) Edinburgh, (ii) Dundee, (iii) Glasgow and (iv) Aberdeen district councils in each year from 1974-75.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The available information, as supplied by the relevant housing authorities and agencies, is set out in the following tables.

[1] Scottish Homes/SSHA and Government Departments except for years 1975 to 1978 which consists of SSHA only.
[2] Returns outstanding for Scottish Homes.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the amount of expenditure directly provided by central Government in respect of local authority housing to (a) Edinburgh, (b) Dundee, (c) Glasgow and (d) Aberdeen district councils for each year since 1974-75 and in (i) cash and (ii) 1991-92 prices.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The amounts of housing support grant paid to the four local authorities referred to are shown in the tables. Before 1979-80, Exchequer support for local authority housing was provided under a variety of schemes, the details of which could not be provided except at disproportionate cost. The tables exclude subsidy paid to local authorities in respect of rent rebates.

Parents Charter

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) which parts of the parents charter in Scotland would require legislation if it were to be enforced;

(2) whether independent schools in Scotland will be required to comply with the parents charter.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Education (Schools) Bill, introduced in Parliament today, provides my right hon. Friend with powers to make regulations to implement elements of the parents charter including information about schools and about progress of pupils.

My right hon. Friend will consider in due course the scope and extent of the matters on which he should prescribe under these and other powers to give effect to the commitments in the parents charter, including the requirements to be placed on independent schools.

School Report Cards

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which parents' organisations and other bodies are being consulted on the new report card.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Scottish Office Education Department working paper No. 11 "Reporting 5-14" has been distributed to a variety of bodies and individuals including the following:

Education authorities for distribution to schools and School Boards; Colleges of Education; Scottish Council for Independent Schools; Convention of Scottish Local Authorities; Teacher Bodies; Scottish Parent Teacher Association; Lothian Parents Federation; Lothian Parents Action Group; Strathclyde Parents Federation; Education Alert; Scottish Council for Research in Education; Scottish Consultative Council on the Curriculum.

Vocational Courses

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland under what circumstances regional councils will be able to provide vocational courses, under the Government's further education proposals.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Further and Higher Education (Scotland) Bill provides for the Secretary of State to have a duty to secure in Scotland adequate and efficient provision of further education. Further education as defined in clause 6 of the Bill includes a programme of learning which prepares a person for a vocational qualification. Clause 2 removes from education authorities the duty of providing for their areas further education within the meaning of the Bill. It gives education authorities power to provide such further education. It will be for education authorities to determine in what circumstances they exercise that power, including the power to provide courses which prepare a person for a vocational qualification.

Higher Education

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what criteria will be applied when judging whether Robert Gordon Institute of Technology, Paisley College and Dundee Institute of Technology should have university status under the Government's higher education proposals.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The proposed criteria are set out in the consultation document on degree awarding powers and university title which was issued on Thursday 31 October and to which responses have been invited by 2 December 1991. A copy of the consultation paper is available in the Library.

Departmental Land Holdings

Mr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the hectarage, number of holdings and numbers of tenants of agricultural land owned by his Ministry in each region in Scotland in (a) 1980 and (b) 1990.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information relating to agricultural land owned by the Secretary of State is set out in table 1. The Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department has provided information relating to the Highland Estates for 1983 and 1990. Prior to 1983 the detail was not held in the format requested. In the case of the lowland estates records were never held in that format. Consequently the information in respect of the lowland estates is presented in summary form.

Relevant information provided by the Forestry Commission is presented in summary form separately in table 2.

[1] This includes crofting tenancies.

Note: The total area of agricultural land managed by the Forestry Commission at 30 March 1990 was about 104,000 hectares.

Forestry

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures the Government are taking to encourage the planting of new forests close to towns and cities.

Mr. Lang: It is an important part of our forestry policy to encourage the creation of new woodlands close to areas of population. We have therefore decided to introduce a community woodland supplement, of £950 per hectare, as a top-up grant under the woodland grant scheme, which will be available for planting near to towns and cities.

I am sure that this initiative will be welcomed. It will provide a substantial boost to community woodland projects throughout Britain. The Forestry Commission will be publishing details of the arrangements for administering this supplement later this year.

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Government will make a statement on forestry policy.

Mr. Lang: In our response last year to the Agriculture Committee's report on land use and forestry, we said that we would consider whether there would be benefit in drawing the various strands of forestry policy together into a single statement. We have now decided that there would be advantage in making such a statement available, and a composite summary of our current forestry policy has been published by the Forestry Commission. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

Cash Limits

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he proposes to make any changes to the cash limits for 1991-92 within his responsibility.

Mr. Lang: Yes. Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate:

(a) the cash limit for class XV, vote 3: Training programmes, roads and transport, and industrial support, Scotland will be increased by £23,036,000 from £605,682,000 to £628,718,000. This increase takes account of the £15,000,000 increase in provision for Scottish Enterprise announced by the Prime Minister on 10 May 1991; the final reallocation of £4,921,000 in respect of the transfer of the roads and transport programme from the Scottish Office Environment Department to the Scottish Office Industry Department; also takes account of increased provision of £4,708,000 for Scottish Enterprise and £292,000 for Highlands and Islands Enterprise in respect of Scotland's share of the increased provision for adult training announced by the Secretary of State for Employment on 19 June 1991 after account has been taken of £3,100,000 of residual expenditure incurred by the Department of Employment in respect of training programmes in Scotland; and to take up the £1,215,000 capital end-year flexibility entitlement announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 17 July 1991, at columns 186-90.

(b) the cash limit for class XV, vote 5: Roads, transport and environmental services, Scotland will be reduced by £3,881,000 from £133,443,000 to £129,562,000. This reduction comprises two changes. First, the cash limit will be increased by £1,040,000 to reflect the full take-up of capital end-year flexibility entitlement and part of the end-year flexibility entitlement for running costs of £984,000. Secondly, the cash limit will be reduced by £4,921,000 in respect of the transfer of roads and transport expenditure to class XV, vote 3: Training programmes, roads and transport services and industrial support, Scotland. Running cost provision will increase by £123,000 from this vote which forms part of the Scottish Office running cost limit.

(c) the cash limit for class XV, vote 13: Law, Order, Miscellaneous Health and Social Work Services, Scotland will be increased by £1,700,000 from £211,764,000 to £213,464,000. This reflects the take-up of full capital end-year flexibility entitlement of £1,075,000 and £495,000 of the running cost entitlement. Provision is also included to cover the costs arising from the Orkney judicial inquiry, for social work offender services and to take account of a transfer of provision from class VI, vote 1 and class XV, vote 26 to cover the costs of grants to voluntary health services bodies.

(d) the cash limit for class XV, vote 21: Revenue and rate support grants, Scotland will be increased by £170,000 from £2,692,607,000 to £2,692,777,000. This increase is required in respect of expenditure to be incurred by local authorities and the Inland Revenue Valuation Office this year in carrying out the valuation of domestic properties in Scotland for the purposes of the proposed council tax.

(e) the cash limit for class XV, vote 26: Hospital, community health, family health (part) and other health services, Scotland will be increased by £23,083,000 from £2,332,404,000 to £2,355,487,000 mainly for the costs of the increase in VAT, announced on 19 March; for full take-up of capital end-year flexibility entitlement of £10,068,000 and to meet the legal expenses of haemophiliacs with HIV.

(f) as a result of the increase on class XV, vote 5 to provide additional management and works services and the take-up of end-year flexibility arrangements in respect of running costs expenditure on that vote and class XV, votes 13 and 20, the running costs limit for the Scottish Office will be increased by £1,084,000 from £260,072,000 to £261,156,000.

(g) in addition the cash block SO/LA1, which covers non-housing capital expenditure by local authorities, will be increased by £8,763,000 from £542,887,000 to £551,650,000. An increase of £8,900,000 in respect of the end-year flexibility arrangements for capital expenditure was announced on 17 July. Since the July announcement, a further increase of £4,363,000 has been agreed. This will be offset by a reduction of £4,500,000 to offset increases in non-cash limited votes.

(h) the non-voted cash limit, SO/LA2, which covers net allocation to local authorities on new town capital expenditure, will be increased by £561,000 from £342,935,000 to £343,496,000. This increase results from take-up in full of end-year flexibility entitlement as announced on 17 July.

The increases are within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

Gourock Ropeworks

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement concerning the circumstances surrounding the sale of the Gourock Ropeworks, Port Glasgow.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 5 November 1991:] My right hon. Friend understands that Chatom Investments Ltd. may now have concluded missives for the acquisition of the ropeworks. He continues to hope that a new use can be found for this category A listed building.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 5 November 1991]: The running costs of the Scottish Office information directorate for each year from 1985-86 are as follows:

Year	£m
1985-86	0·9
1986-87	1·0
1987-88	1·1
1988-89	1·2
1989-90	1·4
1990-91	1·7
1991-92	1·9

Budget proposals for 1992-93 have not yet been finalised. These figures exclude expenditure on information campaigns. Directly comparable figures for years prior to the introduction of new Scottish Office budgetary arrangements in 1985-86 are not available.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by (a) the Scottish Office, (b) the Scottish Development Agency and (c) the Forestry Commission during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (i) the topic, (ii) the commencement date, (iii) the duration and (iv) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 5 November 1991]: Information television campaigns undertaken by the Scottish Office to date and those planned to be carried out in the current financial year are:

Road Safety: 8-21 April, 6-19 May, 3-16 June, 2-29 September; Faulds Advertising, Edinburgh.

School Boards: 19 August-27 September; Faulds Advertising.

Crime Prevention: 7 October-3 November, Faulds Advertising.

Rent to Mortgage: 14 October-4 November, The Leith Agency, Edinburgh.

Fire Prevention: January-February 1992, Faulds Advertising.

There have been no other campaigns costing more than £100,000 carried out and none are planned.

The Forestry Commission has carried out no television campaigns.

The only publicity campaign costing more than £100,000 carried out by the Commission was:

Promotion of the Woodland Grant Scheme: 4 June—continuing; Hall Advertising, Edinburgh and Brown Associated, Edinburgh.

Expenditure on television advertising and other publicity is an operational matter for the Scottish Development Agency's successor body, Scottish Enterprise, and its local enterprise companies. I understand, however, that Scottish Enterprise has no plans for television advertising this financial year.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 5 November 1991]: Estimates for 1991-92 are television advertising £339,000, radio advertising £86,000, newspaper advertising £476,000 and other promotional material £364,000.

For 1988-89 to 1990-91, the figures were:

	1988-89 £	1989-90 £	1990-91 £
TV Advertising	576,000	974,000	741,000
Radio Advertising	40,000	85,000	188,000
Newspaper Advertising	378,000	1,022,000	613,000
Other Promotional Material	933,000	1,001,000	1,098,000

For 1979-88 an analysis in the form requested is not available.

Total expenditure on information publicity was:

1979-80	263,000
1980-81	362,000
1981-82	393,000
1982-83	386,000
1983-84	360,000
1984-85	704,000
1985-86	677,000
1986-87	857,000
1987-88	1,094,000

The budget for 1992-93 has not yet been finalised.

The above figures do not include the running costs of the Scottish Office information directorate.

HIV

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many non-haemophiliacs in Scotland have contracted HIV infection as a result of contaminated NHS blood/tissue transfers; and how many of those became infected before the introduction of the screening of donations in October 1985.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 5 November 1991]: As at 31 October there were 11 reported cases. It is not possible from the information currently available to identify when these cases became infected.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the amount paid from public funds to individuals of groups who have prepared or are in the course of preparation of proposals to set up national health trusts in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 5 November 1991]: Resources have been made available to all health boards to implement NHS reforms. These moneys are additional to the allocations which are provided to health boards for patient care which, over the past 12 years, have increased by approximately 40 per cent. in real terms.

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 11 July.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 5 November 1991]: I shall place a list of surveys in the Library as soon as possible.

HEALTH

Hospital Consultants

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the average waiting times for a first appointment with a hospital consultant in England and Wales in (a) ophthalmology, (b) ear, nose and throat and (c) adult orthopaedics; and what are the shortest and longest waiting times respectively in each of these three specialties.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not collected centrally.

Newmarket Hospital

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what estimate he has made, or received from the regional health authority, about the costs of re-providing at West Suffolk and Addenbrookes hospitals the facilities that will be closed at Newmarket hospital in the event that the latter is run down to community status;

(2) what information he has received from the East Anglian regional health authority about its plans to continue Newmarket hospital as a general hospital for three years after any decision is taken on the authority's proposals to downgrade it to community status.

Mr. Dorrell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will announce his decision about the future of Newmarket hospital as soon as possible.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was spent on Newmarket hospital in each of the past five years; and what are the projected sums he has budgeted to spend over the next three years, irrespective of any decision he may take on its future status.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not collected centrally.

Bio Products Laboratory

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many units of BSM factor VIII were sold by the Bio Products Laboratory to United Kingdom hospitals before 31 March.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is commercially confidential.

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Health who will audit the Bio Products Laboratory from 1 April; and under what accounting standard this audit will take place.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: From 1 April 1991 the Central Blood Laboratories Authority and the other health authorities will be audited by the Audit Commission. The audits are conducted in accordance with the code of audit practice for local authorities and the national health service in England and Wales dated November 1990.

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Health under what requirements the Bio Products Laboratory now lies in respect of the publication of annual accounts.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Bio Products Laboratory is not required to publish annual accounts separately from the Central Blood Laboratories Authority, which publishes an annual report covering its activities as a whole.

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether all Bio Products Laboratory products deemed to have licences have been subject to the full product licence fee of £130,000 per product payable on the product licence application to the Medicines Control Agency.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Bio Products Laboratory is required to pay a licence fee appropriate to each of its applications for product licences made under the Medicines Act. Details of the fees paid by the Bio Products Laboratory as with any other pharmaceutical company are confidential between the Medicines Control Agency and the applicant.

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what differences exist between the terms, including conditions of confidentiality, on which (a) the Bio Products Laboratory and other state institutions and (b) commercial pharmaceutical companies compete in respect of tendering;

(2) if he will give details of all contracts or agreements for plasma products including factor VIII, Albumin and IVGG made for 1991-92 by the Bio Products Laboratory with regional health authorities which were not subject to general tenders to the commercial pharmaceutical industry.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The purchase of blood products is a matter for provider units and health authorities. We are not aware of any differences in the terms on which the Bio Products Laboratory and commercial suppliers compete for the supply of such products to national health service purchasers; nor are we aware of any contracts or agreements made by the Bio Products Laboratory in 1991-92 which were not subject to tender to commercial suppliers.

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Health who is now responsible for funding any losses made by the Bio Products Laboratory over a financial year.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Central Blood Laboratories Authority, of which Bio Products Laboratory is part, is required to stay within the cash limit set by the Department and funded from class XIII, vote 1.

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Health under what legal status the Bio Products Laboratory has been trading since 1 April.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Bio Products Laboratory is an integral part of the Central Blood Laboratories Authority, a special health authority set up in December 1982. The legal status of that body as a special health authority has not changed.

Cot Deaths

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to facilitate the development of an agreed autopsy protocol for the cot death.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The formulation and adoption of an autopsy protocol for cot death will be for health authorities to determine as part of their involvement in the confidential inquiry into stillbirths and deaths in infancy.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the recommendation to mothers on whether to lie babies down to sleep on back, front or side in the "Pregnancy Book" issued to all mothers (a) in the version issued in 1990, (b) as revised in 1991, (c) as reprinted in 1991 and (d) as intended now; and how many copies of it were printed for distribution.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 5 November 1991]: Advice to pregnant women and mothers contained in the Health Education Authority's "Pregnancy Book" and "Birth To Five" on the recommended sleeping position of babies has been changed once in 1990. Prior to that, the advice was that for the first two months or so babies should sleep on their fronts. This was in accordance with the then commonly held clinical view that not to do so could increase the risk of inhalation of vomit, especially in those babies who were vulnerable or sick.

At the time the text of these books was revised in 1990, the advice was changed to reflect the evidence that was then emerging that the prone sleeping position might have been a risk factor in cot death. On the basis of the evidence at that time, no one type of sleeping position for babies could be recommended. In versions of the booklets reprinted earlier in 1991 this advice continued to be current, although the opportunity was taken to remove photographs of babies lying on their fronts.

Following the chief medical officer's advice last week that babies should no longer be laid down to sleep on their fronts except on medical advice, the authority has taken immediate steps to notify health education units and prevent them from distributing further copies of both books. Urgent steps are being taken to revise the advice in the booklets.

Altogether, approximately half a million copies each of the "Pregnancy Book" and "Birth to Five" are issued to first-time pregnant women and parents each year.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is Government policy on the training of health care workers to deal with cot death;

(2) what steps he is taking to inform health care professionals, doctors, midwives, and maternity homes of how to advise mothers on avoiding cot deaths;

(3) what television advertising his Department intends or has carried out on cot deaths;

(4) how he intends to communicate his advice that young babies should be laid on their backs to (a) health care professionals, (b) the public generally and (c) mothers.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 5 November 1991]: Although the underlying causes remain unexplained, as the advice issued by the chief medical officer last week made clear, it is possible to reduce the risk of cot death. Sleeping position is only one factor associated with cot death. Other known risks to be avoided are cigarette smoking, overheating a baby and not acting promptly by seeking professional advice when a baby appears unwell.

Whilst non-breast feeding has been identified as a factor in cot deaths in New Zealand, it has not been identified as a risk factor in the United Kingdom. The Department's advice on the known benefits of breastfeeding remains unchanged.

The chief medical officer's press announcement last week and the media coverage following that, has alerted the public to the new advice relating to sleeping position. The chief medical officer and chief nursing officer will be writing to doctors and to other health care professionals shortly with more detailed advice to guide them in their advice to parents. We would expect the statutory and professional bodies to incorporate the new advice into their curricula straightaway.

In addition, the text of the two books published by the Health Education Authority and distributed to first-time pregnant women and parents, the "Pregnancy Book" and "Birth To Five", is being amended to reflect the new advice. We are considering urgently whether further steps are needed to ensure that the new advice is available to parents of young babies.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which parts of the confidential inquiry into stillbirths and deaths in infancy are relevant to cot death; and who has devised these.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will shortly be setting up a national advisory body to advise on which aspects of stillbirths and deaths in infancy should be examined in the confidential inquiry into stillbirths and deaths in infancy.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of infant deaths are given a proper paediatric post-mortem by someone trained as a paediatric pathologist to recognise cot death.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reasons the confidential inquiry into stillbirths and deaths in infancy was established.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This inquiry is being established on a nationwide basis to examine in detail the circumstances of selected stillbirths and deaths in infancy. This is the first such inquiry worldwide. With increased knowledge of the reason why babies die, health care professionals and others will be better able to prevent these tragic events.

Liver Transplants

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list the contracts between King's College hospital, London, and St. Mary's hospital, London, for liver transplantation with non-United Kingdom residents;

(2) if he will give to date the number of private liver transplants undertaken at King's College hospital, London, and St. Mary's hospital, London.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not held centrally. The management of King's College hospital is the responsibility of Camberwell health authority and the management of St. Mary's hospital is the responsibility of Parkside health authority. The hon. Member may wish to write to Sir Derek Boorman, the chairman of Camberwell health authority, and Mr. Michael Hatfield, chairman of Parkside health authority, for details.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give to date the number of national health service patients in whom it has not been possible to perform a liver transplant due to lack of intensive care facilities, and in which the liver subsequently went to a private non-United Kingdom resident.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not collected centrally.

Paediatric Pathologists

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the Government's policy on conducting paediatric post-mortems and funding them.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government required regional health authorities to have at least one paediatric pathologist in post by 31 March 1991 and to conduct a review of the need for further posts by 1992. The conduct of paediatric post-mortems is a matter for professional judgment and there are no special arrangements in place for funding them.

Blood Plasma

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether any voluntary donated blood plasma collected in the United Kingdom is used other than to produce plasma fractions or finished products which are used solely for patients in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Our aim is to collect from our unpaid voluntary donors sufficient blood and plasma to meet national requirements for blood products. Not all the products derived from blood and plasma are in equal demand and a surplus of a particular fraction may arise from time to time. Those products which are genuinely surplus to our own needs may then be exported to EC or other countries which may not be self-sufficient in that particular fraction.

Women's Hospital, Liverpool

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what impact the proposed new women's hospital in Liverpool will have on services for women; how much of the expenditure earmarked for the hospital will be used for security and road alterations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: Obstetric and gynaecology services are presently scattered across the city and will be provided on a single site in modern, well-equipped accommodation. The balance of expenditure on new facilities and infrastructure such as security and road alterations is a matter for Liverpool health authority.

Correspondence

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to reply to the letter of 29 October from the hon. Member for Nottingham, North, regarding Mr. L. Lowe and the Queen's Medical Centre hospital, Nottingham.

Mr. Dorrell: A reply will be sent shortly.

Nottingham DHA

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will specify the waiting list for the City, Highbury, General and Queen's Medical Centre hospitals, Nottingham, in each of the specialties for which figures are held centrally for each of the years since 1987.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not collected centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. D. H. White, the chairman of Nottingham health authority, for details.

AIDS and Breast Cancer

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money the Government have put into AIDS and breast cancer research and publicity.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Government expenditure on AIDS research in 1990-91 totalled £20·4 million. In the same year £10·0 million was spent on publicity on AIDS. In the present financial year, 1991-92, the estimated Government expenditure is £22·5 million on AIDS research and £11·3 million on publicity on AIDS. Government spending on research into breast cancer in 1990-91 amounted to £3·0 million. The estimated figure for research in 1991-92 is not yet available. Information on the levels of expenditure on publicity about breast cancer and the breast cancer screening programme is not separately identifiable. The Health Education Authority, the Department of Health and the NHS breast cancer screening programme include advice and information about breast cancer in a range of publications giving general advice on health matters.

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to revise the amount of money his Department spends on AIDS; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The amount of money available for spending on AIDS and HIV is kept under constant review.

London Health Service

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the recently announced survey of the health service in London will include consideration of hospital provision in the London borough of Havering.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Sir Bernard Tomlinson, was appointed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to advise him on the development of London health services. He has been given a wide-ranging remit to look at the provision of health care, the organisation and provision of undergraduate medical teaching, post-graduate medical education and research and development. Although we expect him to focus mainly on central London, there may well be issues with wider implications where it is appropriate for him to include outer London in his consideration.

Cash Limits

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether any changes will be made to the cash limits and running cost limits of his Department in 1991-92.

Mr. Waldegrave: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimates, the following changes will be made:

The cash limit for class XIII, vote 1—Hospital, community health, family health services (part) and related services, England—will increase by £110,667,000, from £16,410,032,000 to £16,520,699,000. This increase covers additions of £100,841,000 for health authorities and other bodies for the increase in VAT announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 19 March 1991; £31,480,000 for the take-up of entitlement to carry-over underspends under the end-year flexibility arrangements, as announced by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 17 July 1991 and transfers from class XIII, vote 3 of £3,000,000 for construction of a building for orthotists and prosthetists and £500,000 for drug misuse publicity. These increases are partly offset by a reduction of £19,678,000 reflecting an increase in the NHS trusts' aggregate external financing limit, and transfers to class XIII, vote 3 of £4,679,000 for the NHS estates agency and £600,000 for the clinical standards advisory group, and to class XVI, vote 8 of £197,000 for an incentive bonus schemes policy group.

The cash limits for class XIII, vote 3—Department of Health, administration, miscellaneous health services and personal social services, England—will be increased by £6,960,000, from £726,469,000 to £733,429,000. This increase provides an additional £4,713,000 for litigation costs of haemophiliacs infected with HIV; £531,000 for the increase on VAT as mentioned above; £4,679,000 from class XIII, vote 1 for the NHS estates agency and £600,000 for the clinical standards advisory group; £91,000 from class XIV, vote 3 for an increase in petrol tax allowance and for replacement vehicles; £75,000 from class II, vote 5 for a contribution to the International Peto Institute; and £69,000 from class XIV, vote 4 for the low income scheme and computer equipment. These increases are partly offset by the transfers to class XIII, vote 1 mentioned above; £127,000 to class XI, vote 2 for conversion of social work training courses. Also as a consequence of the excess on the departmental running cost limit in 1990-91 a further reduction of £171,000 is being made.

The provision for running costs on class XIII, vote 3 and the Department's running cost limit is increased by £29,000 from £252,892,000 to £252,921,000. The increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement today.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many of the second wave of hospital trusts announced by him have indicated that they have made provision for a nurse to be on the board of the trust; and if he will list those that have not;

(2) if he will list those existing hospital trusts which do not have a nurse on the board of the trust.

Mr. Dorrell: All NHS trusts providing patient services, apart from ambulance and other transport services, are required to have a registered nurse or midwife as an executive director on their board.

Dietary Sugars

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to ensure that the recommendations of the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy report "Dietary Sugars and Human Disease" (1989) are implemented.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave her on 30 January at column 529. Work continues on all fronts mentioned.

In July this year the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy published its report "Dietary Reference Values for Food Energy and Nutrients for the UK", in which it fully endorsed the findings in the 1989 report; a copy is available in the Library. It advised that the population's average intake of non-milk extrinsic sugars should not exceed about 60 g per day or 10 per cent. of total dietary energy. The Health Education Authority is now working in close co-operation with officials of the Department of Health and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to translate this advice into further nutrition education material.

Stillbirths

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what will be (a) the initial costs and (b) the annual running costs of confidential inquiries into stillbirths and infant deaths in England; and what additional funds he is making available to (i) the Department of Health, (ii) the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, (iii) regional health authorities and (iv) district health authorities to (a) set up and (b) run the inquiries.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 5 November 1991]: Initial costs in regions of setting up epidemiological surveys of stillbirths and infant deaths and of recruiting additional perinatal pathologists are already being met from current allocations. Details of further expenditure are under consideration. As the confidential inquiry will be part of the NHS reforms audit initiative, regions will be eligible to seek funds which have been especially assigned to clinical audit. The total amount available for all clinical audit work will be around £40 million in 1992-93.

Health Service Staff

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each national health service region the number of male doctors and the number of female doctors (a) in general practice, (b) who are consultants and (c) other than consultants who work in hospitals.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 5 November 1991]: The information requested is given in the tables.

ENVIRONMENT

Drought Orders

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many drought orders his Department has granted in each year since 1979; and how many of these involved varying the conditions of abstraction.

Mr. Baldry: The Secretary of State for the Environment has made the following numbers of drought orders:

	Numbers
1980	2
1981	nil
1982	13
1983	5
1984	92
1985	nil
1986	nil
1987	nil
1988	1
1989	74
1990	65
[1]1991	24

[1] To date.

Most of these involve a temporary variation in the conditions governing the abstraction of water, but only a detailed review of all 276 statutory instruments could give a precise figure: this would involve disproportionate effort.

Refugees

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to assist local authorities with the cost of housing refugees; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The cost of housing refugees and other commitments are taken into account in authorities' housing investment programme allocations.

The Asylum Bill, which was published on 1 November, contains measures which will modify the duties on local authorities and ease housing pressures.

Council Housing (Unauthorised Occupation)

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence he has received about the extent of unauthorised occupation of local authority housing in Greater London; and what action he plans to take.

Mr. Yeo: Investigations into levels of unauthorised occupation are being undertaken by a number of London authorities, and my Department is taking a close interest in the findings as they emerge. The Government have taken a number of steps which encourage the reduction of unauthorised occupation. These include the financial discipline of the ring-fenced housing revenue account, the incentive in HRA subsidy rules to minimise voids, and the requirement to publish performance indicators. My Department is also funding research which will provide authorities with models of good practice to prevent such activity in the first place. The primary responsibility for tackling the problem must rest, however, with the owners and managers of the housing—the local authorities themselves.

Council Housing

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will authorise district councils to use funds accumulated from the sale of property to build houses and flats for sale or rent to the local community.

Mr. Yeo: Our general policy is to encourage the private sector, including housing associations, rather than local authorities to be the providers of new houses and flats. Local authorities are free to use 25 per cent. of the receipts from the sale of council dwellings to assist this process in various ways, including sponsoring housing association developments.

Animals and Birds (Imports)

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what action he intends to take, following the advice of the Joint Nature Conservation Committee, to reduce the number of ports of entry through which live animals and birds may enter the United Kingdom;

(2) what action he intends to take in the light of recent advice from the Joint Nature Conservation Committee to introduce a levy on the import of wild birds and animals.

Mr. Baldry: The Joint Nature Conservation Committee's report on the wildlife trade makes a number of wide-ranging recommendations, including those concerning a levy and further restrictions on ports of entry. Because these are not issues which affect the United Kingdom alone, we have drawn the report to the attention of the European Commission and urged it to propose stricter controls throughout the European Community. We expect the Commission to publish proposals for a new regulation on the wildlife trade very soon. In subsequent discussions we shall take full account of the committee's advice.

Water Quality

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to issue guidance to local authorities on the planning considerations associated with the water companies' investment to improve the quality of bathing and drinking water; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Wales have today published Circular 17/91—Department of the Environment—and Circular 62/91—Welsh Office. This gives guidance on the planning implications for local authorities of substantial investment by the water industry to improve the quality of bathing waters, to find alternative disposal means for sewage sludge at present disposed of at sea, and to improve the quality of drinking water.

The circular stresses the strict deadlines for improving the quality of bathing and drinking waters, and emphasises local planning authorities' responsibility to work with the water industry to find suitable sites for sewage treatment works and to handle planning applications without delay. It also reminds authorities of the need to allocate sites for sewage treatment works, where appropriate, when preparing or reviewing development plans. And it advises water companies to consider the need for environmental assessment of their proposals at the earliest possible stage.

Homelessness

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what initiatives his Department has taken over the last six months to reduce the number of homeless people.

Sir George Young [holding answer 6 November 1991]: On 5 June I announced that selected housing associations would be invited to bid for grants to run pilot schemes as managing agents for private owners, to encourage landlords to let their empty properties to homeless people. The first homes made available through this initiative were let in October. Also in October I announced a new scheme to bring empty flats over shops back into use. Local authorities will shortly be invited to bid for a share of the £25 million to be made available. Accommodation created through this initiative will help to relieve homelessness pressures in many hard-pressed urban areas.

Under the Department's new initiative with the Council of Mortgage Lenders, announced on 5 November, repossessed properties will be passed to housing associations for temporary letting to homeless families nominated by local authorities. This will bring empty properties back into use, provide homes for families, restore confidence in the market and help mortgage lenders.

These initiatives are additional to our £300 million homelessness allocation to local authorities and housing associations in London and the south-east, which will provide 16,000 permanent homes for homeless families. Work is also progressing on the Department's £96 million initiative to combat rough sleeping in central London. A total of 489 additional hostel places, 530 places in housing leased from private owners and 250 places in permanent housing have been made available this year for rough sleepers. By the end of 1993-94, the total of additional permanent housing generated by this initiative will reach 1,800 places.

West Country (Development Restrictions)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the towns and villages in Somerset, Dorset, Devon and Cornwall, at which the National Rivers Authority has asked for development restrictions; and if he will make a statement as to the reason for those restrictions.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 6 November 1991]: This detailed information is not held by the Department. We shall be in touch with the National Rivers Authority and I shall write to my hon. Friend.

TRANSPORT

Antares

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the inspector's inquiry into the sinking of the Antares from Carradale has been completed; how much time is required under the Merchant Shipping (Accident Investigation) Regulations for consideration of the report; when the Secretary of State expects to publish the report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The marine accident investigation branch inquiry is complete; the inspector has submitted his findings and recommendations to the chief inspector of marine accidents who is now preparing his report for submission to the Secretary of State for Transport. Before the chief inspector's report can be published, he is required by regulation 9 of the Merchant Shipping (Accident Investigation) Regulations 1989 to give persons whose reputations are likely to be adversely affected, time to consider the text and further time to provide alternative text if agreement cannot be reached. The duration of both prescribed periods are 28 days but experience has shown that the whole consultation period is likely to take a minimum of three months.

In the light of these facts, and with the additional period being required for the printing of the final report, publication is not expected before April 1992.

Transport Police, Scotland

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total number of British Transport Police officers on Scotland's railways for each of the last five years.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information is as follows:

Year	Number of BTP officers
1986	177
1987	176
1988	172
1989	175
1990	191

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the cost to British Rail of funding the British Transport police in Scotland for each of the last five years, expressed in constant terms.

Mr. McLoughlin: I do not have the information in the form requested but the British Transport police have been able to supply costs at 1989-90 prices for the following years:

Year	Cost (£000s)
1990-91	5,192
1989-90	5,241

Disused Railway Lines

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport of which disused railway lines in Scotland, British Rail still owns, (a) the land and (b) the track bed.

Mr. McLoughlin: I do not have the information in the form requested. British Rail owns some 155 miles of disused railway in Scotland which in general comprise a large number of short isolated stretches of which only a very small proportion contains the trackbed.

Rail Line, Cowlairs

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if the railway inspectorate has given approval to the proposed single-line chord at Cowlairs to join the main Glasgow Queen street line with the line to Cumbernauld; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate gave provisional approval to the single line chord on 29 August 1991. This would enable British Rail to install and bring the new line into use pending an inspection. The works started in September on a new bridge, but work cannot commence on the track and signalling alterations until the bridge is finished, in February 1992. The inspectorate will discuss with BR what amendments may be needed to the scheme in the light of this forthcoming inquiry into the Newton accident.

Buses, Wakefield

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many bus companies operate within the Wakefield district; and what is the proportion of tendered bus routes within the district operated by each of these companies.

Mr. McLoughlin: Information about the number of bus companies operating within the Wakefield district could be produced only at disproportionate cost. Information about tendered bus routes within the district is a matter for the West Yorkshire passenger transport executive.

Rail Electrification

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the proportion of (a) Scotland's and (b) the whole of Britain's network which is electrified.

Mr. Freeman: As at 31 March 1991, British Rail had some 1,705 route miles in Scotland, of which some 23 per cent. were electrified or in the process of being electrified by projects approved or under construction. BR had 10,305 route miles in Great Britain, 30 per cent of which were or will be electrified.

Tendered Bus Services

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total public subsidy granted to private companies operating tendered services within west Yorkshire.

Mr. McLoughlin: Subsidies for tendered bus services are a matter for the West Yorkshire passenger transport authority and executive. The executive has budgeted for expenditure of £15·1 million on tendered bus services including school services in 1991-92.

Harbour Revision Orders

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many harbour revision orders have been applied for since 3 August 1988; and if he will give details of the environmental assessment.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department has received 35 applications for harbour revision orders since 3 August 1988, two of which were subsequently withdrawn. Of the remainder, only three involved the authorisationof specific works projects and all three fell within annex II to Council directive 85/337/EEC. In one of these cases—Harwich, Parkeston Quay—the Secretary of State decided after consultation that an environmental assessment was required. The environmental impact statement prepared by the applicant is still being considered, together with representations on the order.

Motor Vehicles

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether he supports the CO standards proposed in the draft EC directive on technical inspection of motor vehicles;

(2) whether he intends the 3·5 per cent. CO standard in the draft EC directive to be extended to roadside spot checks;

(3) what steps he proposes to take to encourage agreement on the draft EC directive on technical inspection of motor vehicles;

(4) what information he has regarding the exhaust emission standards proposed in the draft EC directive on technical inspection of motor vehicles.

Mr. Chope: I refer the hon. Member to the explanatory memorandum on the Commission proposal (7753/91, COM(91) 244), dated 23 September. The in-service CO testing standard proposed by the Commission is 3·5 per cent. for modern conventional petrol-engined cars and light goods vehicles, which is also the current EC prescribed design limit for new engines.

The 4·5 per cent. CO standard which has just been introduced into the MOT test is based on the EC type approval limit, including the 1 per cent. manufacturing tolerance allowed for engines coming off the production line. That standard is realistic for vehicles in service, and brings about a significant reduction in pollution caused by excessive emissions from badly tuned engines. We shall be monitoring the results of emission-checking very closely to help us to make a more informed judgment on the merits of the proposal from the Commission, on which discussion in the EC has not yet started.

The 4·5 per cent. standard applies to petrol-engined cars and light goods vehicles first used after 1 August 1983, and compliance can be enforced at roadside spot checks. There are no immediate plans to apply different standards, but the longer-term intention is to tighten standards further.

Smokemeters

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to develop accurate smoke testing protocols for vehicle testing; if this will apply to roadside spot checks; what assessment he has made of the Bosch smokemeter and Lucas Hartridge diesel exhaust smokemeter for this purpose; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The Government are planning to introduce an instrumented smoke check into the annual roadworthiness test of heavy vehicles next summer. This will replace the current visual check for excessive smoke. Research is currently in progress to help determine the best form of instrumentation and the best method of testing which can also be used for roadside checking. The two instruments to which the hon. Member refers are among those being considered.

Heathrow Airport

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve directional signing at Heathrow airport particularly to the motorways.

Mr. McLoughlin: Directional signing within the airport boundary is the responsibility of Heathrow Airport Limited, and is kept under review by the airport. If my hon. Friend has specific comments on signing at Heathrow, he might want to put them to the airport.

South London Line

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has from British Rail on the safety implications of the cab design fault on the class 456 two-coach trains which do not meet operational requirements for service on the south London line; what action British Rail is taking to rectify the problems; and when the new trains are expected to enter service.

Mr. Freeman: It is imperative that drivers of driver-only-operated trains have a clear and unobstructed view of the TV monitors, or other visual aids, on station platforms. The driver's cab window on class 456 trains was too small for this equipment to be seen clearly from the driving position. The driver's seat was therefore modified to slide sideways to give an acceptable view of the platform equipment. Class 456 trains entered service on 30 September.

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what temporary speed restrictions there are in force on the south London line to the west of Brixton for safety reasons; and when restrictions are expected to be lifted.

Mr. Freeman: Due to the installation of a new junction, a temporary speed restriction has been imposed in the Voltaire road area pending the completion of further track relaying work. The usual line speed of 45 mph has been reduced to 20 mph for a distance of approximately 220 yards. The restriction is expected to be in place until next spring. Also in the vicinity, there is a speed limit of 10 mph in connection with bridge renewal which will operate until 22 November.

A1079 (Market Weighton Exit)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport for what reason his Department has authorised the reopening of the direct exit from Market Weighton on to the Beverley stretch of the A1079; and what representations he has received concerning this matter.

Mr. Chope: The authorisation for a junction with the A1079 at the eastern end of the Market Weighton bypass is contained in the original orders for the scheme. Before the junction is open to traffic its layout will be improved. Written representations have been received from two members of the public in support of the opening of the junction.

M1 (Lane Closures)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will review the closure of lanes in the M1 between junctions 41 and 43 to allow better traffic flow during the current resurfacing works.

Mr. Chope: No. The arrangements were carefully designed to maintain traffic flow in the area and allow work to proceed and, generally, have worked well.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements have been made to allow continued traffic flow during the current resurfacing work on the M1 motorway in West Yorkshire between junctions 41 and 43; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The work on the M1 between junctions 41 and 43 is being carried out in three separate lengths to minimise delays and disruption overall and especially the effect on the important M1/M62 interchange at Lofthouse.

Tidal flow traffic management is in operation on the M1 to provide a minimum of two lanes for the dominant peak hour flows. In the morning this is northbound towards Leeds and in the afternoon southbound towards Wakefield.

Closed-circuit television and recovery vehicles on permanent duty ensure that incidents are indentified and cleared quickly to keep traffic moving.

Road and Rail Investment

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to publish the technical report by his Department on the methodology for appraising investments in road and rail schemes.

Mr. Freeman: I am pleased to say that the report is being published today and I am placing copies in the Library. Further copies are available from the Department's publications sales unit, Building 1, Victoria road, South Ruislip, HA4 ON2, at a price including postage of £2·75.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Mortgage Foreclosures

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Attorney-General what is the latest available annual figure for mortgage foreclosures in Northern Ireland.

The Attorney-General: In 1990, a total of 2,599 originating summonses for the collection of mortgage arrears were issued in the Chancery Division of the High Court for Northern Ireland. The total figure for all mortgage foreclosures in Northern Ireland is not collected centrally. It is not therefore possible to give figures for possession orders granted, cases where suspended possession orders were made, and those cases which did not proceed after the originating summons was issued.

Commonhold

Mr. Soley: To ask the Attorney-General when he intends to bring forward legislation on commonhold.

The Attorney-General: The Government will introduce legislation on commonhold and related matters as soon as parliamentary time for it can be found.

ENERGY

Coal Industry Bill

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what consultations he had with representatives of (a) miners and (b) underground supervisory staff when preparing the Coal Industry Bill.

Mr. Wakeham: My Department consulted British Coal.

Mines Safety

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last consulted representatives of miners or underground supervisory staff on mines safety.

Mr. Wakeham: Safety in mines is the responsibility of the Health and Safety Commission and Executive which regularly consult representative organisations.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy to what factors he attributes the safety record of mines owned by the British Coal Corporation.

Mr. Wakeham: I pay tribute to the management and work force of the corporation for their impressive achievements in improving safety in recent years.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last discussed mines safety with the Health and Safety Commission and Health and Safety Executive respectively.

Mr. Wakeham: My Department maintains close contact with the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received over the last three years about the number of hours which can be worked underground in coal mines.

Mr. Wakeham: There have been discussions between my officials and British Coal about the number of hours worked by mineworkers.

Electricity Supply

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many representations he has received about the charges being levied by electricity companies to connect electricity from (a) renewable sources or (b) combined heat and power projects to the electricity distribution system.

Mr. Wakeham: Connection charges are a matter for the parties concerned. Any dispute on the provision of a supply of electricity, including connection charges, may be referred by either party to the Director General of Electricity Supply for determination.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will place an up-to-date copy of the note for guidance on Government publicity and advertising in the Library.

Mr. Wakeham: I assume that the hon. Gentleman is referring to the conventions on Government publicity and advertising.

As I said in my reply to my hon. Friend, the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot), on 28 June 1990, at column 311, a copy has already been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy which company has been retained for the energy and environment publicity campaign.

Mr. Wakeham: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 5 November, at column 67.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many copies of the annual report of the ministerial group on energy efficiency have been distributed; and what percentage of them were distributed to the news media.

Mr. Wakeham: Virtually 2,000 copies of the report have been distributed to date. Further copies will be distributed at exhibitions in coming months. Just over 4 per cent. are being distributed to news media.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy which companies were invited to tender for the energy and environment publicity campaign; and how many submitted tenders.

Mr. Wakeham: A number of qualified organisations were invited to tender for the advertising element of the publicity campaign, and a separate group of qualified organisations to tender for the promotional element. All the companies invited made presentations in response, and the appointments were made on the basis of competitive tendering.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the reason for the rise in the estimated cost of the energy and environment publicity campaign.

Mr. Wakeham: Further resources are being made available for this new campaign in order to increase still further its effectiveness and impact. The scale of the resources now available demonstrates the Government's commitment to the campaign.

British Coal

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) which organisations submitted tenders for the appointment as accounting advisers on the privatisation of British Coal;

(2) which organisations submitted tenders for the appointment as financial advisers on the privatisation of British Coal;

(3) which organisations were invited to tender for the appointment as accounting advisers on the privatisation of British Coal;

(4) which organisations were invited to tender for the appointment as financial advisers on the privatisation of British Coal.

Mr. Wakeham: A number of qualified organisations were invited to tender for the positions of accounting and financial advisers in respect of the privatisation of British Coal. The appointments were made on the basis of competitive tendering.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will place in the Library the first and second interim reports on coal privatisation prepared for him by Rothschilds.

Mr. Wakeham: No. The Government will come forward with detailed proposals on coal privatisation in due course.

Power Companies (Shareholdings)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of shares in National Power and PowerGen, respectively, are owned by foreign shareholders.

Mr. Wakeham: Details of the current share registers are a matter for the companies and their registrars. I am advised, however, that it is not possible to identify shareholdings registered here and overseas according to the nationality of their beneficial owners.

Mining

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what is the total of underground workers in coal mines owned (a) by British Coal and (b) others, in the current year and at the end of the two preceding years;

(2) what is the total underground work force in private licensed mines.

Mr. Wakeham: I refer the hon. Member to British Coal's annual report and accounts and its annual reports on the licensed sector, copies of which are in the Library of the House.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the total work force involved in opencast mining.

Mr. Wakeham: The Department does not keep details of the number of people involved in opencast mining.

"The Government Information Officer"

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will place in the Library the current edition of the official booklet "The Government Information Officer".

Mr. Wakeham: I have today placed in the Library the current edition of the official booklet "The Government Information Officer" which has been in use since 1980.

Trade Figures

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the changes made since October 1989 in the way fuel trade figures have been (a) collected, (b) analysed or (c) presented.

Mr. Wakeham: Fuel trade data are collected by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and there have been no changes in the method of collection since October 1989. The data are published each month in "Overseas Trade Statistics".

The Central Statistical Office—CSO—uses the trade data collected by Customs and Excise to compile the balance of payments. The CSO make various adjustments to "Overseas Trade Statistics". From 1989 onwards these have included an estimate for any direct exports of crude oil from offshore fields reported late to Customs and Excise.

The trade data collected by Customs and Excise record import values on a "c.i.f basis"—including insurance and freight—and export values on an "f.o.b basis"—free on board. This is a standard convention used both in the United Kingdom and internationally. The CSO, in compiling the balance of payments, put imports and exports on a comparable basis—that is, both imports and exports are recorded on an f.o.b basis. Again this is an internationally accepted convention. Import data are therefore available on both a c.i.f basis and f.o.b basis and this has not been changed since October 1989. The data are published by the CSO each month in the balance of payments press notice.

The Department of Energy reproduces fuel trade data in the annual "Digest of United Kingdom Energy Statistics" and the monthly statistical bulletin "Energy Trends". Prior to 1991 data on imports and exports of fuels by quantity were expressed in tonnes of coal, from 1991 onwards data are expressed in tonnes of oil. Also prior to 1991 these two publications included data on imports only on a c.i.f basis; they now, in addition, include imports data on an f.o.b basis. This follows the convention used by the CSO and means that data on the values of imports and exports are available on a similar basis.

EC Energy Council

Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about the meeting of the Energy Council of the European Community Ministers on 29 October.

Mr. Wakeham: The Council, which was attended by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy, my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), adopted the SAVE decision, which provides for improved co-ordination of work on promoting energy efficiency in the Community. A draft directive to harmonise energy efficiency requirements for new gas or liquid fired central heating boilers was agreed in principle; the United Kingdom secured the inclusion of cost-effective standards appropriate to the particular circumstances of its domestic heating market.

The Commission explained the approach it proposed to take towards opening up, and increasing competition in, the gas and electricity markets. The Commission's objectives are supported in principle by the United Kingdom, which is in the lead on progress towards liberalising these markets. No decision was reached by the Council, but the way was paved for the Commission to enter into bilateral discussions with the member states.

The Commission was invited to present revised proposals on oil crisis measures and to adjust its mandate for Community accession to the International Energy Agency.

The Council held a detailed discussion on the Commission's communication on energy and the environment. There was widespread scepticism about unilateral Community action and most member states raised serious practical difficulties which remain to be addressed in connection with a carbon-energy tax.

The Commission presented a report on the progress of the European Energy Charter for the creation of market-based energy co-operation in western, central and eastern Europe, the USSR and beyond.

WALES

Gower Peninsula (Beaches)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what initiatives he will take to ensure that beaches on the Gower peninsula will meet minimum bathing water quality standards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: In 1990 all seven of the Gower peninsula's identified bathing waters met the mandatory standards for total and faecal coliforms set in the EC bathing waters directive—the standards by which the United Kingdom Government, and the EC, assesses compliance. As part of the investment programme agreed with Dwr Cymru to improve Welsh bathing waters, a sewage treatment works and a long sea outfall are to be built to serve Swansea. This £50 million investment will further improve the quality of all the waters in the area.

River Quality

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action he will take to ensure that current river stretches in Wales found to be of bad quality are improved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The 1985 river quality survey indicated that only 0·6 per cent.—about 17 miles—of rivers in the National Rivers Authority Welsh region's area were placed in class 4—bad quality. The investment programmes agreed with Dwr Cymru; recent initiatives such as those to reduce pollution from farms; and the planned setting of statutory water quality objectives under the Water Act 1989 will result in further improvements to river quality.

Conwy Road Tunnel

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the problems experienced with the Conwy road tunnel on the A55 road since its opening; what is the estimated cost of overcoming the problems; and what guarantee the contractors have given that there will be no recurrence of this problem.

Mr. David Hunt: The tunnel is equipped with failsafe safety systems and TV surveillance cameras which monitor all aspects of its operation.

All systems are linked to the control computers and video display screens in the nearby tunnel monitoring building which is manned 24 hours a day.

On 1 November a safety system installed to warn of a possible fire hazard or fuel spillage resulting from a traffic accident in the tunnel activated.

The video screens clearly showed tunnel maintenance staff that an accident had not occurred. In order to ascertain the cause of the false alarm entry to the westbound bore was necessary The investigation which required the closure of this bore for about two hours established that a heat/gas detection sensor was defective.

Systems were tested during the commissioning period prior to the tunnel being opened to traffic, but it is not unusual for minor problems to develop during the early period of operation once equipment is in permanent use.

The cost of replacing any defective electrical components will be met by the contractor responsible for their installation.

There can, of course, be no guarantee that individual electrical components will never fail, which is why the systems installed to ensure the safety of the travelling public are failsafe.

Empty Industrial Premises

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he proposes to enable empty industrial premises to be occupied.

Mr. David Hunt: The Welsh Development Agency, the Development Board for Rural Wales and the Welsh Office continue to work actively to attract the maximum amount possible of inward investment and to encourage indigenous Welsh companies to grow and prosper.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many industrial units stand empty in each of the industrial estate locations in each county in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: This information is not collected centrally by the Welsh Office. Information is, however, available on those units owned by the Welsh Development Agency and the Development Board for Rural Wales. The number of units vacant at the end of October 1991 were 438 and 120 respectively, representing vacancy rates of 12·5 per cent. and 17·4 per cent.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he proposes to hold with (a) the Welsh Development Agency and (b) Mid-Wales Development to take measures to attract occupants for empty industrial premises; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: I have regular discussions with the chairmen of the Welsh Development Agency and the Development Board for Rural Wales about a wide range of issues concerning the development of the Welsh economy.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to commute specific loan charge grants to local authorities.

Mr. David Hunt: We will commute specific loan charge grants for housing and urban programme expenditure in Wales on 1 October 1992. My Department will pay a lump sum equivalent to the present value of future grants for each local authority to the Public Works Loan Board or to the local authority itself if any authorities have insufficient Public Works Loan Board debt, though such payments are expected to be small. Annual loan charge grants will then cease. As the commuted sums will repay local authority debt, cancelling out the loss of annual grant, the effect on local authority resources will be neutral. The effect on general Government expenditure will be negligible, because virtually all the transfer payments involved are within general Government spending. Similarly, the effect on the central Government borrowing requirement, the public sector borrowing requirement and monetary aggregates will be negligible, since virtually all the commuted sums will return to the Public Works Loan Board. Within the public sector borrowing requirement, central Government borrowing on its own account will be increased and the local authority borrowing requirement will be reduced by the amount of debt repayment. There is no effect on the planning total. The various transfer payments involved have been taken into account in my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's autumn statement.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Car Prices

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he is proposing to take in relation to the findings of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's review of United Kingdom car prices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: The MMC's report on the supply of new cars is currently being considered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The report will be published as soon as is practicable.

The contents of all MMC reports remain confidential until publication. If the MMC finds no adverse effects the Secretary of State has no power to act. If the MMC has reached any adverse findings he will decide what steps, if any, should be taken to remedy the situation. He will also consider whether to announce a period of consultation before reaching his conclusions.

BA Engine Maintenance Plant

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on what date the reference was made to the Office of Fair Trading concerning the sale of British Airways engine maintenance plant at Nantgarw, South Wales to General Electric of America; and on what date he expects to receive the report from the Director General of Fair Trading.

Mr. Redwood: The Office of Fair Trading was first informed of the proposed acquisition by General Electric of the British Airways engine overhaul business on 3 September. I understand that the office's inquiries are nearing completion. We therefore expect to receive the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading in the near future.

Apparel, Knitting and Textiles Alliance

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from the Apparel, Knitting and Textiles Alliance about current EC negotiations with Poland, Hungary and Czechoslovakia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: My Department has kept in close touch with the Apparel, Knitting and Textiles Alliance as these negotiations have proceeded. The AKT last wrote to me about them on 21 September.

Office of Telecommunications

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether any changes will be made to the Office of Telecommunications' cash limit and running cost limit for 1991-92.

Mr. Lilley: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class IV vote 9, Office of Telecommunications, will be increased by £618,000 from £6,757,000 to £7,375,000. The running cost limit for the Office of Telecommunications will be increased by £254,000 from £6,037,000 to £6,291,000.

End-year flexibility entitlement of £341,000 on capital expenditure announced by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 17 July at columns 186-90, has been fully taken up. A £254,000 additional running cost provision is required for increased pay and associated other running costs mainly for 11 extra staff for new work stemming from the duopoly review. A £24,000 extra provision is required for the associated accruing superannuation liability charge. These increases are partly offset by an increase in appropriations in aid of £1,000.

The increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement yesterday.

ECGD

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether any changes will be made to the Export Credits Guarantee Department's cash limit and running cost limit for 1991-92.

Mr. Lilley: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class IV vote 4—Export Credits Guarantee Department: administration—will be increased by £2,880,000 from £37,200,000 to £40,080,000 and the running cost limit by £4,257,000 from £30,221,000 to £34,478,000.

The ECGD's running costs are not included in the planning total.

The increase is necessary to meet additional costs which have arisen because of the later than expected date for the privatisation of the short-term credit insurance operation. The necessary legislation in the form of the Export and Investment Guarantees Act received Royal Assent on 22 October 1991.

House of Fraser

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the takeover panel to conclude its inquiries into possible breaches of the takeover code in relation to the takeover of House of Fraser; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 6 November 1991]: This is a matter for the takeover panel. I am not responsible for the manner or duration of any inquiry which it carries out as the competent authority for takeover regulation.

PRIME MINISTER

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the Departments which no longer ensure that a ministerial reply is sent to letters from hon. Members; and if he will ensure that letters from hon. Members receive a ministerial reply.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply.

There has been no change in the existing practice.

Cabinet Office (Costs)

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if there are any proposals to change the 1991-92 cash limit or running costs limit for the Cabinet Office: other services vote.

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Prime Minister if there are any proposals to change the 1991-92 cash limit or running costs limit for the Cabinet Office: other services vote.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply. Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for the Cabinet Office: other services—class XIX, vote 2—will be increased by £850,000 from £24,814,000 to £25,664,000. At the same time the running costs limit will be increased by £806,000 from £21,656,000 to £22,462,000. This reflects the setting up of the citizens charter unit within the Cabinet Office which will be responsible for seeing that the citizens charter programme of initiatives, which my right hon. Friend announced to the House on 22 July 1991 at column 765, is implemented and developed. The increase is within the forecast outturn for the planning total included in the Chancellor's autumn statement yesterday.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 7 November.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply. This morning my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had a bilateral with President Bush in Rome. He is currently attending the NATO summit now under way there. That summit will set the future course for NATO to ensure that it remains, as it has been, a bedrock of stability in a still uncertain world.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

University Students

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many undergraduates from non-EC countries were attending universities in each of the past five years.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The information is given in the table.

Great Britain—Full-time undergraduate students—All years

Year	Total Non-EC students
1986	17,277
1987	18,301
1988	19,098
1989	20,370
1990	21,174

Science Budget

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of his science budget is spent in Wales, Scotland and England, respectively.

Mr. Alan Howarth: In 1989-90, the latest year for which figures are available, the proportions were 2·9, 7·9 and 77·9 per cent. respectively.

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what guidance he has given the advisory board for the research councils in seeking its advice on the allocation of the science budget in 1992-93 to 1994-95; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have written to Sir David Phillips inviting the board's advice. The following is the text of my letter:

Sir David Phillips KBE FRS

Chairman of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils

PROVISION FOR SCIENCE: 1992-93 TO 1994-95

I was grateful for the Board's advice for this year's Public Expenditure Survey on the resource needs of the Research Councils, the Royal Society and the Fellowship of Engineering.

I am pleased to tell you that the Government has decided that it is right to make a significant increase in the provision for Science, and that it is desirable to provide a planning framework for future years which provides a rising profile. In reaching these conclusions the Government has been heavily influenced by the array of evidence presented by the ABRC in the preparation for this year's survey.

DES provision for science comprises receipts from European Community programmes which go direct to the Research Councils, and the balance which is the sum I distribute on the advice of the ABRC, known as the "science budget". The latter (net of the dual support transfer) has been increased by £29 million to £1,002·0 million in 1992-93, by £50 million to £1,056·1 million in 1993-94, and by £85 million to £1,116·3 million in 1994-95. I have summarised in the annexed table the additions and adjustments made to the total provision for science at the start of the Survey from which I arrive at these science budget figures.

Next year's science budget is 2·5 per cent. higher in real terms than this year's. The figures for 1993-94 and 1994-95 are, respectively, 4 per cent. and 7 per cent. higher in real terms than in 1991-92. I am particularly pleased that the settlement produces this rising expenditure profile which gives the Board and the bodies funded from the science budget a sound basis for the forward planning and management of their basic and strategic research programmes.

I would like to give some fuller explanations of the adjustments shown in the annexed table.

Supercomputing

You will see that the science budget for the next three years includes further adjustments of £0·185 million in 1992-93, £0·165 million in 1993-94, and £0·180 million in 1994-95 to support 80 per cent. of the supercomputing service.

Dual Support

At this time last year I announced my decision that there should be a change in the dual support boundary from 1 August 1992. Our public expenditure plans were adjusted to take account of the best estimate we could then make of the associated costs. I made clear in my letter of 8 November 1990 that these figures would be revised if that was proved necessary by the further work I was commissioning.

In my further letter to you of 29 July, I accepted that further adjustments had indeed been shown to be necessary by the joint study undertaken by the Research Councils and the CVCP. I also announced the transitional arrangements which would apply to grants already in payment on 1 August 1992. I said that we would take account of the further adjustment and of the transitional arrangements in our public expenditure plans for 1992-93 and later years.

The following sums have now been added to the science budget to provide for the full costs to the Research Councils and the Royal Society of the responsibilities to be transferred:

	£ million
1992-93	48
1993-94	125
1994-95	154

These figures represent the total additions to the Science Budget on this account, ie they replace the adjustments announced at this time last year. They take account of the transitional arrangements announced in my July letter.

I have also made clear that the shift in the boundary of responsibilities should not lead to any change in the volume of research which Research Councils sponsor in higher education institutions. I will be looking for clear evidence that the sums transferred are being used by the Councils for the purpose for which they are intended. I should be grateful for the Board's assistance in achieving this objective.

I should now be grateful for the Board's advice on the appropriate distribution of these sums between the funded bodies.

Computing costs

The further work undertaken earlier in the year did not resolve the question of how central computing costs should be treated. The CVCP have since conducted some further analysis, in consultation with the Research Councils, indentifying options for handling these costs. The CVCP argued that these costs should remain with the institutions because the move towards distributed computing systems means that they would be most appropriately treated with other forms of communications systems as part of general premises costs. Your letter of 8 October preferred a further transfer to the Research Councils to allow them to cover these costs as part of the percentage addition to the direct staffing costs of research projects.

I have considered this issue carefully, and have decided that for the time being these costs should remain with the institutions. I noted the evidence that there is considerable diversity in the provision of computing services, with a tendency away from the main frame computing towards distributed systems. I would, however, like this particular issue to be looked at again in two years time as part of the first review of the percentage addition for indirect costs.

Next Steps

Although I am making no earmarked allocations this year, and will be grateful to receive the Board's advice on the allocation of the increased resources, I shall be looking to the scientific community to use the resources generally in accordance with the priorities that were identified in the evidence put to me earlier in the public spending round.

Since science funding is a matter of considerable Parliamentary and public interest, I propose to follow precedent by publishing the text of this letter in the form of a Parliamentary Answer.

Mature Students

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the basis for assessing maintenance needs of mature students (a) on higher education courses and (b) on further education courses, when such students are eligible for grants; and if he will consider extending the student loan system to mature students in the further education sector.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Mandatory grants are payable for full-time and sandwich courses leading to a first degree or a comparable qualification, to the HND and DipHE, and for courses of initial teacher training including part-time courses. Under the Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations a student who is at least 25 before his course begins is treated as "independent" and no parental contribution is expected towards his maintenance. A student who is at least 26 at the beginning of his course and who, in the three immediately preceding years, had income of at least £12,000 is eligible to receive the older student's allowance of up to £935 a year. Various other allowances in respect of spouses and dependants are available to all students depending upon their personal circumstances.

The resources of the student, and, where applicable, of his spouse and dependants are taken into account in the calculation of the maintenance grant payable.

For most courses not attracting a mandatory award, including further education courses, local education authorities have the power to make discretionary awards. It is for each authority to decide its own policies on the courses for which it will offer awards and on the amounts payable. Arrangements for mature students differ among the various postgraduate award schemes.

We have no plans to extend the student loans scheme to further education students.

Further Education

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to establish a further education council to prepare for the funding and guidance of further education colleges as they move to corporate status; when and how he intends to appoint the chief officers of such a council; and what timetable he proposes for its early operation.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Subject to the passage of the Further and Higher Education Bill introduced on 4 November, my right hon. and learned Friend intends to establish the Further Education Funding Council as soon as possible. The Bill provides for the appointment of the chairman and the chief executive by my right hon. and learned Friend. The Department will be preparing the ground for the Council by collecting information it will need, and carrying out programmes to help ensure that the colleges are ready for their new role.

Student Grants

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what monitoring he undertakes of the time taken to make mandatory award payments to students.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My Department does not directly monitor the time taken by individual local education authorities to assess and pay mandatory awards to more than 500,000 students. We are investigating reports of delays in certain authorities, to ensure that they are taking whatever action is necessary to comply with their statutory duties in the interests of students.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will meet representatives of the local authority associations to discuss how the payment of student grants may be expedited.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My Department is in regular contact with the local authority associations on student grant matters. Improvements have already been made in 1990 and 1991 in the grant arrangements to help expedite payments. We have taken actions with individual authorities reported to be facing delays. All authorities have power to make provisional payments to students, pending completion of grant assessments. We will continue to keep the position under review.

GCSE

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the consultations entered into with (a) parents, (b) teachers and (c) local education authorities prior to his announcement of a reduction in the percentage of coursework in GCSE assessment.

Mr. Fallon: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) on 21 October, Official Report, column 362.

Schools Assessment Results

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to publish the national results of the 1991 assessments of seven-year-olds; and whether he will also publish the results in each local education authority in England.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I intend to publish both the aggregate national results and the aggregate results in each local education authority in England, as soon as outstanding information has been sent to the Department by local education authorities. The public is entitled to accurate national and local information about the 1991 assessments of seven-year-olds under the national curriculum. The results will provide for the first time both a national picture of the attainments of this age group in the core subjects of English, mathematics and science and a baseline against which to measure progress.

Cot Deaths

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money the Government have put into cot death research in the last 20 years.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I have been asked to reply.

The Medical Research Council, which receives its grant in aid through the Department of Education and Science, is the main Government agency for the funding of medical research. The MRC generally decides the research to support with the funds available to it. The table gives its expenditure on research into sudden infant death syndrome and respiratory distress syndrome for the financial years since 1979-80. Data on earlier years are not available, nor is there central information on relevant publicly funded research which may be undertaken by medical schools, university departments, the health Departments and the health authorities. We also welcome the contribution made in this field by medical research charities.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax

Mr. Grylls: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate what the reduction in the income tax revenue would be for 1992-93 on a full-year basis and assuming no behavioural changes (a) if there were no higher rate of income tax for individuals and (b) if there were no additional rate for trusts.

Mr. Maude: The costs in a full year at 1992-93 levels of income are estimated to be (a) £5·1 billion and (b) £30 million. These estimates are based on a comparison with 1991-92 tax rates and an illustrative indexation of personal allowances and the basic rate limit by 4 per cent.

No account is taken of possible behavioural changes or of any effect on receipts of capital gains tax.

Government Deficits

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list those member states of the European Community whose actual government deficit exceeded 3 per cent. of gross domestic product in each of the past five years; and how many in the current financial year plan a deficit of a higher level.

Mr. Maples: Data and forecasts of Government deficits of member states are published by the European Commission in "European Economy", supplement A, May 1991.

House Prices

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing the real increase in (i) house prices and (ii) average earnings in the United Kingdom: and in each of the six founder members of the EC between 1961 and 1973; 1973 and 1987 and 1987 to date: and if he will include an estimate of the amount of consumer debt in each case divided between housing and other goods and services.

Mr. Maples: Data for real average earnings growth are published by the OECD in "Historical Statistics 1960-1990". There is no central source of regularly collected data for house prices, or for consumer debt divided between housing and other goods and services.

Import Penetration

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why no figures for import penetration overall and by industry have been published in the "Monthly Digest" since June 1989; and if he will publish a provisional estimate of the figures for December 1989 and December 1990.

Mr. Maples: Import penetration figures published in the latest "Monthly Digest of Statistics", September 1991, table 15.10, are the most up to date available. As a result of recommendations in the 1989 review of Department of Trade and Industry statistics, which considered the arrangements for collection of economic statistics by DTI and the burdens placed on businesses, quarterly sales data for most manufacturing industries, which are used in the calculation of this ratio, are no longer collected. Data for 1989 and 1990 are therefore not available. A footnote was added to the table earlier this year, to inform readers of the reason for the absence of new data.

Fraudulent Tax Claims

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many individuals were the subject of (a) civil penalties as provided in the Taxes Act and (b) other prosecutions for fraudulent tax claims over the last five years.

Mr. Maude: The numbers of individuals taxpayers and partnerships subject to civil penalties as provided in the Taxes Acts during the last two years were as follows:

	Number
1989-90	36,642
1990-91	34,327

Comparable figures for earlier years are not available.

The numbers of successful prosecutions for false accounts or returns of income, and false claims to personal allowances, deductions for expenses or repayments, during the last five years, were as follows:

	Number
1986-87	20
1987-88	15
1988-89	12
1989-90	14
1990-91	14

Vocational Training (Tax Relief)

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he intends to ensure that further education colleges will not lose financially as a result of the administration and cash flow costs of operating the system of tax relief for vocational training on behalf of the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Maude: The Government's aim in providing that the new tax relief for vocational training should be given at source is to ensure that it will be available to trainees as quickly and as widely as possible. The Government accept that administering the relief will mean some extra work for training organisations. Additional costs will be offset to the extent that the relief encourages more people to train, hence generating more income.

The intention is, however, that the additional cost should be kept to a minimum and to that end the Inland Revenue is currently considering a number of important improvements to the original proposals in the light of responses to their recent consultative paper. The arrangements will be published in regulations later this year.

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether tax relief for vocational training applies (a) to payments made by an individual for his or her training, (b) to payments made by a parent or other person or organisation on behalf of an individual for his or her training and (c) to payments made by an individual for his or her training but paid to the individual by a parent or other person or organisation.

Mr. Maude: Tax relief for vocational training will apply to payments made by individuals in connection with their own training. This will include the situation where an individual pays for the training out of funds provided by another person or organisation, but not where that other person or organisation makes the payment directly on behalf of the individual.

Non-North Sea GDP

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish (a) the index number for non-North sea GDP, both annually and quarterly, back to 1970, and (b) an explanation of the methodology and component series which go to make up the series; and if he will ensure that the index on non-North sea, gross domestic product is included in the CSO database.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 5 November 1991]: The information requested is given in the table. The series is derived by removing from the output estimate of gross domestic product—GDP(O)—the appropriately weighted contribution from "Extraction of mineral oil and natural gas"—class 13 of the 1980 Standard Industrial Classification. The weights reflect the importance of class 13 activity during various periods for which data are assembled on a given price base. On the final part of the question, the CSO is arranging for the quarterly seasonally adjusted series of GDP(O) less extraction of mineral oil and natural gas to be included on their database.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give separate figures for the spending by (a) the Central Office of Information, (b) Her Majesty's Treasury, (c) the Department of National Savings, (d) Customs and Excise, (e) the Inland Revenue and (f) Her Majesty's Stationery Office on (i) television advertising, (ii) radio advertising, (iii) newspaper advertising and (iv) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer on 5 November 1991]: The expenditure by these departments on advertising and other promotional material is as follows:

For expenditure by the Central Office of Information, I would refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given by the Economic Secretary on 30 April 1991 at columns 144-45. The actual costs for 1990-91 were as follows: £51,360,000 on television advertising; £1,640,000 on radio advertising; £38,170,000 on press advertising; and £33,500,000 on other promotional material. The forecast for 1991-92 is as follows: £34,500,000 on television advertising; £1,000,000 on radio advertising; £32,600,000 on press advertising; and £34,200,000 on other promotional material.

Detailed decisions on estimated expenditure on advertising through the COI on behalf of other Government Departments for 1992-93 are for departmental Ministers.

For Her Majesty's Treasury, the expenditure for 1988-89 was £49,310, that for 1989-90 was £52,486, and that for 1990-91 was £43,581, none of which was on television or radio advertising. The latest estimate for 1991-92 is £84,193 none of which is likely to be spent on television or radio advertising. The advertising budget for 1992-93 has not yet been set. Comparable figures for earlier years are unavailable because of machinery of government changes and could be given only at disproportionate cost.

Her Majesty's Treasury is also running the advertising campaign in connection with the BT share offer, which began on 1 October 1991. This includes television, press and poster advertising. It is planned to end just before the close of the offer, which is on 4 December. The costs of the BT sale, including total marketing costs, will be reported to Parliament after the sale, in the normal way.

For expenditure by the Department of National Savings I would refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given by the Economic Secretary on 8 May 1991, at column 458. The forecast for 1991-92 is now £6·1 million for television advertising and £2·9 million for press advertising, with the other figures unchanged. The advertising budget for 1992-93 has not yet been set.

Her Majesty's Customs and Excise have not used television, radio or newspaper advertising for promotional purposes. The available information on other promotional material is as follows: £21,000 in 1984-85; £29,000 in 1985-86; £28,000 in 1986-87; £29,000 in 1987-88; £47,000 in 1988-89; £31,000 in 1989-90; and £44,000 in 1990-91. The forecast for 1991-92 is £54,000. The advertising budgets for 1992-93 have not yet been set. These figures do not include recruitment advertising. Comparable figures for earlier years are unavailable.

Expenditure by Inland Revenue is as follows: £15,000 for newspaper advertising and £300,000 for other advertising in 1986-87; £15,000 for newspaper advertising and £350,000 for other advertising in 1987-88; £20,000 for newspaper advertising and £250,000 for other advertising in 1988-89; £30,000 for newspaper advertising and £400,000 for other advertising in 1989-90; £4,376,000 for television advertising, £2,155,000 for newspaper advertising and £679,000 for other advertising in 1990-91; and £20,000 for newspaper advertising and £300,000 for other advertising in 1991-92. The figures for 1990-91 include expenditure of £6·95 million on an advertising campaign to increase public awareness of the new arrangements for non-taxpayers to register for payment of bank and building society interest without deduction of income tax. The advertising budget for 1992-93 has not yet been set. Comparable figures for earlier years are not readily available and could be given only at disproportionate cost.

For expenditure by HMSO, I would refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given by the Economic Secretary on 8 May 1991, at column 460. The forecast for 1991-92 is £539,000 for advertising in newspapers and journals and £589,000 for other promotional material. The budgets for 1992-93 have not yet been set.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total expenditure by (a) Her Majesty's Treasury, (b) the Central Office of Information, (c) Customs and Excise, (d) the Department of National Savings and (e) Her Majesty's Stationery Office on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 5 November 1991]: Expenditure on press and public relations is as follows:

The expenditure for HM Treasury in 1988-89 was £548,264, that in 1989-90 was £564,691 and that in 1990-91 was £510,489. The forecast for 1991-92 is £547,104. The budgets for 1992-93 have not yet been set. Comparable figures from 1979-80 to 1987-88 are unavailable due to machinery of Government changes and could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

For details of the expenditure by the Central Office of Information, I would refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given by the Economic Secretary on 29 April 1991, at columns 5-6. The actual costs for 1990-91 were £57,365; the forecast for 1991-92 is £66,919. The budgets for 1992-93 have not yet been set.

The expenditure by Customs and Excise is as follows: £63,000 in 1984-85; £87,000 in 1985-86; £85,000 in 1986-87; £89,000 in 1987-88; £126,000 in 1988-89; £92,000 in 1989-90; £102,000 in 1990-91; and £86,000 in 1991-92. The budgets for 1992-93 have not yet been set. The figures for 1979 to 1984 are not available.

For details of the expenditure by the Department of National Savings I would refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given by the Economic Secretary on 3 May, at column 354. The budget for 1992-93 has not yet been set.

HMSO has not recorded any expenditure on press and public relations.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Treasury has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 5 November 1991]: Yes. On both the 1987 BP secondary sale and the current BT secondary sale, unsolicited direct mail was sent to potential investors inviting anyone considering applying for shares in the offer to register with the share information office.

Tax Exemption

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list all the exemptions available from taxation for the agricultural industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 6 November 1991]: The following reliefs and allowances are available to the agricultural industry:

The same general rules apply to the calculation of a farmer's business profits as apply to other traders. But in addition, a farmer may claim to average his business profits over two consecutive years of assessment where the difference between them is 30 per cent. or more.

The Agricultural Buildings Allowance gives relief for capital expenditure on agricultural buildings and structures at a rate of 4 per cent. per annum straight-line.

For inheritance tax provided certain conditions are met, agricultural property relief is available at two rates. The relief operates by reducing the value of the property bought into charge by 50 per cent. for land with vacant possession and 30 per cent. for let land.

Working farmers can qualify for capital gains tax reliefs in the same way as other traders. These include rollover relief, retirement relief, and holdover relief on gifts of business assets or shares in unquoted trading companies. Holdover relief is also available on gifts of agricultural property which would attract 50 or 30 per cent. relief from inheritance tax.

Independent Schools

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the financial value of the tax concessions given to independent schools by virtue of their charitable status.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 6 November 1991]: This information is not available.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Drugs (Caribbean)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures are being taken to tackle the drugs trade in the Caribbean.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The United Kingdom is active in promoting effective measures to tackle the drugs trade in the Caribbean, especially in the dependent territories. We have provided practical help, training and technical advice to enable countries to address every aspect of the threat. We have also recently undertaken a survey of drug trafficking and abuse problems in the anglophone eastern Caribbean. The survey makes a number of recommendations including: the provision of specialist equipment to the Trinidad and Tobago drugs squad; the appointment of a regional customs adviser and training officer; and advisory visits by the United Kingdom demand reduction task force. The action we are taking to implement these recommendations is a demonstration of Her Majesty's Government's continuing commitment to help the countries of the region deal with the scourge of drugs.

SCOTLAND

Cot Deaths

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what research he has commissioned into the causes, epidemiology and cure of cot deaths in Scotland;

(2) what research he has commissioned in Scotland on cot death syndrome.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: A variety of relevant research projects has been supported by the Scottish Office Home and Health Department throughout the 1980s at a cost of £230,000. In addition the Scottish Hospital Endowments Research trust has provided funding of £15,000 for one project.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what study he has made of New Zealand research into cot deaths and of the methods used in New Zealand to reduce the incidence of cot death.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: An expert group set up by the Chief Medical Officer for England and Wales has considered the New Zealand research along with other recent studies of cot death. Its recommendations were announced on 31 October 1991. The chief medical officer and the chief nursing officer in my Department will be writing to all doctors and other professionals in Scotland drawing attention to these recommendations.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice is issued by his Department on the way in which young babies should be laid to sleep to avoid cot death.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: No specific guidance on the sleeping position of infants has been issued in Scotland. However, I am aware of recent expert advice that avoiding the prone sleeping position when laying a baby to sleep reduces the risk of sudden infant death syndrome and will ensure that this information, and advice on other associated factors, is widely publicised.

Geriatric Provision

Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has undertaken any study of the future demographic trends in Lanarkshire in the light of proposed changes to geriatric provision in the area.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Demographic trends is one of many factors taken into acount in my consideration of proposals affecting the organisation of health care.

Contraceptive Advice

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the Scottish Office Home and Health Department maintains a register of centres providing specialist contraceptive advice for young people.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Such a register is not maintained centrally. Current guidance from the Scottish Office Home and Health Department about the provision of family planning services draws health boards' attention to the need for counselling facilities for young people.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which Scottish health boards provide a specialist contraceptive advice service for young people.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not available centrally. It is for individual health boards to determine the pattern of provision of these services and the extent to which designated facilities are provided.

Respite Care

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will increase resources to allow health boards to increase respite care provision as an integral component of effective community care; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Although resources will not be separately identified for respite care, the Government recognise the importance of the development of respite care in the effective provision of community care, and health board allocations will reflect this.

Eye Tests

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state the number of people in Scotland who received eye tests during the 12 months ending October 1991 and the numbers receiving eye tests in the 12 months prior to the abolition of free tests; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information on the total number of sight tests carried out during the 12 months ending October 1991 is not available. In the 12 months prior to 1 April 1989 1,168,610 sight tests were conducted.

Operations, Glasgow

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the numbers of patients in the Greater Glasgow health board area who, in the 12 months ending October 1991, have had to be admitted to NHS hospitals for similar operations to those which they have previously, within the same 12-month period, had performed at private hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not held centrally.

Parents Charter

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what calculation has been made of the additional staffing needs for Her Majesty's inspectorate under the parents charter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 6 November 1991]: The proposals of the parents charter have implications for the work of Her Majesty's inspectorate. I am considering how these proposals are to be met in the context of the inspectorate's functions and responsibilities overall.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Custody Alternatives

9. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what additional funding he intends to make available to the probation service and voluntary organisations for alternatives to custody projects for young people convicted of burglary and driving away a motor vehicle.

Mr. John Patten: The increase in probation service expenditure announced yesterday will enable the service to strengthen its work with these offenders. So too will the extra £1 million a year for the voluntary sector projects.

Bail Offenders

13. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on the offending patterns of persons on bail.

Mr. John Patten: Home Office researchers have been reviewing recent studies by the police and others of offending on bail. The findings will be made available soon.

Political Asylum

14. Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultation with immigrant groups he has had in relation to his new rules on political asylum.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We made available a draft of new asylum rules when the Asylum Bill was published last Friday. We are in regular contact with interested organisations and will take account of whatever comments they may have.

20. Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on any proposals he has to control immigration by those claiming political asylum.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: An Asylum Bill was published last Friday. At the same time we made available draft asylum rules. My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor made available draft appeals procedure rules. These measures will allow us to reduce substantially the current misuse of asylum procedures, while protecting the position of genuine refugees.

Dorset Police

15. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the level of police manpower for Dorset; and how his Department takes account of the additional resources needed for a county with a large number of seasonal visitors.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: At the end of August, there were 1,302 police officers in the Dorset Police, an increase of 14 per cent. since the Government first took office. In allocating increases in establishments to forces, my right hon. Friend takes account of a wide range of factors which influence demands on the police, with the professional advice of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary on circumstances peculiar to each force, such as the volume of seasonal visits.

Television Franchises

16. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has made any assessment of the financial viability of the regional television companies following the acceptance of the new franchises.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. The Broadcasting Act 1990 requires the ITC to be satisfied that the winning applicant would be able to maintain the licensed service throughout the period for which the licence would be in force. In reaching its decisions, the commission had access to confidential business plans submitted by the bidders.

Confessions

17. Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to introduce legislation to outlaw convictions based wholly or mainly on confessions in police custody.

Mr. John Patten: The use of uncorroborated confession evidence is within the remit of the Royal Commission on criminal justice announced to the House by my right hon. Friend on 14 March. We shall consider what changes may be needed in the light of the commission's findings.

Industrial Estates (Security)

18. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning schemes for improving security on industrial estates.

Mr. John Patten: We have received no representations concerning schemes for improving security on industrial estates. I understand, however, that an increasing number of businesses are now developing such schemes, often in consultation with the local police, following the example of the first such scheme developed on the North Lynn industrial estate in 1985.

Drug Dealers

19. Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drug dealers have been convicted in the past 12 months.

Mr. John Patten: A total of 2,001 people were convicted of the unlawful supply of controlled drugs in the United Kingdom during 1990 and 2,699 people were convicted of being unlawfully in possession of a controlled drug with intent to supply it to another.

Asylum

21. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received about proposed changes in the methods of dealing with people who apply for asylum; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn).

Police Cells

22. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are currently being held in police cells.

Mrs. Rumbold: There were 1,787 prisoners in police cells last night who should properly have been detained in prisons.

Security Forces (Murders)

23. Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on his policy concerning the guideline sentences for persons convicted of the murder of members of the security forces.

Mr. John Patten: Life imprisonment is the mandatory sentence when a person has been convicted of murder.

Channel Tunnel

24. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice he has received from the European Commission about the exercise of immigration control and passport checking procedures for channel tunnel journeys; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The European Commission has sent my right hon. Friend no advice of the kind to which my hon. Friend refers. Immigration controls and passport checking procedures will be applied to the channel tunnel in ways similar to those applied at the other major points of entry to the United Kingdom.

Bail

25. Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what conclusions he has reached following his Department's research into the working of the Bail Act 1976; and if he will make a r j 5-1statement.

Mr. John Patten: We shall consider urgently the results of the Home Office review of the recent studies of offending on bail and announce our conclusions as soon as we can.

West Mercia Constabulary

26. Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current strength of the West Mercia constabulary.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: At the end of August 1991 West Mercia constabulary was up to its establishment, with 2,029 officers, an increase of 277 officers, or 16 per cent., since the Government took office.

Prisons (Education)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the prison population had gained formal educational qualifications before entering prison.

Mrs. Rumbold: A national prison survey was conducted earlier this year, based on a 10 per cent. sample of the male and a 20 per cent. sample of the female prison population. Preliminary results indicate that 57 per cent. of the prisoners sampled had some education qualifications when they came into prison. Of these, 8 per cent. had a vocational qualification, 36 per cent. had the equivalent of what was a GCE O-level as their highest qualification, and 8 per cent. had a higher qualification.

Prisons (Ethnic Groups)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the age profile of the prison population for each major ethnic group.

Mrs. Rumbold: The latest readily available information is given in the table.

Population[1] in Prison Service establishments in England and Wales on 30 June 1990: by ethnic origin and age.

Conservative Party Conference

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will request a report from the Chief Constable of Lancashire on the policing implications for Lancashire arising from the policing provision required at the 1991 Conservative party conference at Blackpool; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. It is for the chief officer of the force concerned to decide how a party conference should be policed, as with any other police operation.

Styal Prison

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes to the regime in the mother and baby unit at Her Majesty's prison Styal have been made following the transfer of two mothers whose babies are aged over nine months.

Mrs. Rumbold: The following changes have been made:
(i) Daily routines have been adjusted to ensure fewer household chores for the women in the unit thus allowing mothers more time with their babies.
(ii) Accommodation has been temporarily adapted to increase créche space.
(iii) Alternative accommodation has been found for pregnant women and this has increased space for the mothers and babies.
(iv) Toys appropriate for babies in the nine months to 18 months age range have been purchased. A larger playpen is being introduced in the education department to cater for the older babies of mothers who decide to undertake classes.

These are initial improvements. A steering committee, chaired by the area manager, will plan further developments ranging from regime enhancement to the expansion of accommodation.

National Transcommunications Ltd

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department by how many staff, by grade, the total complement at the former Independent Broadcasting Authority engineering division, has been reduced in the past two years; what has been the total cost of voluntary redundancies and early retirements; and by how much these changes are expected to reduce the total annual wages and salary bill.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The IBA carried out a reorganisation programme during 1990 and reduced its staff by about 170. When NTL was sold on 24 October, its overall staffing complement, including contract staff, was 779, the same as it had been on 1 January 1991, when the company was vested in the Crown. In that period, 42 staff, including contract staff, left and the same number joined. NTL has assumed the IBA's liabilities for retirement and death benefits for those employees who transferred to NTL from the IBA. Information on the costs is not readily available in the form requested.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what price it has been agreed, subject to contract, to sell National Transcommunications Ltd. to Mercury Asset Management; how many other bids were received; and what assurances he has sought or been given about plans to float off the company.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The sale of National Transcommunications Ltd., which was completed on 24 October 1991, raised immediate proceeds of £70 million, with the possibility of further proceeds of up to £20 million under specified circumstances in the event of a successful flotation of the company after 1993. The sale and purchase agreement also includes comprehensive clawback provisions intended to ensure that the Government receive a share of unexpectedly large profits made from sales of the company's property and intellectual property. National Transcommunications Ltd. was purchased by Mercury Asset Management plc on behalf of its fund management clients. In its bid, Mercury Asset Management stated its intention to prepare the company for flotation when it has sufficient track record in the private sector.

Following the sale launch in May this year, there were over 50 serious expressions of interest in the company, from a wide range of backgrounds, including manufacturers, banks, broadcasters, utilities and telecommunications companies. We shortlisted three indicative bidders who then had access to detailed information about National Transcommunications Ltd.'s business. Two bidders, GEC and MAM, continued their preparations for bidding up until the final deadline. MAM's bid was made in the knowledge of that competition and we were entirely satisfied with it.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what amounts of money over what periods have been paid to Price Waterhouse and Deloittes in connection with the sale and restructuring of the former engineering division of the Independent Broadcasting Authority; and if he will detail by name and amount payments made to any other outside consultants with whom contracts were placed during this process.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Home Office placed contracts with the following outside consultants during the sale of NTL and preparations for the company to be sold:

Price Waterhouse
Norton Rose
Ernst and Young
Debenham, Tewson and Chinnocks
Mercer Fraser
Charles Barker

My right hon. Friend will report to the House on the final cost of the sale as soon as possible, but information about individual contracts and amounts paid is commercially confidential.

Prison Population

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State For the Home Department how many (a) remand and (b) convicted prisoners were unemployed before entering prison.

Mrs. Rumbold: In response to questions in the national prison survey, which was carried out at the beginning of this year, (a) 44 per cent. of remand and (b) 31 per cent. of convicted prisoners said that they were unemployed prior to imprisonment.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State For the Home Department how many prisoners are related to people who have also served a prison sentence.

Mrs. Rumbold: In response to questions in the national prison survey, which was carried out at the beginning of this year, 35 per cent. of convicted prisoners said that someone in their family had also served a prison sentence.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State For the Home Department how many (a) male and (b) female prisoners have dependent children; and what is known about who presently looks after them.

Mrs. Rumbold: In response to questions in the national prison survey, which was carried out at the beginning of this year, (a) 32 per cent. of male prisoners and (b) 47 per cent. of female prisoners said that they had dependent children living with them just before they came into prison.

Ninety one per cent. of male prisoners with dependent children said that it was either their current or ex-wives or partners who were looking after them, while only 2 per cent. reported a dependent child with foster parents or in care. By contrast, just 23 per cent. of female prisoners said that at least one of their children was being looked after by current or ex-husbands or partners. Most female prisoners (52 per cent.) said that at least one of their children was being looked after by other relations. Twelve per cent. said that a dependent child was with foster parents or in care.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State For the Home Department how many prisoners are married or were living with a partner before entering prison.

Mrs. Rumbold: In response to questions in the national prison survey, which was carried out at the beginning of this year, 50 per cent. of prisoners said that just prior to their imprisonment they were married or living with a partner.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) remand and (b) convicted prisoners were homeless before entering prison.

Mrs. Rumbold: In response to questions in the national prison survey, which was carried out at the beginning of this year, 17 per cent. of remand prisoners and 12 per cent. of convicted prisoners said that they had no permanent accommodation at the time they were imprisoned.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of (a) young offenders and (b) adults in prison have previously been in the care of the local authority.

Mrs. Rumbold: In response to questions in the national prison suvey, which was carried out at the beginning of this year, (a) 38 per cent. of young prisoners and (b) 23 per cent. of adult prisoners said that they had had experience of local authority care before the age of 16.

Court Hearings

Mr. Butcher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will ensure that in the period between making a statement and going into court a witness need not have his name declared to the defendant;

(2) if he will ensure that in the period between making a statement and going into court a witness need not have his address declared to the defendant.

Mr. John Patten: Under the Magistrates' Courts (Advance Information) Rules 1985 the prosecution may withold information, including statements giving the names of witnesses, to which the defence would otherwise be entitled where there is considered to be a risk of intimidation of the witnesses concerned. Last year we amended the Magistrates' Courts Rules 1981 to prevent the routine disclosure of witnesses' addresses in advance of trial or full committal proceedings.

Missing Persons

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the computerised national register for missing persons will start operating; what its staff complement will be; and what financial resources will be allocated to it.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The database which the missing persons bureau will use will be from part of the new police national computer. It is not possible at the moment to give a definite date for its introduction. The staffing and resources of the bureau are still under consideration.

West Midlands Serious Crimes Squad

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will now publish in full the report on the general practices of the former West Midlands serious crimes squad submitted to him by the Police Complaints Authority under section 97(2) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: This report was laid before both Houses of Parliament on 31 October and was published on 1 November.

Anti-racist Organisations

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what conditions are attached to grants from his Department to anti-racist organisations.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Home Office runs a number of grant programmes which aim to improve community relations by seeking to reduce racial discrimination and racial disadvantage. Section 11 grant and the new ethnic minority grant seek to assist the access of ethnic minorities to mainstream services. Grants made from the reduction of racial disadvantage grant budget mainly help business support agencies under the ethnic minority business initiative and projects working to build the capacity of the ethnic minority voluntary sector. Some funding for anti-harassment and anti-racial attack schemes is also provided under the safer cities programme. In addition, the Commission for Racial Equality, which is grant aided by the Home Office, is empowered under section 44 of the Race Relations Act 1976 to give financial or other assistance to any organisation that it deems to be concerned with the promotion of equality of opportunity and good relations between persons of different racial groups. Most race equality councils and a number of projects in various parts of the country are funded in this way.

Funding under these programmes is subject to a range of conditions, some of which relate specifically to a particular project or scheme and others which are common to many grant regimes. These include conditions on progress towards targets and objectives, the provision of reports and financial information, and requirements that grants must not be used for party political purposes or for purposes for which they were not intended.

Female Prisoners

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average length of time spent in custody by female life sentence prisoners released on licence in each of the last 10 years.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information requested is given in the table. The calculated averages exclude persons who have died in custody or have been discharged for other reasons. The information for all persons released on life licence is published annually in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales"—table 8.5 of the issue for 1989, Cm. 1221.

Average time served[1] under sentence in Prison Service establishments in England and Wales by females first released on life licence 1980-90

Mature Women (Health Care)

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the ministerial group on women's issues last considered the issue of health care for mature women; what report was issued; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The ministerial group on women's issues examines issues of concern to women where they overlap more than one Government Department. The group has not considered the specific issue of health care for mature women separately, as this is the responsibility of the Department of Health, but it has addressed a number of wider health-related issues.

Prison Deaths

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the deaths of all boys and girls under 21 years detained in Prison Department establishments in the last 30 years, or as early as records have been kept, stating in each case the names, ages and sex of the young person, whether he/she was sentenced or on remand, the establishment where he/she was detained and the cause of death.

Mrs. Rumbold: The table lists the information requested for each year since 1978. Information for earlier years is not readily accessible and could not be given except at disproportionate costs.

[1] The table lists deaths from all causes.
[2] Information on the status of prisoners who died before 1981 is not readily accessible. Prisoners described as on remand include those who were convicted but awaiting sentence.

Football

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the average costs of policing each English Football League club per spectator for the past three football seasons in order from the highest to the lowest.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is not available.

Correspondence

Mr. Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will arrange for a reply to be sent as soon as possible to the letter of the hon. Member for Worcestershire, South of 23 September concerning Statutory Instrument No. 1531.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: A reply was sent to my hon. Friend on 5 November 1991.

Merseyside Fire Authority

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, following the Merseyside fire risk review of 1990, he has given the Merseyside fire and civil defence authority permission to vary the approved establishment scheme; what assessment he has made of whether the Home Office minimum standards of fire cover can be met by the Merseyside fire authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: No proposals have so far been submitted by the Merseyside fire and civil defence authority. Any which entailed the closure of fire stations or reduction in the number of operational firefighters or appliances would require our approval to ensure that nationally recommended minimum standards of fire cover continued to be met.

Extradition

Mr. Stanbrook: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the progress made to date in bringing into effect the Extradition Act 1989, and in the revised arrangements with other states which are parties to the European convention on extradition and its protocols.

Mr. John Patten: The Extradition Act 1989 came into effect on 27 September 1989 and the United Kingdom ratified the European convention on extradition on 13 February 1991. It came into effect in the United Kingdom on 14 May 1991. The protocols to the convention have not been ratified.

Schools (Fire Standards)

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department is taking to bring fire safety standards in schools and colleges up to those required under the EC framework directive on the safety and health of workers at work; which organisations are to be consulted about the new draft regulations; when these are expected to come into force; and who will be responsible for enforcing them.

Mr. John Patten: We propose to implement the fire safety requirements of European Community directive 89/391/EEC on the introduction of measures to encourage improvements in the safety and health of workers at work —known as the framework directive—and the related directive 89/654/EEC, known as the workplace directive, by making new regulations under section 12 of the Fire Precautions Act 1971. The new regulations will apply to places of work, including schools and colleges, to which the Fire Precautions Act applies. The regulations will come into force on 1 January 1993, and there will be a staged application in accordance with the directives.

The regulations are being drafted in consultation with other Government Departments, which will include the Department of Education and Science; and with representatives of local authorities' associations and other interested bodies.

In accordance with the directives, the regulations will place the primary responsibility for ensuring fire safety on employers. Regulations under the Fire Precautions Act are enforced by fire authorities and for crown premises by HM inspectorates of fire services. Detailed consideration is being given to how the regulations will be applied to places of work, including schools and colleges.

It is expected that a consultative document will be available in the spring for an extensive public consultation exercise.

Joyriding

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the number of deaths in (a) Liverpool and (b) Merseyside caused by joyriders in each of the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The number of deaths of drivers or passengers of stolen vehicles was as follows:

Year	Liverpool	Rest of Merseyside
1986	—	4
1987	1	2
1988	1	—
1989	3	1
1990	— (2)[2]	—
1991[1]	2 (3)[2]	1

[1]To date.

[2]The figures in brackets show the numbers of pedestrians killed in incidents involving stolen vehicles.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has plans to take action against joyriders in the present Session of Parliament.

Mr. John Patten: We will be bringing forward a Bill in the present Session to introduce a new offence of aggravated taking.

Essex Constabulary

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers there were in the Essex constabulary in 1979 and at the last available date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: At the end of August Essex police were within eight posts of their authorised establishment, with 2,881 police officers compared with 2,490 in December 1979—an increase of 16 per cent. As from 1 October, we have further increased the authorised establishment to 2,892.

Concessionary Television Licences

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning pensioners paying the full television licence fee while living in the same block of flats as others paying the concessionary fee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In the last 12 months we have received correspondence on this subject from two councils and one firm of solicitors. Since 1 April 1991 it has been the statutory responsibility of the BBC to determine eligibility for the concessionary licence.

Immigration

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration his Department has given to re-opening the possibility of applications from Commonwealth citizens who wish to seek British citizenship; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Commonwealth citizens may acquire British citizenship by naturalisation. I assume that the hon. Member has in mind the entitlements to registration as a British citizen that came to an end on 31 December 1987, in accordance with provisions of the British Nationality Act 1981. We see no reason to review those provisions.

Metropolitan Police

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many uniformed officers are in posts in the Metropolitan police at the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On 4 November 1991 there were 23,873 uniformed officers in the Metropolitan police.

Race Relations

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish details regarding the progress of race equality legislation within the EC; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Government are absolutely opposed to discrimination on grounds of race; and this position is reflected in all our discussions with our European partners on these matters.

The Government do not, however, regard EC legislation as the appropriate means for taking action to enhance racial equality. The exact legislative position in member states varies, and is a matter for them, taking account of their particular circumstances.

Magistrates Courts

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of magistrates courts that magistrates courts committees have decided to close in the last six months.

Mr. John Patten: Information about individual magistrates' courthouse closures has not been routinely collected by the Home Office which, under the Justices of the Peace Act 1979, has a responsibility in relation to closure proposals only if there is an appeal by the relevant paying local authority.

Prisoners (Suicides)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners under 21 years old have committed suicide in custody in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: [holding answer 6 November 1991]: The information requested is set out in the table:

Deaths of prisoners aged under 21 at their own hand in Her Majesty's prison service establishments 1979-91[2]

	Number
1979	5
1980	3
1981	3
1982	4

1984	6
1985	3
1986	5
1987	7
1988	9
1989	11
1990	9
1991[1]	[3]1

[1] (to 4 November).
[2] Includes all deaths which appear to have been deliberately self-inflicted, whether or not a verdict of suicide was recorded at the inquest.
[3] Inquests have yet to be held on 3 other prisoners under 21 who have died in 1991.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Concessionary Fares

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he would provide financial support for concessionary fares on buses and trains for every pensioner when he or she reaches retirement age.

Mr. Needham: The Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland is precluded by the provisions of the Sex Discrimination (NI) Order 1976 from making a distinction on age grounds between men and women. The qualifying age for concessionary half-fare travel by bus and rail in Northern Ireland is age 65 years for men and women and there are no plans to alter it.

Civil Defence

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the maximum level of radiation which the 3,000 Radiac meters used in civil defence in Northern Ireland can quantify; what protection is available at the sites where these meters will be operated; and what steps he has taken to ensure there is sufficient protection for civil defence staff against radiation.

Dr. Mawhinney: Radiac meters are capable of measuring up to 300 centigrays per hour. In the event of their use appropriate safety instructions are available for issue to personnel operating in the field.

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the Northern Ireland civil defence regional Government headquarters has a fully trained staff; whether the building is fully furnished with display equipment to enable the trained staff to process the information received regarding the situation in the Province and throughout Europe; and whether the staff are supplied with radiation graphs to record the situation at each sampling site in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Mawhinney: Staff have been designated and trained for the regional government headquarters building in Northern Ireland which is fully equipped with appropriate display and recording facilities for the purpose of monitoring information received from within the Province and elsewhere, including Europe.

Bill of Rights

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what consideration is being given to the introduction of a Bill of Rights for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Brooke: Human rights and civil liberties are already well protected by existing legislation in Northern Ireland. I am always willing to consider proposals for strengthening the existing safeguards and I am examining carefully the recommendations in the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Right's second report on religious and political discrimination and equality of opportunity (Cm. 1107). I am not, however, convinced that a Bill of Rights is required.

Industrial Development Board

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many employees of the Industrial Development Board are based overseas; and what are the total wages and expenses bills for these employees over the last financial year for which figures are available.

Mr. Needham: A total of 38 employees are based overseas. The total wages and expenses bills in 1990-91 was £980,067.

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Industrial Development Board staff based in Northern Ireland travelled abroad on their duties during the last year for which figures are available; how many trips were involved; and what were the total costs and expenses involved.

Mr. Needham: The information does not exist in the precise form sought by the hon. Member. During 1990-91 however, 74 members of IDB staff based in Northern Ireland undertook 139 visits by air travel to destinations abroad at a cost of approximately £370,000.

Debenham's, Belfast

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the nature and extent of financial assistance given to Debenham's store to operate from Castle Court centre in Belfast.

Mr. Needham: No financial assistance has been given.

Public Bodies

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list (a) the members and chief executives of non-departmental public bodies in Northern Ireland, (b) the period of their appointments, (c) their current salaries where these are paid posts and (d) how many periods of appointment each such person has served, together with the names of their immediate predecessors.

Dr. Mawhinney: To provide the information in the form requested could be undertaken only at disproportionate cost.

However, as I informed the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) on 20 June, Official Report column 253, information concerning appointments to non-departmental public bodies in Northern Ireland is given in "Public Bodies" and "Public Appointments: A Handbook for Women's Organizations", copies of which are available in the Library. Details of the historic membership of nine such bodies have also appeared in the Official Report as follows:

Organisation	Date	Volume	Columns
Northern Ireland Housing Executive	16 January 1991	183	512-3
Police Authority for Northern Ireland	16 January 1991	183	513
Northern Ireland Fire Authority	17 January 1991	183	577-9
Laganside Corporation	17 January 1991	183	578
Health and Social Services Boards	17 January 1991	183	579-80
Northern Ireland Sports Council	18 January 1991	183	607-10
General Consumer Council for Northern Ireland	21 January 1991	184	30
Drainage Council for Northern Ireland	21 January 1991	184	30-31
Education and Library Boards	31 January 1991	184	586-88

Nursery Education

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress is being made towards the integration of nursery education.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Government are committed to encouraging and facilitating integrated education where there is sufficient demand for it from parents. In recent years, however, priority has been given to the needs of children of compulsory school age and only limited expansion of grant-aided nursery provision has been possible. A number of grant-aided nursery schools enrol both Protestant and Roman Catholic children and some grant-maintained integrated schools have non-grant-aided nursery classes. Statistics on the denominational breakdown of nursery pupils are not available.

Personal Debt

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the latest per capita figure for personal debt, excluding mortgages, in Northern Ireland; and what was the equivalent figure in 1979.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available for Northern Ireland.

New Homes

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the latest available annual figure for new home starts in Northern Ireland; and what was the figure in 1979.

Mr. Needham: In 1990 the number of new home starts in Northern Ireland was 7,527. In 1979 the figure was 6,467.

Homelessness

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the latest available figure for homelessness in Northern Ireland; and what was the equivalent figure for 1979.

Mr. Needham: It is not possible to give a figure for the total number of homeless people in Northern Ireland at any specific point in time but I am advised by the chief executive of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive that at 1 November 1991 the number of households living in temporary accommodation secured for them under the homelessness provisions of the Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1988 was 205.

Comparable figures for 1979 are not available.

Drug Addiction

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the latest available figure for drug addiction in Northern Ireland; and what was the equivalent figure for 1979.

Mr. Hanley: At 31 October 1991, 51 people were registered as drug addicts in Northern Ireland. The equivalent figure at 31 December 1979 was 12.

Benefits

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give the latest available figures for the number of people on (a) income support, (b) family credit and (c) disability benefit and the equivalent for 1979.

Mr. Hanley: Social Security operational matters are the responsibility of Mr. A. Wylie, chief executive of the Social Security Agency. He has written to the hon. Member and copies of his reply will be placed in the Library and the Public Information Office.

Terrorist-related Offences

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people have been sentenced to life imprisonment in Northern Ireland since 1970 on terrorist-related offences; and what were their paramilitary affiliations at the time of conviction.

Dr. Mawhinney: Since 1970, 580 persons have been sentenced to life imprisonment for terrorist offences. At the time of conviction their paramilitary affiliation was as follows:

	Number
PIRA	223
OIRA	11
INLA	85
UVF	140
UDA/UFF	106
Other Loyalists	15

Bed-and-Breakfast Accommodation

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the latest available figure for the number of people in bed-and-breakfast accommodation in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: I understand from the chief executive of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive that at 1 November 1991, 92 households were living in bed-and-breakfast accommodation secured for them under the homelessness provisions of the Housing (Northern Ireland) Order 1988.

Devolved Government

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on progress towards devolved government in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Brooke: The broad aim of Government policy is to seek to return greater responsibility for the affairs of Northern Ireland to locally elected representatives, on a widely acceptable basis and within a wider framework of stable relationships. With that aim in mind, I am at present engaged in discussions with the four main constitutional political parties in Northern Ireland and the Government of the Republic of Ireland, to establish whether a basis can be found for fresh political talks.

EMPLOYMENT

Skilled Labour

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his assessment of the effect on the recruitment of skilled labour of the change in the real average earnings of manual workers in manufacturing industry compared with non-manuals employed in the rest of the private sector.

Mr. Jackson: The real average earnings of non-manual employees in the private sector outside manufacturing have risen relative to those of manual employees in manufacturing over several years. This may have assisted the transfer of labour to sectors of the economy in which employment is growing more rapidly. There is no evidence that it has led to difficulties in the recruitment of skilled labour.

Open-plan Offices

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment his Department has conducted of the success of open-plan Employment Service offices and the response of the staff and public; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Meals and Drinks Allowances

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what guidelines the wages inspectorate uses in determining what deductions are reasonable for meals and drinks; and what are the maximum amounts which employers can deduct for meals and drinks (a) when deductions for accommodation are also being made and (b) when no deductions for accommodation are being made.

Mr. Jackson: Wages inspectors aim to ensure that workers in wages council industries are paid at least minimum remuneration based on the hours they work, the minimum hourly rates determined by the councils and any limit on the amount which may be deducted for accommodation set by the council. They accept deductions for meals and drinks only if these are made by agreement. Workers are entitled to receive their minimum remuneration and not to take any meals or other goods provided by the employer unless they wish to do so. In any case, deductions will normally be accepted only if they do not exceed the cost to the employer of providing the meals and drinks in question.

Working Hours

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will place in the Library the most up-to-date information held by his Department on the link between long working hours and accidents.

Mr. Jackson: The HSE has recently commissioned an update of the publication "Shift Work and Health—A critical review of the literature" by Professor J. M. Harrington. This update, by J. M. Waterhouse, S. Folkard and D. S. Minors and provisionally entitled "Shiftwork, Health and Safety—An overview of the scientific literature 1978-1990" will be published shortly. I will arrange for a copy to be placed in the Library as soon as it is available.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the Government's policy on the European Community directive on working time; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), Official Report, 5 November 1991, columns 71-72.

Mines Safety

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he last discussed safety in mines with (a) the European Commission and (b) the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) have regular discussions with the European Commission and the Council of Ministers on matters concerning health and safety in industry as a whole, including mining. A European directive detailing minimum health and safety requirements for mines is being prepared by the European Commission which will give an opportunity for more specific discussion on mining safety.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total of fatal accidents and major injuries, respectively, in coal mines owned (a) by British Coal and (b) others, in the current year and in each of the preceding five years.

Mr. Jackson: The latest available information on accidents and injuries in coal mines is for 1990-91. The table gives the information for the period 1986-87 to 1990-91.

	Fatal		Major injuries
	BCC	Other coal mines	BCC	Other coal mines
1986-87	15	3	952	30
1987-88	9	3	729	27
1988-89	18	2	685	25
1989-90	18	1	587	23
1990-91[1]	11	1	501	13

[1] Provisional

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many safety investigations have been carried out in the current year and two preceding years into cases where people have been asleep underground.

Mr. Jackson: There is no record of a safety investigation being carried out by HM mines inspectorate in respect of a person being found asleep underground.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Housing Benefit

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many housing benefit claimants in Liverpool are awaiting payment of outstanding housing benefit; what is the total sum involved; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The day-to-day administration of the housing benefit scheme is the responsibility of local authorities. The information requested is not therefore available.

Homes (Repossessions)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many unemployed persons claiming income support were dispossessed of their homes each year since 1979.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not collected. However, income support help with mortgage interest may be paid direct to the lender where the claimant has arrears and it is in the family's interests to do so. Lenders do not normally repossess where direct payment arrangements are made. On 5 November at columns 94-95 my right hon. Friend the Minister of State announced that we shall be strengthening these arrangements to improve their effectiveness.

Nebulisers

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his most-up-to-date estimate of the number of cases and total cost of assistance by way of one-off payments for the purchase of nebulisers in the past five years.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is not available.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many more pensioners will be eligible for severe weather payments arising from the ability to claim income support arising from the uprating statement.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on 5 November. All pensioners who receive income support are eligible for a cold weather payment.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total of severe weather payments paid by benefit offices covering Nottingham, North constituency for each of the last five years; if he will break down this figure by week or payment; and if he will estimate the number of claimants involved.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available in the form requested. Such information as is available is in the Library.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the operation of the severe weather payments scheme proposed for the coming winter.

Mr. Scott: The cold weather payments scheme has been considerably improved for the coming winter. Payments of £6 for every period of cold weather will be paid automatically to eligible people as soon as a seven-day period of exceptionally cold weather is forecast by the Met Office or actually occurs. The capital rule has also been abolished, making approximately 400,000 more people eligible for payments.

In addition some improvements have been made to weather station linkages.

Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the current cost of the information received from the meteorological service for the purpose of calculating cold weather payments.

Mr. Scott: The Meteorological Office charged this Department £5,984·32 to provide the information necessary for the calculation of cold weather payments for the winter 1990-91.

Income Support

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many income support claimants, according to the latest figures, are (a) single persons and (b) married couples or living with partners, and in the case of (b), how many are childless, or where they have children, what is the average size of family.

Miss Widdecombe: There are 3·48 million single people in receipt of income support of which 810,000 have child dependents. There are 690,000 married couples or couples living together of which 330,000 have child dependents. The average number of children in couples' families is 2·22.
Note:
For the purposes of this reply, the term "child" is taken to include dependents aged 16-19.
Source: ASE May 1990.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will supply the numbers for each client group claiming income support for each of the years since its introduction in Nottingham, North constituency.

Miss Widdecombe: I understand from Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency, that the information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what plans he has to monitor the effects of the Income Support (General Amendment) Regulations, S.I., 1991, No. 1559, on new claimants who are not covered by transitional protection and not entitled to family credit;
(2) how many people he estimates will lose entitlement to income support and not be entitled to family credit as a result of the Income Support (General Amendment) Regulations, S.I., 1991, No. 1559;
(3) how many claimants currently receiving income support will need transitional protection as a result of the Income Support (General Amendment) Regulations, S.I., 1991, No. 1559; and what he anticipates the total cost of that transitional protection will be;
(4) how much his Department will save on payments of income support as a result of the reduction from 24 to 16 hours in the number of hours claimants can work.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 5 November 1991]: The reduction in the remunerative work rule from 24 to 16 hours in the income-related benefits comes into effect from April 1992. It is part of a package of measures which will result in many working families with children being better-off through easier access to family credit. The estimated cost of the change across the benefits is expected to be around £50 million in the first year reducing to about £25 million in the longer term.

Claimants who are working, or whose partners are working, between 16 and 24 hours a week and receiving income support at the point of change will not lose their entitlement to that benefit. Around 30,000 of them are likely to be families with children who will be entitled to more family credit than they would otherwise receive in income support. A similar number, about 30,000, will remain on income support under provisions giving them indefinite protection at an estimated cost of £30 million in the first year. It is expected that a further 35,000 parents, who are already working 16 hours or more and who are not yet on benefit, will come on to family credit in due course after April 1992, and that many more people will be attracted into work and on to family credit in the longer term and so become better off. However, because of likely behavioural changes it is not possible to forecast with any degree of accuracy what the net effect might be on claims for income support made after April 1992. We will be carefully monitoring the effects of the change in the remunerative work rule in all the income-related benefits.

Benefits

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he is taking to reduce the time between his uprating announcement and the first payment of the uprated benefits.

Miss Widdecombe: The uprating date was moved to April in 1986 to align changes in social security benefits as closely as possible with the tax year and the local authority financial year. In order to ensure that the new benefit rates are implemented smoothly and efficiently to all beneficiaries in April, it is still necessary to announce them the previous autumn.

Mortgage Interest

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has for meeting mortgage interests costs through housing benefit.

Miss Widdecombe: Help with mortgage interest is currently given through income support. We have no plans to extend these arrangements.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many questions he has not answered in the last year because of disproportionate costs.

Miss Widdecombe: In the last year 70 questions were not answered because of disproportionate cost.

National Insurance

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will investigate the case of Mr. Derek Merralls of 48 Worlingham road, London: and if he will review his Department's policy with regard to the payment of unemployment benefit to employees from whom national insurance payments have been deducted by an employer but not paid into the national insurance fund by an employer.

Mr. Jack: The case of Mr. Derek Merralls and the Department's policy on the effect on unemployment benefit of non-payment of national insurance contributions by employers is a matter for Miss Ann Chant, the chief executive of the Contributions Agency. She will write to my right hon. Friend and a copy will be placed in the Library and the Public Information Office.

War Disability Pensions

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much the Government spend anually on war disability pensions; and how many staff are employed in his Department on this.

Miss Widdecombe: Net expenditure on war disablement pensions in the financial year 1990-91 was about £570 million. About 1,050 staff are employed on all aspects of war pensions work, including the welfare service.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the cost to his Department of the 90 per cent. rebates paid to local authorities by central Government by way of the standard rebate scheme for those on war disability pensions.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is not available. Overall figures for the amount of subsidy for housing benefit and community charge benefit are held, but it is not possible to obtain a breakdown within that of subsidy paid in respect of particular groups.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the local authorities in the south, south-east and south-west which use their discretionary powers to increase the rebates paid to those on war disability pension to above the 90 per cent. rebate refunded by central Government; and what is the total cost to the community charge payers of each local authority which uses its discretionary powers in this way.

Miss Widdecombe: In the year 1990-91, 277 of the 370 local authorities in England reported that they excercised their discretionary power to disregard more than the statutory £10 of a war disablement pension. These local authorities are listed in the table. The most up-to-date information held of the total cost to local authorities of operating local schemes in respect of war disablement and war widows' pensions is for the 1989-90 financial year. In that year the costs incurred in respect of rate rebates was in the order of £4·3 million and in the order of £10 million in respect of rent rebates and allowances. It is not possible to break down these figures between war disablement and war widows' pensions.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Water Protection

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to assess the impact of the code of good agricultural practice for the protection of water.

Mr. Curry: The main indications to date of the success of this recently published document have been the high demand for it and the warm welcome that it has received from the NRA and other interested organisations. Our officials will be discussing with these organisations how best to monitor its impact.

Wild-caught Birds

Mr. Gale: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will discuss the trade in wild-caught birds at the next meeting of the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Curry: A new Community directive on the protection of animals, including birds, during transport was agreed in the Agricultural Council on 21-22 October. Following pressure from the United Kingdom the directive requires additional rules to be established to address the welfare problems in the trade in wild birds. We will be pressing for an early decision on this matter. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is also seeking to place the topic on the agenda for the Environment Council on 9 December 1991.

Salmon

Mr. Beith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) whether he will list all the bodies and individuals from whom he received formal or informal representations about the east coast salmon fisheries between the date when the report on the fisheries was first delivered to his Department and the date of its publication; and whether he will list any further bodies or individuals whom he consulted on the matter;

(2) if he will list the changes made to the text of the report on east coast salmon fisheries between the day it was delivered to his Department and the day it was published.

Mr. Curry: We received very many representations on the matter of the statutory review of the east coast salmon net fisheries, dating from the undertaking to prepare a review which was given to Parliament during the passage of the Salmon Bill in 1986, until its presentation to Parliament in October 1991. There were, however, no consultations about the report or its contents which, as section 39 of the Act makes clear, are matters for my right hon. Friends the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretary of State for Scotland to consider and present to Parliament. As the report itself describes, scientists from the Fisheries Department of MAFF and the Scottish Office prepared a very detailed background document for us. The only significant change made to it after its receipt involved revisions to the text to reflect the 1990 catch data which later became available for the review area. This updating was mentioned to the House by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House on 22 July.

Common Agricultural Policy Products

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will bring up to date the information on sheepmeat and on common agricultural policy product sales in his written answers dated 28 April 1986, Official Report, columns 315-16.

Mr. Curry: The following figures show the amount by which the average market price of sheepmeat fell short of the guide price during the marketing years 1986 to 1990:

Year	Great Britain p/kg	Northern Ireland p/kg
1986	42·2	33·5
1987	43·1	26·1
1988	69·7	38·7
1989	62·2	44·2
1990	83·7	87·2

The average market prices for sheepmeat for the week beginning 14 October are currently forecast as being below the seasonal guide price by 125p/kg for Great Britain and 89p/kg for Northern Ireland, but because of seasonal variations this is not an indication of the eventual figure for the marketing year.

The following table gives updated details of exports of selected common agricultural policy commodities to non-EC countries in 1990. Expenditure on export refunds in 1990 was 7,722 million ecu.

	'000 tonnes EC12
Wheat	16,635
Wheat flour	2,907
Barley	9,655
Malt	1,350

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish a table showing for the principal agricultural products regulated under the common agricultural policy the amount of levy payable on importation from non-EEC countries, the amount of the levy and any customs duties payable, the latest United Kingdom price, the intervention or threshold price, the target price and the world price.

Mr. Curry: Information on intervention, threshold and target prices was set out in the note deposited in the Library of the House giving details of the common agricultural policy prices settlement 1991-92. Details of customs duties are contained in the "Integrated Tariff of the United Kingdom", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. The remainder of the information requested is set out for the main commodities in tables 1 and 2. The world prices shown in table 1 are generally the lowest offer prices at the Community frontier underlying the Commission's calculation of variable import levies. I would remind the hon. Member that these are the lowest prices recorded and it is almost certain that higher prices on average would have to be paid for supplies if existing agricultural support policies were dismantled. The world prices shown do not necessarily relate to the same quality or presentation of products for which United Kingdom market prices are set out in table 2.

Table 1

Levy applicable in the United Kingdom and notional "World" price (a) on 26 October 1991 for the main traded agricultural commodities

	Levy (b) applicable in the UK (£/tonne)	Notional "world" price (£/tonne)
Common wheat	119	67
Barley	109	61
Maize	95	75
Rice	277	157
Sugar	(c) 340	170
Olive oil	468	1,043
Butter	(d) 1,984	637
Skimmed milk powder	920	630
Cheese (Cheddar)	1,794	956
Beef and veal	(e) 1,990	1,079
Pigmeat	521	754
Sheepmeat	(f) n/a	n/a
Poultrymeat	281	903
Eggs	274	679

Note:

(a) "World" prices have been calculated by subtracting the levy applicable on 26 October from the threshold/guide price. The beef price is also adjusted for duty. In the case of pigmeat, poultrymeat and eggs, the "world" price has been taken as the sluicegate price for the headings defined in (b) below. The resulting estimate has been converted from ECU/t at the appropriate market rate of exchange of £0·806057=1 ECU.

(b) The rates of levy vary for different tariff headings. The rates quoted are: beef and veal—carcase; pigmeat—carcase; poultrymeat—70 per cent. chickens; rice—husked long grain; olive oil—virgin lampante: eggs—in shell.

(c) In practice the United Kingdom's imports from third countries are normally covered by the Lome Convention and enter the Community levy-free.

(d) A special lower rate of levy is applicable to imports of butter from New Zealand.

(e) Most imports of beef from third countries are subject to special arrangements allowing entry at reduced levy rates.

(f) Imports of lamb under voluntary restraint arrangements with principal suppliers and related agreements enter free of charge. Any imports outside these arrangements are subject to levies which cannot exceed the 20 per cent. tariff bound in the GATT.

Farms

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish a table showing the concentration of agricultural land holdings and the decline in the number of farmers since 1961 in the United Kingdom and other EC countries.

Mr. Curry: This information is not available in the form requested.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish a table showing the number of (a) holdings and (b) owners accounting for 25 per cent. and 50 per cent. of (i) farm land, excluding woodland and rough grazing, (ii) beef cattle, (iii) dairy cattle, (iv) cereals, (v) rapeseed and (vi) sugar beet.

Mr. Curry: The information requested is not readily available in the form requested. However, the following tables show for England and Wales, for 1990, the distribution of holdings by size in respect of each of items requested. Information on ownership is not available.

Meat

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how the new regulations under the Food Safety Act 1990, to control illegal drug residues in meat, will be enforced.

Mr. Maclean: The new regulations will be enforced at slaughterhouses and on farm by members of the state veterinary service carrying out checks on meat and animals. Similarly, local authorities will be responsible for meat sold at retail outlets.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the proportion of costs of implementing the environmentally sensitive areas policy constituted by (a) administration, (b) monitoring, (c) payments to farmers and (d) other costs.

Mr. Curry: Over the period 1986-87 to 1990-91, the payments to farmers in England have accounted for approximately 75 per cent. of the total costs of the ESA scheme, the balance being taken up by administration which includes conservation advice to participating farmers and monitoring to assess the economic and environmental impacts of the scheme. It is not possible to provide a precise breakdown between the administrative and monitoring costs, but they have been broadly equal.

Sheep and Goat Milk

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to announce standards for the commercial production of sheep and goat milk; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The European Commission has proposed a new Community-wide milk hygiene framework covering milk and milk products from cows, goats, sheep and buffaloes. This is intended to come into force on 1 January 1993. The Government are pressing for effective progress to be made in negotiations so that realistic standards can be introduced by this date or as soon as possible thereafter. In the meantime, the production and sale of goat and sheep milk continues to be subject to the general provisions of the Food Safety Act 1990, general food hygiene and labelling regulations and specific codes of practice.

DEFENCE

Sea Training Facilities

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what sea training facilities are currently available at HMS Wessex, HMS Sussex and HMS Claverhouse; and what is their current usage rate.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: HMS Wessex, HMS Sussex and HMS Claverhouse have River class minesweepers; HMS Itchen, HMS Arun and HMS Spey respectively. The time spent at sea is approximately 20 per cent. of the time available when allowance is made for the ships to undergo essential maintenance and repair. In addition to training at sea other essential training activities are conducted alongside.

Fishery Protection

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the Royal Navy has been able to meet the requirement for fishery protection in 1991-92; which ships are currently committed to the coastal division of the fishery protection squadron; and what plans he has to fulfil the fishery protection requirement in 1992-93.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Royal Navy fishery protection squadron is on target to meet the level of patrolling for 1991-92 agreed with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department. HMS Blackwater, Soberton, Brinton, Kellington, Sheraton and Iveston are currently assigned to the coastal division of the fishery protection squadron. Plans for fishery protection in 1992-93 have not yet been decided.

Minesweepers

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those River class minesweepers currently in service, together with their current squadron allocation and tasks.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The following River class minesweepers are in service:

HMS Blackwater, HMS Arun, HMS Carron, HMS Dovey, HMS Helford, HMS Humber, HMS Orwell, HMS Spey, HMS Waveney, HMS Itchen.

HMS Blackwater is employed on fishery protection duties with the fishery protection squadron, HMS Itchen is in refit and the remainder are allocated to the 10th mine counter-measures squadron and are used for sea training by the Royal Naval Reserve.

HMS Humber and Helmsdale

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when HMS Humber and HMS Helmsdale were commissioned; what was their planned length of service; and why they are to be placed in reserve.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: HMS Humber was commissioned on 7 June 1985; HMS Helmsdale was commissioned on 1 March 1986. It is not our practice to disclose the planned length of service for vessels. Placing HMS Helmsdale and HMS Ribble, but not HMS Humber, in reserve enables reductions in running costs to be made while retaining the ships, which can be prepared for operations at short notice, as part of our MCM capability.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) on what date he replied to the letter from the hon. Member for Walsall, North dated 5 August 1991 concerning a service medal for a constituent; on what date his Department wrote directly to the constituent; on what date a copy of his Department's letter to the constituent was sent to the hon. Member; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will make it his practice to reply directly to the hon. Member when he receives a letter from an hon. Member dealing with a constituent's cases.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will write to the hon. Member.

HEALTH

Ealing Health Authority

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the expenditure in real and cash terms by (a) Ealing health authority and (b) Ealing hospital since the inception of each; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: Figures of total revenue expenditure recorded in the annual accounts of Ealing health authority since its establishment on 1 April 1982 are shown in the table. The information about Ealing hospital is not held centrally. My hon. Friend may wish to write to Lady Eccles of Moulton, the chairman of Ealing health authority, for details.

	£000 cash	£000 at 1990-91 prices
1982-83	34,522	53,674
1983-84	36,235	53,850
1984-85	39,602	56,008
1985-86	40,265	54,003
1986-87	44,131	57,230
1987-88	46,772	57,520
1988-89	53,102	60,862
1989-90	58,157	62,664
1990-91	62,729	62,729

Note: Figures for the earlier years have been expressed at 1990-91 prices by the use of the Gross Domestic Product (GDP) deflator.

Road Accidents

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many hospitals imposed the charges for emergency treatment after road accidents, as laid down in sections 157 and 158 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 in each year since 1988; and what are the average charges;

(2) when (a) Guy's and (b) Lewisham hospitals introduced the charges for emergency treatment after road accidents, as laid down in sections 157 and 158 of the Road Traffic Act 1988; and what are the average charges for (a) Guy's and (b) Lewisham hospitals in each year since their introduction.

Mr. Dorrell: All health authorities and NHS trusts may collect an emergency treatment fee, at a flat rate of £19·30, for immediate medical attention required following a road traffic accident and they may also collect charges for any subsequent in or out-patient treatment, up to ceilings of £2,667 and £267 respectively. Provision for these charges was made in the Road Traffic Acts 1930, 1933 and 1934 and has been carried forward in later legislation by successive Governments. Motorists are legally required to insure against these charges and those for subsequent in and out-patient treatment are collected direct from insurance companies.

Bio Products Laboratory

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what measures the Bio Products Laboratory has introduced to conform to fair trading and fair competition practices as currently apply to the commercial plasma industry in the United Kingdom since 1 April;

(2) from what date the Bio Products Laboratory will start charging for whole blood and plasma derivative products such as Albumin and Factor VIII at prices that accurately reflect the total costs including blood and plasma collection, Factor VIII BSM royalty and product licence application fee costs;

(3) what measures are being taken to ensure the maintenance of a free market and free competition between the public and private plasma industry; and how clinical choice, pricing, research and development, investment and patient safety will be maintained.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It has been the policy of successive Governments that this country should be self-sufficient in blood products derived from plasma donated by our unpaid voluntary donors. This position is consistent with the more recent decision by the European Community to promote a policy of Community self-sufficiency based on voluntary blood donation.

We also recognise that doctors should be free to prescribe the most appropriate product for their patients in the light of the available clinical information. NHS clinicians may, therefore, prescribe blood products from commercial suppliers and not just those from the Bio Products Laboratory.

Within the overall policy we intend that BPL should compete fairly in terms of the service, quality, and price of its blood products.

For this reason we introduced cross-charging in 1989 and reversed the previous arrangements whereby BPL products were supplied free of charge in return for plasma. The removal of Crown immunity from 1 April 1991 brought the BPL products within the scope of the formal licensing arrangements under the Medicines Act.

Nottingham DHA

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health by how much Nottingham district health authority overspent or underspent in each of the last five financial years; and what estimate he has of projected overspend in the current year.

Mr. Dorrell: District health authorities are financially accountable to their regional health authorities. The hon. Member may wish to contact Sir Michael Carlisle, the chairman of Trent regional health authority, for details.

Health Benefits

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many of the certificates issued under the low income scheme for health benefits in 1990-91 were for (a) full exemption and (b) partial exemption.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: During the 1990-91 financial year the number of certificates issued totalled 887,722. Of these, 398,429 were for full exemption and 489,293 partial exemption.

Income Generation

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assistance is given to the private health sector arising from the work of the income generation unit; and what fees are paid for such services.

Mr. Dorrell: The income generation unit promoted closer co-operation between the NHS and the private sector. This development contributed significantly to the estimated £50 million contribution to NHS resources which was made by the income generation initiative in 1990-91.

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much income has been generated in the NHS for each of the financial years 1989-90 and 1990-91 both in total and in the following areas, (a) commercial concessions to retailers and other businesses, (b) advertising facilities, (c) catering services, (d) sale of services, including health screening, child minding, waste disposal and heating, (e) car parking facilities and (f) the sale of goods, equipment and materials.

Mr. Dorrell: Information is not collected centrally in the form requested. The net benefit to the NHS from income generation activity in 1989-90 was £25·8 million and reports for 1990-91 are expected to reveal a net benefit of around £50 million.

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the income generation projects undertaken by the Trent regional health authority which were developed and implemented with the help of the income generation unit, together with the amounts of income generated from each project.

Mr. Dorrell: The role of the income generation unit was to promulgate advice generally and Trent in common with other regions benefited from that advice. But as was the case with all regions, it was open to Trent to seek advice from the central unit at any time and on any matter as the need arose.

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what forms of advice the income generation unit provides to hospital trusts.

Mr. Dorrell: The income generation unit gave advice to NHS trusts in the same way as it provided advice to all other authorities and units of the NHS.

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give details of the national policy on income generation that has been formulated by the income generation unit.

Mr. Dorrell: The policy of the NHS is to promote the generation of secondary income from outside the NHS in any way feasible which is profitable, ethical and within the law, provided that the schemes are not in conflict with the broad aims of the NHS. The fundamental principle underpinning all income generation activity is that it should not adversely affect NHS patient care.

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will arrange for the production and publication of an annual report on the work of the income generation unit.

Mr. Dorrell: The unit no longer exists.

Contraceptive Advice

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the Department of Health maintains a register of centres providing specialist contraceptive advice for young people.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. It is for individual health authorities to determine and arrange provision of the family planning services appropriate to particular local needs. Health authorities have been asked to bear in mind the need for separate, less formal arrangements for young people.

Hospital Trusts

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will set out the starting salary for each chief executive of a hospital trust and the latest salary in each case.

Mr. Dorrell: NHS trust chief executives are employed by their trust board; their terms and conditions of service are a matter for them.

Incontinence Pads

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the average number of incontinence pads supplied daily free by local health authorities;

(2) if he will list the local health authorities which have been charging for incontinence pads; and if such payments continue.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not held centrally.

Liverpool Children's Hospital

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last visited the Royal Liverpool Children's hospital, Alder Hey; whom he met; and what subjects were discussed.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I visited the Royal Liverpool children's hospital, Alder Hey, on 21 June this year. During my visit I saw the recently upgraded oncology and haematology ward and the paediatric intensive care unit and had the opportunity to meet many senior clinicians and members of the nursing staff, patients and parents to discuss the various methods of care and treatment.

Hospital Trusts

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will set out the names of those who have been appointed chief executives of hospital trusts and their previous position prior to being appointed chief executive.

Mr. Dorrell: The names of the chief executives of the NHS trusts which became operational on 1 April 1991 are given in the table. Second wave trusts, which will become operational on 1 April 1992, are now in the process of appointing chief executives. Matters relating to the appointment and employment of NHS trust chief executives are for NHS trust boards; information regarding chief executives' previous employment is not held centrally.

Care Homes

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his policy towards the three-tier care standards arrangement proposed by the Hertfordshire county council for care homes being leased to the private sector.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I understand that Hertfordshire county council has made no such proposal. The council commissioned a study of options for the future management of its residential care homes and those options are currently under consideration by the council's social services committee.

Local authority residential care homes should match the standards required of homes registered under the Residential Home Act. This standard should be available to all residents and is not linked to the ability of individual residents to meet the costs.

Drugs Testing

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what independent monitoring or evaluation of the data submitted by general practitioners and hospital doctors concerning the testing of new drugs is carried out by his Department's Committee on Safety of Medicines prior to the licensing of such drugs.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A company is required to certify the accuracy of all the results from clinical trial data, submitted in support of a product licence application for a new drug. The Committee on Safety of Medicines, comprising eminent experts in the fields of medicine, science and pharmacy, carefully evaluates these data and has to be satisfied as to the safety, quality and efficacy of the drug in question before advising the Licensing Authority on whether or not a product licence should be granted.

Published guidelines require companies to establish procedures for the organisation, conduct, documentation and verification of clinical trials, and for the audit and archiving of clinical trial data.

Health Service Staff

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each national health service region (a) the number of female district general managers and (b) the district health authorities they manage.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 5 November 1991]: As at 6 November 1991 there were 10 female district general managers. The table shows the breakdown by region and what district they manage.

Region	District
North West Thames RHA	North Bedfordshire
North East Thames RHA	West Essex
	Hampstead
East Anglian RHA	Cambridge
North Western RHA	North Manchester
	Rochdale
South East Thames RHA	Hastings
South West Thames RHA	Croydon
South Western RHA	Frenchay
Trent RHA	Central Notts

Total number of female DGM's: 10

General Practioner Earnings

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the average current earning levels of general practitioners.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to the reply, 5 November c. 101]: In 1990-91, the first year of the new contract, estimated gross payments to general practitioners averaged some £5,951 per GP in excess of the intended level. We shall not know how much of this sum falls to be recovered under the normal balancing arrangements for dealing with over and underpayments until autumn 1992, when we have full information on GPs' practice expenses in 1990-91. I can well understand the profession's concern at the prospect of an overpayment of this order hanging over successive pay rounds. Nor would I want difficulties with the workings of the remuneration system to obscure the undoubted achievements of the new GP contract and the benefits that it is bringing to patients. So I believe it right to begin to address the issues now.

As a first step, I have considered carefully the different elements of the 1990-91 overpayment. The General Medical Services Committee has drawn attention to two factors—both concerning the handling of target payments in this first year of the contract—which they have suggested merit special treatment.

First, it is now clear that the Government's decision to bring higher target payments within average net income for nine months, as part of the staging of the award, interacted with the Doctors' and Dentists' Review Body's underestimate of the number of GPs who would achieve higher targets, to add a sum of £1,800 per GP to the overpayment. A separate decision to pay a "fifth target payment" to help maintain cash flow to individual GPs while the target payments system was being introduced added a further £300 to this. I have concluded that it would not be right for the Government to recover either of these sums. They result from special factors, unique to 1990-91, and can and should be excluded from the sum to be recovered, without prejudice to the normal principles of the balancing mechanism. So I have decided now to waive £2,100 of the 1990-91 overpayment as the profession has asked. This is equivalent to a sum of £63 million for Great Britain.

We shall need to return to the handling of the outstanding sum in the autumn of 1992, when we have further information. But in the meantime there are other issues for Government and the profession to address together. The latest information suggests that the fee scale set for 1991-92 is continuing to deliver a higher level of income than intended, although on a lesser scale than in 1990-91. Neither Government nor profession wishes to see the overpayment accumulate further, and we must therefore work together on evidence for the Doctors' and Dentists' Review Body to help them ensure that arrangements are brought properly into balance in 1992-93, when they determine the new level of income for that year.

We shall also need to take account of the experience of the first two years of the contract as we work together to develop it further. In looking to the future I shall wish to explore particularly the scope for developing the contract and remuneration system in ways that are more sensitive to local needs and circumstances. I also have in mind the further development of the performance-related elements of the contract, in the light of the Government's policy set out in the citizens charter. The profession may want to add other issues arising from their wide-ranging consultation on their document, "Building Your Own Future".

I therefore propose to invite the GMSC to work with Department of Health officials to agree proposals in time to put evidence to the DDRB for the 1992 pay round—when recovery of the 1990-91 overpayment falls due and all the necessary information will be available—covering:

(a) the handling of the overpayments already incurred—including the possibilities of accelerated repayment of the remaining amounts and of waiving an additional sum as part of a wider package; and

(b) the best way of developing incentive fee scales within the remuneration system, in pursuit of the policy objectives I have outlined.

I believe this represents a substantive response to the profession's understandable concerns. We have addressed those elements of the 1990-91 overpayment which clearly merit exceptional treatment and where we have enough evidence to act now. We have also set the framework for constructive discussion on the handling of the remaining pay issues in support of the GP contract through the 1992-93 pay round and beyond. I look to the profession for a similarly constructive response.

Food Hygiene

Mr. Pike: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the current position of food hygiene training requirements in relation to the Food Safety Act 1990; and on the relative operative date for these regulations.

Mr. Dorrell: I have been asked to reply.

Following comments made in response to our general consultative paper on food hygiene training, we have been considering what the scope of the regulations should be and will be announcing our conclusions in due course. No operative date has yet been fixed.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the registration of all food premises with local authorities in accordance with the Food Safety Act 1990 will become compulsory; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: I have been asked to reply.

Draft regulations on registration of premises used for a food business have been issued for public consultation. We shall be laying the definitive regulations shortly.

Written Answers to Questions

Friday 8 November 1991

TRANSPORT

Motor Vehicles

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether he will publish the conformity of production exhaust emission standards for motor cars approved for use in the United Kingdom;

(2) when he intends to introduce MOT test standards based on conformity of production emission limits; and if he intends to use these in roadside spotcheck programmes.

Mr. Chope: The current United Kingdom conformity of production standard for CO emission from petrol-engined vehicles is 4·5 per cent. which is 1 per cent. more than the type approval standard to allow for manufacturing tolerance. This is the same as in the EC. These are the standards to which we are testing.

Road Schemes

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he proposes to publish the criteria for accepting requests made under the new compensation provisions of the New Road and Street Works Act 1991 for the purchase of properties affected by road schemes.

Mr. Chope: I believe my hon. Friend has in mind section 62 of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991 which gives authorities discretion to acquire property seriously affected by public works. The criteria to be applied to the Department's road schemes are under consideration.

Rail Service, Leicester

Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has yet reached a decision on the proposed passenger rail service to run from Leicester through the South Derbyshire coalfield to Burton on Trent, Toyota and Derby.

Mr. McLoughlin: I hope to make announcements about the allocation of resources for local public transport projects in 1992-93 shortly.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps are being taken to ensure that standards in the construction of the channel tunnel rail link meet the requirements for new railway construction laid down by the European Community.

Mr. Freeman: There are no such EC requirements.

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when he expects to announce details of the arrangements for working up the new route for the new railway to the channel tunnel;

(2) if he will ensure that the study of the new rail link to be built to the channel tunnel includes full appraisal of the route needed for through running of international passenger and freight trains beyond London;

(3) when the status of Ove Arup will be clarified to enable the company once again to enter into discussions with the citizens of Mid-Kent on the alignment, environmental protection measures and other causes of concern of the channel link.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. and learned Friend has asked British Rail to carry out the next phase of developing the route in close consultation with the Government and the private sector and take the lead in consulting the public. We shall announce more details of the arrangements as soon as we are able to. The work to be done will include examination of the implications of the route for international freight and passenger services to and from both London and beyond.

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will provide additional funds to British Rail to enable it to fulfil its obligation to purchase properties rendered unsaleable by their safeguarded railway corridor between Detling and Cheriton and to act as a buyer of last resort in compassionate cases.

Mr. Freeman: British Rail's offer remains open to buy any domestic property within the safeguarded zone between Detling and Cheriton. There are no present plans to broaden the terms of, or area covered by, the voluntary purchase scheme for this route section.

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of containers currently being carried on the European railway network could reach (a) London and (b) Liverpool (i) now and (ii) in 10 years' time on tracks currently operated by BR.

Mr. Freeman: BR's European container services to London and Liverpool can at present accept all standard ISO containers as well as 2·5m wide pallet containers and 12·2m long swap bodies. When the channel tunnel opens in 1993 BR will be able to accept between 90 and 95 per cent. of all containers in use on other European railways. In the longer term, the percentage will depend on future developments in the global container market.

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss his invitation to anyone to take BR's freight operation off his hands; if he has any plans to assist towards that outcome; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. Friend regularly meets the chairman of British Rail to discuss a variety of issues, including progress on his rail freight initiative. The Government intend to seek substantial privatisation of BR in the next Parliament. Meanwhile, my right hon. Friend wrote to the chairman on 9 October asking BR to give positive and sympathetic consideration to reasonable proposals from the private sector to introduce new freight or passenger services. We look forward to BR's response.

Queen Elizabeth II Bridge

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the procedures to be followed by householders who live near the Queen Elizabeth II bridge at Dartford, and who wish to process a claim for compensation for enhanced noise levels due to a faster throughput of traffic; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will publish the compensation entitlement of householders who live near to the Queen Elizabeth II bridge at Dartford, or the approach/exit roads thereto, and who find themselves affected by enhanced noise levels due to a faster throughput of traffic; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Notices will be published soon in the local press describing the procedures for claiming compensation under part I of the Land Compensation Act 1973 for depreciation in value of property. Details of the procedure and conditions of eligibility are further described in a booklet "Your Home and Nuisance from Public Development", available from the Department's regional office at Federated house, Dorking. The claim period lasts six years commencing from a date 12 months after the new road was opened to traffic on 30 October 1991. Special provisions apply for those selling their houses within the first 12 months after completion of the works.

Under part I of the Land Compensation Act 1973, there is a right to claim compensation for depreciation of more than £50 in the value of land (including buildings) caused by specified physical factors (noise, vibration, smell, fumes, smoke and artificial lighting and the discharge on to the land in respect of which the claim is made of any solid or liquid substance) arising from the use (but not its construction) of a new or altered highway. If compensation is payable, reasonable valuation or legal fees incurred by claimants in making claims will also be paid. Interest is payable from the date the claim is received or the first claim day, whichever is later, until the compensation is paid.

Bus Passes

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to make a free bus pass available to all pensioners as of right; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: We have no plans to change the present arrangements. Local authorities already have powers to provide pensioners with free or reduced price bus travel. The decision on what to provide is one for the local authority in the light of local demand and the resources that they can make available.

ENERGY

Gas

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when reserves of British gas are likely to run out on current consumption levels.

Mr. Moynihan: The 1991 Brown Book (Development of the Oil and Gas Resources of the United Kingdom; a report to Parliament by the Secretary of State for Energy) showed the estimated remaining gas reserves of the UKCS to lie in the range 963-3345 billion cubic metres (bcm). Total consumption in 1990 was estimated at approximately 59 bcm. Over the last decade additions to reserves have exceeded consumption: the 1981 Brown Book showed estimated reserves in the range 750-2150 bcm. The United Kingdom will remain a major producer of gas well into the next century.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will identify the consumption levels of British gas for the next century in 10-yearly periods.

Mr. Moynihan: My Department published a range of scenarios of United Kingdom energy consumption (up to 2020) based on oil price assumptions supplied by the intergovernmental group on climate change in Energy Paper number 58. A copy of this paper has been placed in the Library of the House.

Coal-burning Schemes

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the level of investment provided for research into and promotion of clean coal-burning schemes within the United Kingdom; and what proportion of the total energy budget this constitutes.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Both British Coal and my Department are supporting a wide range of research and development projects to develop cleaner coal technologies. The development of these technologies is a collaborative exercise and many of the projects also involve United Kingdom industry and overseas organisations such as the European Commission and the International Energy Agency. The value of contracts in the Department's current coal R and D programme are worth over £115 million with Department support of over £21 million. One of the most important of these projects is the development of British Coal's topping cycle technology which is taking place at Grimethorpe and its coal research establishment. Information on total spending by industry in the United Kingdom on energy-related research is not available to my Department.

Transmission Link

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with the Energy Minister of the Republic of Ireland and the chairman of the National Grid Company concerning the proposals for an undersea transmission link between Wales and the Republic of Ireland, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what proposals there are to link the United Kingdom electricity grid with that of the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: There have been no substantive discussions at ministerial level. However, I understand that the National Grid Company and the Electricity Board of Ireland are considering the matter; it is for them to assess the technical and commercial viability of the project.

Energy Sources

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what percentage of national energy needs are met from (a) coal, (b) oil, (c) windmills, (d) gas and (e) other sources; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: Figures for shares of primary energy consumption in 1990 are as follows:

Fuel	Percentage share Per cent.
Coal	31·3
Oil	35·5
Natural gas	24·1
Other[1]	9·1

[1] Nuclear and natural-flow hydro electricity, and net imports of electricity from France.

The amounts produced from wind power at present represent less than 0·05 per cent. of total primary energy consumption. However, following the 1990 and 1991 Renewables Orders under the non-fossil fuel obligation the regional electricity companies have been obliged to contract for wind power capacity, building up to the substantial level of 94·63 MW. This should considerably enhance the potential for bringing wind power into the electricity market on a competitive basis.

Spent Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether any plutonium separated at Sellafield from the spent nuclear fuel discharged from the JAPCO TOKAI —1 Magnox nuclear plant has ever been co-processed with (a) spent fuel of similar irradiation from electricity board/nuclear board/Scottish Nuclear Magnox plants and (b) spent fuel of similar irradiation from BNFL's Magnox plants.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The policy of British Nuclear Fuels plc is to co-process civil spent fuel from its various home and overseas customers wherever it is operationally desirable to do so. In respect of material from BNFL's own reactors, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Member for South Worcestershire (Mr. Spicer) to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) on 8 December 1988 at column 329.

Windscale

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current arrangements for storage of the filters from the Windscale pile number one damaged in the 1957 fire.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: This is a management matter for BNFL. However, I understand that the filters from Windscale pile number one which became contaminated as a result of the 1957 fire are stored along with other intermediate-level waste at Sellafield.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Private Bills

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council what proposals he has to abolish or reform the private Bills procedure.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have been asked to reply. Proposals will be published very shortly.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Residential Homes

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether residential homes are exempted from policies for exemption for competitive tendering for catering, cleaning and laundry services.

Mr. Hanley: This is a matter for HPSS boards to determine in accordance with my Department's instructions, which provide for exemption for residential homes "where these services are provided on site and clients are directly involved as an integral part of the therapeutic or rehabilitative process".

Civil Defence

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many RIMNET sites for civil defence are in existence in Northern Ireland; how many are fully operational; and what is the maximum level of radiation in centrigrays which they can quantify.

Dr. Mawhinney: Northern Ireland has one fully operational RIMNET site with a further four expected to be in operation by mid-1992. The maximum level of measurable radiation which such sites can quantify is 0·3 centigrays per hour.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many new police officers will be recruited during the next 12 months for front-line duties in the fight against crime as a result of the announcement on 9 October 1991; how many will be deployed in the Metropolitan police area; and if he will publish the names of provincial police forces who will be authorised to recruit additional officers giving details of the number in respect of each force.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend will announce allocations of establishment increases to forces shortly.

Overseas Electors

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons living abroad were registered as electors on the most recent electoral register; how many of them lived in Belgium, Cyprus, France, Spain and South Africa; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: A total of 34,454 overseas electors are included on the electoral register for 1991-92. A breakdown of the total by parliamentary constituency is included in "Electoral Statistics 1991", published by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, a copy of which is in the Library. Information on the number of overseas electors living in particular countries abroad is not held centrally.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will obtain a copy of "United Kingdom, Deficient Policy and Practice for the Protection of Asylum Seekers" published by Amnesty International for his departmental library.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Home Office library already has a copy.

Belmarsh Prison

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of inmates at Belmarsh prison on 1 November.

Mrs. Rumbold: On 1 November there were 658 inmates in Belmarsh prison.

Stress-related Illnesses

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to develop health attention services for staff at prisons in England and Wales to deal with stress-related illnesses.

Mrs. Rumbold: The prison service has developed a stress management package for use by all its staff. Training in the use of this package is currently under way, and the aim is for the majority of staff to receive this training in 1992.

A servicewide scheme of post-incident care was launched in July this year providing care, support and expert counselling for staff suffering stress reactions following traumatic incidents at work. In addition, a lifestyle screening programme has been introduced which covers stress levels as well as other aspects of health. Prison service staff also have access to the confidential counselling services of the civil service occupational health service and the Home Office staff welfare service.

Category A Prisoners

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of prison inmates who have been taken off category A classification in prisons in England and Wales during the last 12 months.

Mrs. Rumbold: During the 12 months up to the end of October 1991, 71 category A inmates were downgraded to category B following review by the category A committee.

Prostitutes, Balham

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what requests he has had from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis for an increase in the number of police officers in the Tooting police division in the light of the presence of prostitutes in the Bedford hill area of Balham; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It is for the Commissioner to decide how to allocate resources between divisions from the overall pool of officers available to him.

The Commissioner is aware of the problem of prostitution in Bedford hill and a local squad is dedicated to combating it. In addition, as a result of discussion with the local police consultative group, the police and Wandsworth council have within the last few weeks set up a working party to explore multi-agency approaches to tackling the problem.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the police stations and the numbers of remand prisoners being held at police stations in the Greater London area on 31 October.

Mrs. Rumbold: On 31 October a total of 166 prisoners were held in the following police stations in the Greater London area:

	Number
Albany Street	10
Bow Road	12
Brentford	5
Camberwell	13
Cannon Row	15
Croydon	5
Deptford	11
Earlsfield	1
Forest Gate	3
Gipsy Hill	3
Horseferry Road	24
Kennington	5
Lambeth	11
Lavender Hill	5
Mitcham	1
Muswell Hill	2
Ruislip	4
Snowhill	2
South Western	10
Teddington	2
Thames	8
Walthamstow	4
West End Central	10

I regret that it is not possible to identify separately remand and other classes of prisoner.

Prisoners (Police Cells)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were being held in police cells in the Cardiff gaol catchment area in the week ending 26 October, how many were (a) sentenced and (b) remanded, and how many were aged 15, 16 or 17 years old.

Mrs. Rumbold: During the week ending 26 October the following number of prisoners who should have been held in Cardiff prison were held in police cells:

	Number
21 October	197
22 October	199
23 October	193
24 October	194
25 October	201

Information on prisoners in police cells is not collected at weekends. It is not now possible to differentiate between remand and other classes of prisoner or to identify the ages of prisoners held on those days.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what guidelines he proposes to govern the use of police cells for overnight stays involving young children and babies accompanying their parents while being questioned;

(2) what discussions he has had with the chief constable of South Wales concerning the children under the age of 10 years kept with their parents in police cells at Fairwater police station, Cardiff, on the night of Sunday 27 October; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It is not proposed to issue guidelines. The police do not, in normal circumstances, allow children to remain with parents in cells. Every effort is made to place children with responsible adults relatives or friends, or to seek assistance from the social services department.

I understand from the chief constable of South Wales constabulary that at 2.20 pm on 27 October a man and woman, of no fixed abode, were arrested and taken to Fairwater police station where it was decided not to grant bail. They were accompanied by seven children. Between 3.45 and 10.55 pm the police made numerous attempts to find accommodation via the social services, but were unsuccessful. The children were therefore housed overnight with the parents in a cell with integral sanitation.

Commission for Racial Equality

Mr. Adley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people are employed by the Commission for Racial Equality, and what is the cost per annum of running the board.

Mrs. Rumbold: On 5 November 1991, the Commission for Racial Equality employed 199 staff. The budget for the financial year 1991-92 is £14,055,000.

THE ARTS

Public Libraries

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Minister for the Arts how many public libraries were open for 45 hours or more per week in 1980; and what is the corresponding figure for 1991.

Mr. Renton: Direct comparisons are not available. Statistics prepared by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy (CIPFA) show that 106 library authorities in England at 31 March 1981 had 761 service points (excluding mobile libraries) open for 45 hours or more per week. At 31 March 1990, the latest year for which statistics are available, 96 authorities reported 572 service points in the same category.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Company Directors

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the increase since 1979 in the real earnings, including fringe benefits, of directors of public companies.

Mr. Maude: I regret that the information is not available.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by (a) Her Majesty's Treasury (b) the Central Office of Information, (c) the Department of National Savings, (d) Her Majesty's Customs and Excise, (e) the Inland Revenue and (f) the HMSO during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (i) the topic, (ii) the commencement date, (iii) the duration and (iv) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 5 November 1991]: Advertising campaigns costing more than £100,000 carried out this year are given in the table. Campaigns that used television in addition to other media are marked with an asterisk. Those without an asterisk did not use television.

HEALTH

Care Homes

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will introduce measures further to safeguard the welfare of residents in residential care and nursing homes.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have today laid before Parliament regulations made under the Registered Homes Act 1984 that will require applicants for registration in respect of residential care and nursing homes to declare any criminal convictions they may have; and to provide proof of their identity on request. The first of these measures reinforces the administrative arrangements already in place under which authorities are advised to ask applicants about criminal convictions, and the police can be asked to make confirmatory checks against their records. Requiring proof of identity should help ensure applicants do not evade these and other checks by giving a false name.

These new requirements will strengthen the hand of registration authorities and help reduce the already small risk of unsuitable applicants becoming registered under the 1984 Act.

Abortions

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list the private clinics licensed to perform abortions which have used, or were planning to use, a macerator to dispose of the bodies of aborted unborn babies, together with the means and place of disposal that each clinic is currently using;

(2) if he will list the private clinics licensed to perform abortions which are currently using a macerator to dispose of the bodies of aborted unborn babies.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This method of disposal is not now considered appropriate. It is being phased out as soon as possible in the few places where it is used. The Department is writing urgently to proprietors of approved places requiring them to use incineration and, where appropriate, to confirm that they have ceased to use maceration as a means of disposal. Compliance will be further monitored through the regular, unannounced inspections by the Department's medical, nursing and investigative officers.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines his Department issues to those places licensed to perform abortions regarding consultation with the mother concerning the disposal of her aborted unborn baby.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This is a matter for the woman concerned to take up with the proprietors of the approved place if she wishes to do so. Where the possibility of research arises, advice has been given about the need to discuss this with the woman so that she can decide whether or not to give consent.

General Practitioners (Overpayment)

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he proposes to take on the overpayment to general practitioners in 1990-91; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) on 7 November at columns 259-60.

Children Act 1989

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to make his first report to Parliament on implementing the Children Act 1989; and if he will introduce regular quarterly reporting on residential child care.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Children Act requires information received from local authorities and others to be laid before Parliament. We expect to lay a report before Parliament on the implementation of the Act by the end of 1992. The statistical return for the first year of operation of the Act should be available in 1993. There are no plans to introduce quarterly reporting on residential child care.

Dentistry

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists within the Trent regional health authority provided dental treatment under the NHS in (a) 1989 and (b) 1990; and what is the number now.

Mr. Dorrell: The information is given in the table.

1. General Dental Service Staff

	Number
September 1989	1,372
September 1990	1,395
June 1991	1,310

2. Hospital and Community Health Service Dental Staff[1]

	Number	Whole time equivalent
September 1989	211	180·2
September 1990[2]	211	177·2

[1] Figures include permanent paid and honorary staff but exclude hospital practitioners and clinical assistants.
[2] Latest available figure.

Legionnaire's Disease

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill, of 5 November, columns 317-18, how many cases of legionnaire's disease have been reported in Liverpool; when they were first notified to the authorities; where they are thought to have originated; why the outbreak was not made public; what action was taken to warn other patients and staff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: Five cases have been reported in Liverpool so far in 1991, of which two appear to be related and associated with the Broadgreen cardiothoracic centre.

Both these cases, reported in October, were brought to the attention of the local public health authorities and the Public Health Laboratory Service when the diagnoses were confirmed.

As soon as the first case was confirmed at the cardiothoracic centre samples were taken from the water systems. The results indicated that the infection could have originated from that source. Measures were therefore taken to treat the water system immediately.

Confirmation of one case of legionnaire's disease cannot definitely be associated with any particular source. By the time that the second case was confirmed at the cardiothoracic centre appropriate control measures had been taken. There was therefore no need to alert the public.

Following confirmation of the second case letters were sent to the general practitioners of all patients treated at the centre since it opened in July and also to all other hospitals in the area, alerting them to the possibility of the diagnosis. All staff at the centre are being screened for any signs of infection so that prompt treatment can be provided if required. To date no further cases have been identified.

Health Records (Confidentiality)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last discussed with the Data Protection Registrar the matter of health record confidentiality and the pros and cons of providing non-statutory guidance on the matter.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 15 October at column 137.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many prosecutions have been initiated by his Department for the violation of health records confidentiality; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department has not initiated any such prosecutions. The confidentiality of health records is protected by the law of confidence and not the criminal law. Any breach of the duty of confidence may be actionable by the patient or the relevant authority. Unauthorised use or disclosure of personal health information by health authority staff would also be regarded as a serious disciplinary matter.

Voluntary Organisations

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to reverse the decision to encourage project grants at the expense of core grants under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 5 November 1991]: We have no such plans. We are aiming to reduce the 80 per cent. of the section 64 general scheme budget currently spent on core grants in order to increase the scope for pump-priming and innovative projects, but the greater part of the budget will continue to go on core funding subject to three yearly review. It is necessary to strike the right balance and this is consistent with the approach of the report "Scrutiny of Government Funding of the Voluntary Sector" published in April 1990.

Income Generation

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the income generated by each regional and district health authority for the financial years 1989-90 and 1990-91 as recorded in the short-term programme/outturn and report process.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 7 November 1991]: The available information is given in the table.

Figures for 1990-91 are not yet available.

1989-90	£ Thousand
Northern	837

[1] A further £1·5 million came from special health authorities.

Incontinence Pads

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the statutory provisions governing charges for incontinence pads by local health authorities.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 7 November 1991]: The position on charging for NHS services is set out in section 1(2) of the National Health Service Act 1977 which states that such services must be "free of charge except in so far as the making or recovery of charges is expressly provided for by or under any enactment, whenever passed".

The provision of incontinence pads by NHS community services to people who are not NHS in-patients is a matter for the discretion of health authorities.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what medical assessment is used to decide how many incontinence pads are supplied free daily.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 7 November 1991]: This is a matter to be determined by individual health authorities. The Department has issued general guidance to health authorities on this matter following a national review of incontinence services, earlier this year.

EMPLOYMENT

Pay Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish a table showing the percentage increase since 1979 for the median average, upper and lower deciles of full-time adult rates as (a) female hospital ward orderlies, (b) female welfare workers, (c) local authority male manual workers, (d) male and female non-manual workers in banking and finance, (e) male and female non-manual workers in legal services and (f) male and female manual workers in manufacturing.

Mr. Jackson: The available information is published in parts B, C and D of the "New Earnings Survey" reports for 1979 and 1991, copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish a table showing the percentage increase since 1979 for the median, average, upper and lower deciles of full-time adult rates as (a) male hospital porters, (b) male and female primary school teachers, (c) male locomotive drivers and motormen, (d) footplate staff, (e) NHS male ancillary staff and (f) NHS male maintenance staff.

Mr. Jackson: The available information is published in parts B and D of the "New Earnings Survey" reports for 1979 and 1991, copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will publish the percentage increase in real earnings in (a) manufacturing and (b) non-manufacturing of (i) manual and (ii) non-manual males and females respectively in the lowest decile, the lower quartile, the higher quartile and the highest decile, with the median and average figures for 1970 to 1979 and 1979 to the most recent available date;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table in the same form as that contained in his reply dated 15 November 1989, Official Report, column 279, bringing that information up to date and in each case distinguishing between manufacturing and non-manufacturing; and if he will provide corresponding figures for (a) the periods 1970 to 1973 and 1974 to 1983 and (b) females over each period.

Mr. Jackson: The available information on average gross weekly earnings is published in the "New Earnings Survey" reports for the years concerned (in tables 10,11,18 and 21 for 1970, in tables 29, 32, 49 and 52 for 1973, and in tables 54, 57, 74 and 77 for 1974, 1979, 1983 and 1991), apart from figures for employees in non-manufacturing for 1991 which are given in the following table. Estimates of decile, quartile and median earnings for those in non-manufacturing are not available for 1991.

Information on the retail prices index (all items) to convert 1979 figures to 1991 prices is published in table 6.4 of the latest "Employment Gazette" for April 1991, and in table 26 of the annual supplement to "Economic Trends" for April of earlier years.

Copies of the publications are available in the Library.

Average gross weekly earnings of full-time employees on adult rates, whose pay was not affected by absence, who do not work in manufacturing industries

	April 1991 £
Manual men	246·7
Manual women	156·4
Non-manual men	374·6
Non-manual women	238·8

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current waiting time for cases to reach a hearing by industrial tribunals within (a) the Barnsley, East constituency and (b) South Yorkshire; and what were the comparable waiting times in each of the last five years.

Mr. Forth: I regret that the information is not in the form requested. The following table shows the percentage of cases coming to first hearing at the industrial tribunals in the Leeds region, which includes Barnsley and the South Yorkshire area, within six, eight, 10, 12, 20 and 26 weeks respectively of receipt of the application. The figures for the period 1 April to 6 November 1991 are provisional. The figures for the period 1 April 1986 to 31 March 1987 are for the Sheffield regional office which served the South Yorkshire area until its amalgamation with Leeds in 1987.

Mining Accidents

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list, for each coal mine in England and Wales, and for each year since 1985, the number of recorded accidents which have taken place in the course of the employment of coal miners.

Mr. Forth: The information in the following tables is for the years 1987-88 to 1990-91. Statistics for earlier years could be provided only by incurring disproportionate cost. The tables list injuries notified to HSE in respect of all persons employed within the curtilage of the coal mine.

Youth Unemployment

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list (a) the number of training places available to the young unemployed and (b) the range of opportunities available to the young unemployed in the Barnsley, East constituency.

Mr. Jackson: The information is not available in the form requested.

In 1991-92 Barnsley and Doncaster training and enterprise council (TEC) has contracted with local training providers on a training week basis. In the Barnsley local authority district the number of training weeks available will allow for an average in training level of 2,550 places for the remainder of this year.

The TEC has confirmed that it is confident of meeting the Government's guarantee to young people and in doing so is providing a wide range of training opportunities which they believe will meet known local needs.

The Government have guaranteed that all young people who are under 18 and not in full-time education or a job and are seeking training are offered and, if necessary, re-offered a suitable youth training (YT) place. The Government remain committed to ensuring that the YT guarantee is met.

In the Barnsley, East constituency the employment service offers opportunities to take a job, join a jobclub, or attend jobsearch seminar, restart course, job review workshop, or a job preparation course. There are varying eligibility criteria for these opportunities.

WALES

BA Engine Maintenance Plant

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the Director General of Fair Trading and others concerning the reference to the Office of Fair Trading of the sale of British Airways aero-engine maintenance plant at Nantgarw to assess its effect on competition on the market for servicing and supply of aero-engines; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: As is normal practice when proposed mergers have implications for Wales, the Welsh Office has been consulted by the Office of Fair Trading.

Industrial and Maritime Museum

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the chairman of the court of governors of the National Museum of Wales concerning the future expansion of the Wales Industrial and Maritime museum; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Initial discussions about the National Museum of Wales' plans for the Welsh Industrial and Maritime museum have taken place between officials. The proposals are being considered along with other plans for developments in Cardiff bay.

Cardiff Bay Barrage

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairman of the Countryside Council for Wales concerning the exclusion of the Cardiff bay site of special scientific interest from the special protection area under the European Community wild birds directive for the lower Severn estuary.

Mr. David Hunt: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and I reached our decision following careful consideration of a proposal submitted by the then Nature Conservancy Council, one of the predecessor bodies to the Countryside Council for Wales. The council has been fully consulted about the future of Cardiff bay in the context of the Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many written representations he has received concerning the groundwater effects of the proposed Cardiff bay barrage as part of the public consultation exercise running from 25 September to 25 December.

Mr. David Hunt: None, but we are not yet half way through the three-month consultation period which ends on 31 December.

Children in Hospital

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to issue a new circular on the welfare of children in hospital; and what factors have led to this timetable for its issue.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: We expect to issue new guidance on the welfare of children in hospital by the end of the year. This timetable arises from the need to revise existing guidance.

SCOTLAND

Parents Charter

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the rights given to parents under the parents charter if they consider that performance of the Scottish Office in education is inadequate.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The parents charter relates to parents' rights in respect of the direct provision of education for their children, which in large part is the responsibility of education authorities. Parents will have new rights, through school boards, to have their interests taken into account when a school is inspected by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how frequently Her Majesty's inspectorate will inspect (a) nursery, (b) primary and (c) secondary schools under the parents charter proposals.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Under the parents charter all schools will be required to produce a document setting out their educational plans and targets for two years ahead, and to report on progress over the previous two years.

Future levels of inspection will be set in the context of this enhanced system for quality assurance. Inspections will be undertaken more frequently where that is necessary and a greater emphasis will be placed on follow-up inspections. For next year, I anticipate that the number of schools inspected is likely to be about 25 to 30 per cent. higher than in the current Session.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what rights the parents charter gives in nursery education.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The provision of nursery education is not a statutory requirement: it is a matter for individual education authorities to consider in the light of the needs and priorities of their areas. I expect, however, that education authorities will wish to apply the principles of the parents charter, wherever appropriate, for the benefit of parents of pupils at nursery schools.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will indicate the level of financial provision he intends to make for new environmentally sensitive area designations between now and the end of the 1992-93 financial year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. Friend proposes to make available £1·5 million for the designation, subject to parliamentary approval, of new environmentally sensitive areas in Scotland in the financial year 1992-93. Provision will also be made for further development of existing first round areas and for continuing payments in existing and new areas after 1992-93.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many environmentally sensitive areas he expects to designate between now and 1 April 1993.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Government believe that environmentally sensitive areas offer significant benefits to farming and conservation. My right hon. Friend therefore intends to designate further areas in Scotland in 1992 and 1993 and has sought advice from his statutory advisers. He will announce the areas in due course.

Health Records (Confidentiality)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what actions he is taking for the protection of health records confidentiality in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of Tuesday 15 October at column 146.

DEFENCE

MV Polar Circle

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence by which date a decision has to be made about the future lease or purchase arrangements for MV Polar Circle after the 1991-92 season.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Under the terms of the charter contract, an option to purchase Polar Circle or to extend the charter can be taken by the Government at any time before 24 January 1992.

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what modifications he expects to be required on MV Polar Circle prior to her departure for Antarctica.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Polar Circle requires modifications to add military communications equipment, to embark hydrographic equipment, and to provide suitable aviation facilities.

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the charter for MV Polar Circle is (a) a bareboat charter or (b) a time charter.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Polar Circle has been leased on a bareboat charter.

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how long is the lease taken out on the MV Polar Circle; if it remains his policy to retain a naval vessel in Falklands waters beyond April 1992; and if he will consider renaming MV Polar Circle, HMS Endurance for the duration of its lease.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Polar Circle is currently under charter to the Royal Navy for a minimum of seven and a maximum of eight months to replace HMS Endurance for this season's deployment to the Antarctic. For the period of her present charter she will be commissioned as HMS Polar Circle. If she were to be accepted into the Royal Navy on a permanent basis, we would then consider the name she could carry through her service life. The Government have made clear their commitment to carry out for the foreseeable future the tasks formerly undertaken by HMS Endurance. Other naval vessels will continue to be deployed in support of our defence commitments in the Falklands Islands.

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy in respect of the maintenance of a long-term naval presence in Antarctica.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Government are committed to maintaining for the foreseeable future the programme of work previously carried out by HMS Endurance.

Post-service Training

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information is made available to service personnel regarding access to training after leaving the services.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave him on 22 November 1990 at columns 207-8. The employment service booklets are currently being revised, and we are also working with the employment service on the production of a guide detailing services available to personnel after they have left the armed forces. This will be issued to all personnel prior to discharge.

Redundancies

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) Army service personnel, (b) Royal Air Force service personnel and (c) Royal Navy personnel have applied for voluntary redundancy; and whether he has any plans to make further offers of voluntary redundancy.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Applications for selection for redundancy in 1992-93 have been received from over 5,000 Army personnel. We also expect to invite Army personnel to apply for redundancy in both 1993-94 and 1994-95.

The RN expects shortly to invite applications for redundancy in 1992-93.

It is not yet clear whether any redundancies will be needed in the RAF.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of those Army personnel who have applied for voluntary redundancy are (a) private soldiers, (b) NCOs and (c) officers; and what proportion of those Army personnel who have applied for voluntary redundancy come from (i) the Corps of Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers, (ii) the Royal Corps of Signals and (iii) the Corps of Royal Engineers.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Some 85 per cent. of the applicants for voluntary redundancy are NCOs and 15 per cent. are officers.

Ten per cent. of applicants are from the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers, 5 per cent. are from the Royal Signals and 7 per cent. are from the Corps of Royal Engineers.

Private soldiers in the Army are not invited to apply for redundancy.

Defence Estate (Repairs)

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total maintenance backlog of (a) unavoidable and essential repairs and (b) urgent repairs on the defence estate as of 1 April 1991.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The total maintenance backlog on the defence estate at 1 April 1991 is estimated to be:

	£ million
(a) Unavoidable and essential	494
(b) Urgent	150
Total	644

Armoured Divisions

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the percentage change in the capability of British armoured divisions in (a) the last four years and (b) the last nine years, respectively.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information is not held in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Departmental Towers

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the masts or towers over 500 ft tall owned by his Department which have been fitted with white strobe lights to conform to the recommendations of the Civil Aviation Authority, and the similar installations without such strobe lights.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The only mast owned by the MOD and over 500 ft tall to have been fitted with this type of hazard beacon is that at Aird Uig on the Isle of Lewis. The small number of remaining masts will be fitted as and when the existing obstacle lights become due for replacement.

Greenham Common

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether compensation has yet been paid to the commoners of Greenham common for their rights.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Yes.

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the public opinion surveys carried out by his Department since 11 July 1991.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer 5 November 1991]: The information requested is as follows:

Notes:
1. All figures are expressed in £(pounds) million.
2. 1991-92 figures are the latest estimates available.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by his Department during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (a) the topic, (b) the commencement date, (c) the duration and (d) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Burma

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans exist to challenge at the credential meeting the right to a seat for the current regime in Burma in the United Nations General Assembly.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: None.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received concerning the involvement of the security forces of the Burmese Government with the trade in narcotics; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: No such representations have been made. We vigorously condemn all drugs trafficking and any groups in Burma involved in this pernicious trade.

Thailand

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received concerning the human rights implications of evictions by the Thai Government of people from their homes in the Dong Yai forest, Buriram Province in Northern Thailand, to facilitate logging operations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have received no such representations.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a statement on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council on 4 November.

Mr. Hurd: A meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council took place in Brussels on 4 November. My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and I represented the United Kingdom.

The Council issued a statement reconfirming its commitment to a substantial, balanced and global conclusion of the Uruguay round this year. It urged the Commission to make effective use of every opportunity to achieve progress in the negotiations. In particular the Council drew attention to the need to make good use of the forthcoming EC/US summit on 9 November to narrow differences between the EC and United States in the interests of a successful completion of the round.

The Council reviewed the situation in Yugoslavia and agreed a package of measures subject to a political decision by EC Ministers today. The measures comprise suspension of the EC/Yugoslavia trade and co-operation agreement and of Yugoslavia's inclusion in the EC's PHARE programme, and exclusion of Yugoslavia from the generalised system of preferences and from participation in ministerial meetings of the Group of 24. The Council also agreed in principle that any restrictive measures toward Yugoslavia as a whole should be accompanied by positive measures towards those republics co-operating with the peace process. There was agreement in principle that the United Nations Security Council should be invited to examine measures to tighten the arms embargo and to consider an oil embargo.

The Council discussed Cambodia in the light of the successful outcome of the Paris conference and invited the Commission to make proposals on future Community relations.

The Council reviewed the draft European coal and steel community protocol in the association agreement negotiations with Hungary, Czechoslovakia and Poland and decided to remit the question to the Committee of Permanent Representatives for further examination.

An EC/Jordan Co-operation Council took place after the Foreign Affairs Council. A lunch between EC and Arab Maghreb Union Foreign Ministers was held in the margins of the Foreign Affairs Council. There was no agreement to any change to existing EC measures against Libya.

Political Union

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a statement on the outcome of the ministerial meeting of the intergovernmental conference on political union on 4 November.

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and I attended a ministerial meeting of the intergovernmental conference on political union on 4 November. The meeting discussed the presidency's proposals for increased co-operation on interior and justice matters. A number of member states, in particular Germany, wish the Community to take responsibility for all co-operation in this area. That includes police co-operation, immigration and asylum policy. I agreed that the countries of Europe must work more closely together to combat illegal immigration and asylum and organised crime. Valuable work already goes on, and must be strengthened. But I made clear that we do not believe that bringing these areas into Community competence was necessary or desirable.

There was also a discussion of the presidency's proposed amendments to the social chapter of the treaty of Rome. I said that the Community needed a social dimension, but did not need any treaty change to achieve it. I again pointed to the undesirability of trying to introduce measures in the social area, especially in industrial relations, which might cut across national practices and which could lead to unsustainable costs across the Community.

These and other issues relating to the intergovernmental conference on political union will be discussed further at a meeting of Foreign Ministers to be held in Noordwijk in the Netherlands on 12 to 14 November.

An inter-institutional meeting between the Council of Ministers and the European Parliament was held on 5 November, following the 4 November ministerial meeting. My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs represented the Government.

ENVIRONMENT

Noise (Working Party Report)

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the action he proposes to take arising from the noise review working party report published in October 1990.

Mr. Baldry: The Government's policy on noise was set out in the White Paper "This Common Inheritance" and reflects much of the thinking of the noise review working party. My speech to the Noise Council seminar on 15 May and that of my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside to the Institution of Environmental Health Officers on 10 September summarised progress.

A number of the working party's recommendations have already been implemented and the Government are actively working on others. Some of the main noise measures that have been taken are as follows.

The Environmental Protection Act 1990 has clarified local authority responsibilities for noise control and increased the maximum fine for statutory noise nuisance from business premises to £20,000. The Government are funding a pilot neighbourhood noise awareness scheme at Forest Hill, and are grant-aiding a neighbour mediation scheme in Bristol and a noise awareness project for school children in Nottingham. One of the eligible categories for grant under this year's environmental grant fund is for the formation of schemes to develop noise awareness/mediation. The Government are in contact with audio manufacturers to discuss good practice for audio users.

We have issued for comment guidance for environmental health officers and the police on existing powers to control noisy parties. In addition the Government have set up a working party to consider whether there is a need for further measures to control noisy parties. A draft code of practice on pop concerts has been published.

The Building Regulations governing noise within buildings are to be amended to include for the first time in England and Wales noise insulation for flat conversions which will be as close as possible to standards for new buildings. Comments on our proposals have been received and it is planned that regulations will be laid by early December with a view to their coming into force next June.

The Government have published a consultation document on tighter noise requirements for car alarms fitted to motor vehicles first used from August 1992. The main proposal is that the length of alarm be reduced from five minutes to 30 seconds and audible arming signals be banned. Responses to the consultation exercise are being considered. Also we shall be reviewing the new powers to control burglar alarms taken by London local authorities to determine whether there is a case for extending them nationwide.

The Government have recently issued draft guidance for consultation on control of noise at surface mineral workings and we shall shortly be issuing draft planning policy guidance for consultation on noise and new development, to update and expand existing advice. This will include noise from roads, aircraft, railways and industry. It will also take forward the working party's several recommendations about the need to establish action levels or exposure bands for controlling new development.

The Government plan to carry out research in 1992-93 to assess whether the current noise standard for noise insulation for new roads is still appropriate. We hope shortly to announce our conclusions on the report of the committee set up under the chairmanship of Dr. Mitchell to consider a noise insulation standard for new railway lines. The Government will consult on a draft of the regulations before they are made. A proposed revised planning procedure for new railway lines has been announced.

The Government have issued a consultation paper on control of noise at aerodromes. The main proposal is a new power to designate aerodromes—where informal consultation proves inadequate—to introduce formal consultative arrangements with the local authority. The extension of abatement orders to helicopters take-off and aerodrome ground running has been canvassed. The consultation period runs until end of the year. Also the Government recently announced that the amount of low flying by military jet aircraft is to decrease by about 30 per cent. over the next three years. The index for measurement of aircraft noise has been replaced by a more satisfactory measure.

Government policy on noise is underpinned with appropriate research and our programme has been re-aligned with priorities identified by the noise review working party. Forthcoming research includes a national noise attitude study, a model for human response to transportation noise, assessment and prediction of industrial noise, and low frequency noise.

Listed Buildings (Fittings)

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether a painting on an overmantel which rests on a mantelpiece in a listed building forms part of the fittings and fixtures for which his Department has control over their destination.

Mr. Yeo: Section 1(5)(a) of the Planning (Listed Buildings and Conservation Areas) Act 1990, in defining the term "listed building", provides that for the purposes of the Act any object or structure fixed to the building shall be treated as part of the building, and therefore are subject to listed building controls.

Whether a particular item is regarded as a fixture or a chattel will depend on the individual facts of each case; the test to be applied to listed buildings is the same as for other property. The courts have held that the issues to be considered are the degree to which an object is physically attached to a building, and the purpose for which it was attached.

Private Tenancies

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many private sector tenancies were available annually, within the United Kingdom, for each year since 1979;

(2) what number of private sector tenancies were available annually within (a) England and (b) Yorkshire and Humberside, for each year since 1979.

Mr. Yeo: The available information relates to the number of private sector tenants who had been living in their accommodation for less than a year, as estimated from annual labour force surveys (LFS). Since some households will have moved more than once in the previous year, the total number of tenancies that became available each year will have been higher than the numbers shown in the table.

Private renters resident under one year

thousands

	Great Britain	England	Yorks and Humberside
1981	440	390	30
1983	500	430	40
1984	540	470	30
1985	490	420	50
1986	490	420	40
1987	560	490	50
1988	580	520	60
1989	510	480	40
1990	580	540	50

Notes:

1. The table shows moves in the 12 months before the time of interview, which was at some point between March and April each year.
2. The LFS is a sample survey so the estimates are subject to sampling errors. For Great Britain and England the estimates are probably accurate to about 20,00 households either way up to 1983 and 30,000 either way from 1984 on. For Yorkshire and Humberside they are probably accurate to between 5,000 and 10,000 either way.
3. The LFS was biennial until 1983 and there was no survey in 1980 or 1982.

Grant-aided Work

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what monitoring his Department has done with regard to the quality of grant-aided work in relation to paragraph 109 of DoE circular 12/90; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: As paragraph 109 of circular 12/90 explains, the quality of grant-aided work is ultimately a matter between the applicant and the building contractor. That paragraph also makes clear that payment of grant is conditional upon the works being executed to the satisfaction of the local housing authority, and that authorities should not certify as satisfactorily completed any works displaying an unacceptable quality of workmanship, or where the objectives of the grant are not met. Monitoring of the quality of grant-aided work is therefore already undertaken by local authorities and there is no need for the Department to be involved.

Development

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what representations he has received from the Association of District Councils on the effectiveness of current legislation in enabling the control of development with particular reference to development which constitutes a departure from the structure plan;

(2) what advice he gives to local planning authorities when they are considering applications which involve development which constitutes a departure from the structure plan.

Mr. Yeo: No such representations have been received. A local planning authority which is considering a planning application that involves development constituting a departure from the structure plan should follow the procedures in the Town and Country Planning (Development Plans) (England) Direction 1981. Advice is given to authorities in Department of the Environment circular 2/81.

Environmental Protection Act (Prosecutions)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many successful prosecutions have been brought against duty bodies under part IV of the Environmental Protection Act 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: Information on the number of litter abatement orders obtained and litter abatement notices served on duty bodies is not held centrally. However, the Tidy Britain Group, with the encouragement of my Department, undertook a survey of all local authorities in July this year to monitor the implementation of part IV of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. None of the 331 respondents reported that prosecutions had been brought against them, although 13 authorities said that they had been notified of an intention to bring a prosecution under part IV.

Information on the number of duty bodies prosecuted in 1991 for failing to comply with a litter abatement order or a litter abatement notice under sections 91 and 92 of the Act will be available along with the publication of the annual series of criminal statistics in late 1992.

The number of prosecutions is not a reflection of the success of the measures in the Act, which are designed primarily as deterrents.

Phipps Bridge Estate

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will assist the London borough of Merton to rebuild the Phipps Bridge estate following the proposals submitted to his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I understand that Merton is preparing new proposals for tackling the problems of this estate. My Department will do whatever it can to assist a satisfactory outcome.

Control of Pollution Act

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what provisions to make regulations under the Control of Pollution Act 1974 have not been implemented.

Mr. Baldry: Sections 6, 11, 18, 21, 23, 29, 45, 73, 94, 102 and 103. The reasons for non-implementation vary, but they include provisions being superseded by the Water Act 1989 and the Environmental Protection Act 1990, and the fact that some of the provisions related to reserve powers.

Parliamentary Properties

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the office properties in the Westminster area for which he is currently negotiating leases for parliamentary use.

Mr. Yeo: It would be inappropriate to provide this information while negotiations are still taking place.

Stop Notices

Mr. Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the appropriate ministerial order will be made to implement section 9 of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991 dealing with stop notices.

Sir George Young: Shortly.

Severn Estuary Protection Areas

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he expects to submit the lower Severn estuary special protection area to the European Commission under the wild birds directive;

(2) when he expects to submit the middle Severn estuary special protection area application to the European Commission environment directorate.

Mr. Baldry: The former Nature Conservancy Council's proposal for the designation of the lower Severn estuary as a special protection area for birds is under consideration within Government. The case for designation will be decided jointly by my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Secretary of State for Wales. The European Commission will be notified of the decision in due course.

Noxious Waste

Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he intends to announce his decision on the proposed byelaws submitted to him by Bassetlaw district council regarding the transport of noxious waste; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when his Department expects to reply to the last five letters from Bassetlaw district council from 4 June 1990 to 19 September 1991 concerning the adoption of byelaws under section 82 of the Public Health Act 1936 relating to the transportation of noxious substances and removal through streets of offensive matter or liquid.

Mr. Baldry: The council was informed on 3 October that as much priority as possible was being given to its application given the present very high workload on the part of my Department which is responsible for local environmental issues.

Falmouth School of Art and Design

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will issue an article 14 direction in the matter of the planning application by Falmouth school of art and design.

Mr. Yeo: It is not necessary for my right hon. Friend to do so. There will be sufficient time for him to decide whether issues of more than local importance are involve which would justify calling in the applications, since I understand that they will not be decided by Carrick district council until 11 December.

"Cheshire 2001"

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to set up an inquiry at an early date into the proposals entitled "Cheshire 2001: A Strategy for the Future", submitted by Cheshire county council and Chester district council.

Sir George Young: The Secretary of State for the Environment has already held an examination in public on the Cheshire replacement structure plan—"Cheshire 2001", and there has been a full public consultation on his proposed modifications to the plan. He is considering all representations including those by Cheshire county council and the City of Chester before reaching his final decision.

Pollution Inspectorate

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the manpower resources of the pollution inspectorate.

Mr. Trippier: I gave details of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution (HMIP) staffing to the House earlier today.

In January I announced that HMIP had been allocated over 80 new posts, to enable it to expand to 313 staff by 1 April 1992. I indicated that HMIP's resources would be kept under review in the light of its responsibilities for implementing the new system of integrated pollution control (IPC) under the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

I have now authorised a further increase of around 50 staff, raising HMIP's 1992-93 complement to over 360 staff, effective from April 1992. This compares with a total of 133 staff in post when HMIP set up in April 1987, and underlines the Government's commitment to the highest standards of environmental protection.

Recruitment of the additional pollution inspectors is in progress, with over 1,600 applications for the posts. This shows a high level of interest in HMIP and its responsibilities for protecting the environment.

HMIP's manpower requirements for later years will be kept under review as IPC is progressively implemented and the inspectorate's workload increases further.

The following table gives details of HMIP's complement and staff-in-post figures since its formation in April 1987.

There are currently (1 November 1991) 270 staff in post.

HMIP staffing 1987-1992[1]

	Complement	Staff in post
April 1987[2]	199	133
April 1988	[3]183	157
April 1989	194	165
April 1990	212	172
April 1991	248	232
April 1992 previously	313	—
now increased to: over	[4]360	—
November 1991		270

Notes:

[1]All figures exclude the former Radioactive Waste Policy and Administration Division, which transferred from HMIP to the DOE Directorate of Pollution Control and Waste in November 1990 (28 staff).

[2]Date of formation of HMIP.

[3]Drop in complement due to transfer of waste policy functions and 11 staff to DOE Waste Management Division in 1987-88.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

(2) what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 5 November 1991]: The information in respect of paid publicity and associated staff costs for my Department (including agencies) is:

	£ million
1985-86	3·5
1986-87	4·2
1987-88	4·8
1988-89	6·9
1989-90	31·5
1990-91	7·5
1991-92	[1]8·6

[1] Estimate.

Expenditure is not broken down between different publicity media and information relating to financial years 1979-80 to 1984-85 inclusive is not readily available and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost. Budgets for 1992-93 have not yet been set.

Housing Expenditure

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a series in (a) cash prices, (b) 1990-91 prices and (c) as a proportion of gross domestic product, Government capital spending on housing both net and gross of receipts.

Sir George Young [holding answer 5 November 1991]: The available information, consistent with the new public expenditure planning total introduced in 1990, is as follows.

Government capital expenditure on housing—England

	Cash (£ million)		1990-91 prices (£ million)		Percentage of GDP
	gross[1]	net[2]	gross[1]	net[2]	gross[1]	net[2]
1984-85	2,623·0	2,576·0	3,732·1	3,665·2	0·8	0·8
1985-86	2,564·8	2,460·1	3,458·4	3,317·2	0·7	0·7
1986-87	2,422·4	2,290·3	3,162·4	2,989·9	0·6	0·6
1987-88	2,446·0	2,322·4	3,028·5	2,875·5	0·6	0·5
1988-89	2,389·1	2,246·8	2,759·9	2,595·5	0·5	0·5
1989-90	2,451·6	2,324·5	2,659·6	2,521·7	0·5	0·5
1990-91	3,121·4	3,042·9	3,121·4	3,042·9	0·6	0·5
1991-92 estimate	3,707·1	3,614·1	3,464·6	3,377·7	0·6	0·6

[1] Housing Corporation gross capital expenditure (including use of receipts), local authority capital (excluding authorities' self-financed expenditure), and other capital expenditure (including, in 1991-92 only, Housing Action Trusts).

[2] As [1] less Housing Corporation receipts.

Gross Government capital expenditure on housing does not include local authorities' self-financed expenditure and net expenditure does not take account of authorities' receipts which increased from £1,630 million in 1984-85 to £3,300 million in 1988-89 and in 1990-91 were an estimated £2,450 million.

Information on a comparable basis for years before 1984-85 can be derived only at disproportionate cost. However, figures for earlier years on the old planning total basis are contained in public expenditure White Papers published prior to 1990.

PSA Services

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes to make any changes to the running costs cash limit on PSA services vote in 1991-92.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his answer, 6 November c.159-60]: I will be making a further £8,844,000 available in 1991-92 for cash incentive schemes, to help council tenants buy their own homes in the private sector, and at the same time release permanent housing for homeless families, who might otherwise be in bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

This will involve an increase in the DOE/LACAP non-voted cash limit from £3,007,648,000 to £3,016,492,000.

Cash incentive schemes have been successful both in freeing family-sized local authority properties for use by homeless families and in helping local authority tenants who want to buy to realise their ambition. They offer excellent value for money for local authorities and their tenants.

These extra funds must be used in the present financial year. The demand from tenants has been high and this extra money will ensure even greater benefit for them and for homeless families needing a permanent home.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Trade Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish a table showing for each year since 1961 and the current year to date the ration of United Kingdom exports of manufactures to the United States of America to imports of manufactures from the United States of America, the comparable figures for United Kingdom trade with Germany and Japan, and the figures for German and Japanese trade with the United States of America; and if he will give the real exchange rate in each case based on relative export prices, in terms of a common currency.

Mr. Sainsbury: This information can be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

Industrial Competitiveness

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to what extent the cost competitiveness of British industry has correlated with the export performance of British industry in manufactured goods since 1983; and what information he has on price elasticities for France, Germany, Italy, Japan and the United States of America over the same period.

Mr. Sainsbury: Export performance depends not only on cost competitiveness but on non price factors such as quality, reliability and delivery. Between 1983 and 1990, United Kingdom cost competitiveness in the manufacturing sector (measured by relative unit labour costs) improved by 1·3 per cent. and the volume of United Kingdom manufactured exports rose by 63·1 per cent.

Information on price elasticities is available from a variety of sources.

New Cars Report

Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to publish the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the prices of new cars and the distribution system.

Mr. Redwood: The MMC's report on the supply of new cars is currently being considered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The report will be published as soon as is practicable.

Balance of Trade

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a table of crude balances of visible trade in sterling terms at current prices and exchange rates since 1988 for Belgium and Luxembourg, Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, the United States of America and the United Kingdom; and if he will provide similar information for invisible trade for each year since 1974.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer to the answers I gave to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan on 18 October at col. 286 and on 15 October at cols. 129-32.

Latin America

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list the British manufactured goods exported to the top 10 Latin American countries importers for each year since 1975, expressing the value of such exports in 1991 moneys;

(2) if he will give a list of the top 10 Latin American countries exporters to Britain for each year since 1975, indicating the type of products imported by Britain and their value in 1991 moneys.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer to the answers I gave to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan on 16 October at columns 169-73.

Nord-Pas de Calais

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on the number and types of British companies establishing themselves in Nord-Pas de Calais, in order to avail themselves of continental loading gauge freight facilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have no information on the number of types of British companies which are locating in the Nord-Pas de Calais.

I cannot say whether the continental loading gauge facilities would play any part in such companies' decisions. It is for companies themselves to establish what opportunities offer them the most attractive prospects and where to establish.

British Telecom

Dr. Bray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will take steps to ensure that prior to the sale of further shares in British Telecom the management of the company honours commitments given at the time of privatisation to continue to discuss changes to staff terms and conditions with its trade union representatives.

Mr. Redwood: The Government made clear at the time of privatisation that the commercial management of BT was for the company and that the Government would not use their shareholding to intervene in such matters. This remains the position.

Internal Market Council

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Internal Market Council held in Brussels on Thursday 7 November.

Mr. Redwood: I attended the Internal Market Council on 7 November. The Council reviewed progress towards completion of the single market measures. The United Kingdom asked for faster progress on measures relating to the food industry and was promised by the Commissioner that 10 draft directives and amendments to directives covering issues like colorants, additives and food hygiene would be brought before the council over the next six months. The Council noted the Commission's review of implementation which praised the United Kingdom, Denmark and some other countries for their good implementation record, but which asked Italy to speed up implementation of a large number of outstanding measures.

The Council failed to agree on the three outstanding vehicle type approval draft directives which would complete the set of 44 directives needed to allow whole vehicle type approval under Community rules. There was a majority around the table in favour of the directives, but France, Italy and Spain blocked progress at the meeting because they are unhappy with the arrangements related to implementation of the agreement on Japanese car imports into the Community. The Commission, the United Kingdom and other countries in the majority urged the manufacturers' case for these type approvals. It was hoped that the problem could be resolved by the December Internal Market Council.

The Council expressed interest in a presidency/United Kingdom suggestion of a means of making progress on the draft irradiation directive and remitted the suggested outline compromise position from the presidency and the United Kingdom to a working party.

The Council confirmed a common position on the Impact 2 technology programme following its substantial amendment in recent months. The United Kingdom made a statement saying that it was very important that moneys in this programme were not used in a way which damaged competitive technologies and companies operating commercially in the marketplace.

Much of the time of the Council was given over to the draft sweeteners directive. A common position was finally agreed using a Commission compromise which allows Germany to ban the use of sweeteners in domestically brewed traditional beers while creating common rules for other food and drink products in the Community regulating the proportion of sweetener that can be included in their production. The United Kingdom had to defend the position of the low and no alcohol beer industry in the United Kingdom which uses sweeteners as the French proposed an amendment which would have banned the use of sweeteners in all such beers. Support for the presidency compromise eventually materialised which protected the United Kingdom interest as well as the German.

There was no substantial discussion on a draft proposal for a pension funds directive which is broadly satisfactory from a United Kingdom point of view, and there was agreement that the European Parliament was behaving unreasonably in withholding its opinion on the insurance directive in protest against the lack of progress on social legislation in the Council.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Burma

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultations he has had about aid to Burma with other Governments; and what information he has about changes in aid provided to Burma by other Governments.

Mrs. Chalker: After the repression of the democracy movement in 1988, Britain participated actively in consultations among EC partners, which resulted in agreement to suspend all bilateral aid to Burma except for humanitarian and emergency aid. Other major donors took similar action although some continued to implement existing commitments.

We continue to liaise with other major donors on a regular basis, both through diplomatic missions in Rangoon, and through consultations in international as well as EC fora.

A comparison of official development assistance to Burma for 1988 and 1989 (the latest year for which figures for all countries are available) is given in the following table.

In 1990 the United Kingdom figure was £89,000.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensions

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the percentage increase in state retirement pension for each year since 1979; and what was the percentage increase in (a) prices and (b) average earnings in each of those years.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is given in the table.

Uprating date	(A) Rate of Retirement Pension	(B) Percentage increase in rate of Retirement Pension	(C) Percentage increase in Retail Prices Index	(D) Percentage increase in average earnings
November 1979	25·30	—	—	—

April 1990	46·90	7·6	9·4	9·3
April 1991	52·00	10·9	6·4	8·6

Notes.

(1) Column C gives the percentage increase in the Retail Prices Index (all items) between uprating dates. These figures cannot be used as uprating factors—an earlier period of price movements must be used as a proxy so that sufficient time is available, for administrative purposes, to ensure timeous payment of the new rates. For example, the increase in April 1991, 10·9 per cent., represents the percentage change in the RPI from September 1989 to September 1990.

(2) Column B gives the percentage increase in the Retirement Pension between uprating dates (the uprating factor).

(3) Column A gives the rate of Category A Retirement Pension for a single person.

(4) Column D gives the percentage increase in Average Earnings—New Series Index (whole economy) seasonally adjusted.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the average annual rate of turnover of staff in his Department's offices dealing directly with the public for each of the last five years; and what were the different rates between clerical and executive grades.

Miss Widdecombe: Information is not readily available in the form requested. The table shows (1) the resignation rate for all DSS staff for the three years 1988-89, 1989-90 and 1990-91; earlier years are not available for DSS alone; and (2) the turnover rate for 1990-91 for the units now comprising the Benefits and Contributions Agency field operations.

	(1) Resignations, all DSS			(2) Turnover field operations 1990-91
	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91
	Percentage
All grades	8·1	7·8	5·2	[1]9·1

AO/LOII	8·8	7·8	4·8	6·9
AA	18·0	20·1	14·9	25·8

[1] up to and including UG6

Notes.

1. Turnover is defined as resignations, retirements, deaths, dismissals, transfers to other government departments and the termination of fixed-term contracts.
2. There are technical difficulties in deriving accurate turnover figures for 1990-91 because of the effect of restructuring in preparation for Agency status. These figures are the best available at present.

Pensions

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of current gross average earnings is represented, in the United Kingdom and in each European Community country, by the (a) basic pension, (b) earnings-related supplement, and (c) total state pension for (i) a single pensioner and (ii) a pensioner with a dependent spouse of pension age.

Mr. Jack: It is not possible to compare pension arrangements between EC member states in the manner requested by the hon. Member. Only four countries within the EC—the United Kingdom, Denmark, Netherlands and the Republic of Ireland—pay a flat-rate state pension. Other countries operate earnings-related schemes whereby each person's pension is directly related to his own earnings level during his working life and accordingly has a different and individual relationship to national average earnings.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will allow those state pensioners in receipt of small occupational pensions to relinquish those pensions so that they can claim income support and the passported benefits;

(2) what measures his Department is taking to ensure that those state pensioners who have a small occupational pension are not penalised by the benefit rules such that they are worse off than those without an occupational pension.

Miss Widdecombe: Many pensioners who have both a state retirement pension and an occupational pension are entitled to income support. They, like all income support recipients, automatically qualify for maximum housing benefit and community charge benefit which are the passported benefits for which this Department is responsible.

A pensioner whose occupational pension takes his total income above the level at which income support would be payable should still be better off than a person in similar circumstances who qualifies for income support. This is due to the effect of the tapers in housing benefit and community charge benefit which enable the pensioner to keep some of that extra income. The tapers are applied to any income above the applicable amount appropriate to a particular case and the resulting figure is offset against the maximum benefit payable. In housing benefit the taper is 65 per cent. and in community charge benefit it is 15 per cent.

It would not be permissible, however, for any claimant to give up an income in order to claim public money to which he or she is not properly entitled.

Income Support

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the likely impact of SI, 1991, No. 1559 on reducing future entitlement to income support and the numbers eligible; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 7 November.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what savings on income support payments are expected from reduced mortgage interest repayments arising from SI 1991 No. 1520.

Miss Widdecombe: SI 1991 No. 1520 amends the Family Credit (General) Regulations 1987 and will make it easier for working parents to claim family credit by reducing the number of hours they need to work from 24 to 16 hours a week from April 1992.

We estimate that up to 5,000 parents with a mortgage, who are receiving income support and working 16 or more hours a week in April 1992, will become eligible for family credit and be better off. In addition, up to 10,000 working families with children are likely to continue to receive help with their mortgage in income support under special protection arrangements, on top of any family credit they receive.

As these families will be either better off or no worse off, there is expected to be a benefit cost, rather than a saving, as a result of this amendment.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his latest estimate of the total number of persons, including dependants, in receipt of income support; how many are currently subject to deductions in their income support on grounds of fuel, rent, water, poll tax, social fund, or other reasons amounting to (a) less than £1 a week, (b) £1 to £2 a week, (c) £2 to £3 a week, (d) £3 to £4 a week, (e) £4 to £5 a week, (f) £5 to £7 a week, (g) £7 to £10 a week and (h) over £10 a week; and what percentage each of these totals represents as a proportion of the total number dependent on income support.

Miss Widdecombe: The information available is shown in the table.

4. Percentages shown are the number in each category as a percentage of the total number of people dependant on income support.
5. Information on Community Charge arrears was not collected at the time of the inquiry.

Fraud

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Secuurity if he will consider introducing a system for prosecuting social security fraud involving civil penalties along the lines of those provided for in the Taxes Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: In 1989 an efficiency scrutiny into social security fraud recommended the continued use of prosecution powers in the Social Security Act 1986, or the Theft Act 1968 in more serious cases. We have no plans to change these arrangements. Civil proceedings may also be taken to recover an overpayment of benefit from a fraudulent claim.

Social Fund

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to collect information at district office level on (a) the number of applications made for the various components of the social fund, (b) the number refused and accepted, (c) the grounds for refusal and (d) the numbers of loans recovered.

Miss Widdecombe: The administration of the social fund is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and copies will be placed in the Library and the Public Information Office.

Open-plan Offices

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals his Department has to study the effects of a system of open-plan offices and facilities along the lines of those introduced by the Employment Service; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Office facilities for the reception of customers is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and copies will be placed in the Library and the Public Information Office.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many housing benefit claimants (a) in Nottingham and (b) in the United Kingdom are awaiting payment of outstanding housing benefit; what is the total sum involved; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is not available.

Pensioners

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in what form his Department holds information on projected numbers of individuals likely to draw a state earnings-related pension in future years.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department does not hold this information in any form because it is not required in order to estimate the future total cost of the additional pension.

Severe Disability Premium

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will now take steps to implement the recommendations of the Social Security Advisory Committee to provide transitional protection for those people who will no longer qualify for severe disability premium after 11 November; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Steps have already been taken. Regulations which came into force on 11 November provide preserved rights for those who secured the premium, or took steps to secure it, through joint tenancies or co-ownerships before 21 October 1991.

Benefit Rates

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will publish in the Official Report a schedule of social security benefit rates for 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is in the table.

Schedule of main proposed Social Security Benefit Rates from April 1992

Rossi Index

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will publish a table showing the annual increases in prices measured by the Rossi index in each year since September 1987 (a) on the basis of calculation used hitherto and (b) on the new basis announced in his uprating statement on 21 October.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is in the table.

	"Rossi" calculation
September	Former	New
1987	3·2	3·2
1988	4·7	5·0
1989	5·2	5·6
1990	8·1	8·4
1991	7·2	7·0

Child Benefit

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what additional increases in child benefit would be required to restore it to the level it would have reached if it had been uprated in line with prices and average earnings, respectively, in each year from 1985 on, including the uprating announced on 21 October 1991.

Mr. Jack: The additional increases would be £0·75 for the eldest eligible child and £2·60 for other children on the basis of movements in the index of retail prices applicable to the general uprating of benefits from November 1985 to April 1992. Information which would enable a similar calculation to be made on the basis of movements in average earnings over the same period will not be available until 21 November, and I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security by how much the real value of benefit for each child of a widow, invalidity pensioner or retirement pensioner—child benefit and dependency addition combined—will be increased or reduced by the uprating announced on 21 October 1991.

Mr. Jack: It is proposed that the combined rates of child benefit and child dependency increase payable for each child of a widow, invalidity pensioner or retirement pensioner be increased in cash terms by £0·45 with effect from week commencing 6 April 1992. It is not possible to calculate what such a cash increase would represent in terms of the real value of either the existing or previous rates of the benefits concerned until the retail prices index figures for April 1992 are available.

St. Francis Hospital, Haywards Heath

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the consequences of the benefit decision regarding St. Francis hospital, Haywards Heath.

Miss Widdecombe: The income support eligibility of people discharged from hospital is considered on an individual basis by independent adjudication officers in the local social security office and Ministers cannot intervene. The cases of former long-term patients of St. Francis hospital, Haywards Heath are currently the subject of an appeal and it would not be appropriate for me to comment.

Statutory Sick Pay

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of earnings was replaced by statutory sick pay for employees on 100 per cent., 75 per cent. and 50 per cent. of average earnings in each year since statutory sick pay commenced.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is in the table.

Date	Average earnings[1]	Statutory sick pay[2] as a percentage of earnings at
	£	(a) 100 per cent.	(b) 75 per cent.	(c) 50 per cent.
April 1983	147·40	27·3	36·4	54·6
April 1984	159·30	26·5	35·4	53·0
April 1985	171·00	25·9	34·6	51·9
April 1986	184·70	25·3	33·7	50·6
April 1987	198·90	23·7	31·6	47·5
April 1988	218·40	22·5	30·0	45·1
April 1989	239·70	21·7	29·0	43·5
April 1990	263·10	20·0	26·6	39·9
April 1991	284·70	18·4	24·6	30·6

Notes:

[1] Earnings shown are the average for all full-time adult employees.

[2] The majority of SSP recipients get occupational sick pay on top of SSP when they are sick. In many cases this brings the total payment received up to full pay.

TRANSPORT

Goods Vehicle Drivers

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what statistical evidence is collected about accident rates for large goods vehicle drivers.

Mr. Chope: The statistics available cover road accidents involving personal injury and reported to the police. The standard report prepared by the police and submitted to the Department of Transport includes information on each vehicle involved and identifies the vehicle type. The report also includes the vehicle registration mark of any vehicles involved, and, by linking with data held at the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency at Swansea, a more precise definition of vehicle type can be obtained.

Information about the driver includes age, sex and results of any roadside screening breath test, but no other personal details. Information on heavy goods vehicle traffic and movements are produced by the national traffic census and the continuing survey of roads and goods transportation. Information on heavy goods vehicle accident involvement rates is published in "Road Accidents Great Britain 1990: The Casualty Report". The involvement rate of HGVs in injury accidents has fallen from 70 per 100 million vehicle kilometres in 1980 to 56 per 100 million vehicle kilometres in 1990. The casualty rate for HGV drivers was 11 per 100 million vehicle kilometres in 1990.

High-speed Rail Link

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what comparisons he has undertaken between the amount of revenue income attributable to the proposed King's Cross low-level international station from high-speed rail link services approaching via Stratford East, and those approaching from the previously proposed link from the south.

Mr. Freeman: The low-level station at King's Cross was treated by British Rail in its comparative study of routes for a high-speed rail link as an integral part of those routes in which it featured. British Rail's comparative estimates of the revenues obtainable from the traffic forecast for each of the routes is shown in its route comparison report, a copy of which is in the Library. In deciding their preferred route the Government took account of all the relevant considerations, including regional planning, the environmental impact, and the effect on property, as well as transport objectives.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport within what time range he expects the high-speed rail link from the channel tunnel to be (a) completed and (b) connected to the proposed low-level station at King's Cross.

Mr. Freeman: It is too soon to say. No decision has yet been made on when construction may start.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether the proposed rail link from Stratford to King's Cross will be designed to be able to take freight services;

(2) whether he has yet received any proposals from British Rail for the use of the proposed rail link from Stratford to King's Cross for freight services.

Mr. Freeman: Further consideration has to be given to the implications of the proposed new line for freight. But if it were to be designed to be able to be used for freight, it seems unlikely that freight trains would run on the section between Stratford and King's Cross.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) within what range of real rates of return British Rail's revenue projections for the proposed international low-level station at King's Cross lie;

(2) whether British Rail's proposals for the European passenger services component of the financing of the proposed international station at King's Cross envisage the involvement of any Government financial support; and whether British Rail is seeking any capital grant for the new Kent express or Thameslink components of the financing of the station;

(3) what updated appraisal he has received from British Rail of its proposals for financing the works covered by the King's Cross Railways Bill following his decision that the high-speed rail link should come to King's Cross via Stratford.

Mr. Freeman: The Department has not yet received British Rail's detailed financial appraisal for the proposed King's Cross terminal.

International passenger services using the station will be subject to the terms of section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987, so they will have to cover the part of the station costs properly attributable to them out of commercial revenue.

Network SouthEast is in principle eligible to receive capital grant in recognition of benefits of projects to non-users. British Rail has not sought such a grant so far in respect of the element of the cost of the proposed works at King's Cross relating to commuter services.

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when the Ove Arup original consultation team will be able to visit the Medway constituency to continue discussions on the precise location of the route;

(2) if he will meet constituents of the hon. Member for Medway to discuss their requirement that the channel tunnel rail link Medway crossing should be positioned as closely as possible to the present crossing;

(3) if the Government will publish the precise details of the channel tunnel rail link route through the Medway constituency.

Mr. Freeman: The route originally proposed by Ove Arup, and developed further in conjuction with British Rail, will now be refined over the next few months. It will be published once sufficient details are available to form the basis of the public consultation process that BR will lead. There will then be ample opportunity for any concerns to be aired about the alignment of the route and how best to limit its environmental impact. Only after this will the plans be finalised.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what proposals he has received from British Rail in furtherance of the implementation of its proposals in "International Rail Services for the United Kingdom" of 1989 to run 11 services per day from different places beyond London;

(2) what proposals he has received from British Rail for the provision of the rolling stock it aims to obtain for the channel tunnel rail link services to run through-trains beyond London.

Mr. Freeman: Since 1989 investment proposals have been approved by the Government for various infrastructure works which are under way. We are considering proposals for the day trains. Orders for the night rolling stock depend on the outcome of British Rail's negotiations with their continental railway partners. British Rail's initial plans and requirements for rolling stock are not affected by the Government's recent decision on the rail link.

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the Ove Arup route now adopted for the channel link deviates in any way from that discussed with Ove Arup and the local communities.

Mr. Freeman: The supplementary note to British Rail's document "Rail Link Project: Comparison of routes: Report to British Railways Board, May 1991", a copy of which is in the Library, explains two late changes which Ove Arup introduced to its proposed route. These were summarised in letters which my right hon. and learned Friend's office sent to my hon. Friends the Members for Medway (Dame P. Fenner) and for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) on 14 October, and were reflected in the outline route map published by the Department.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will be lifting his safeguarding directions covering the section of the previous British Rail preferred route for the channel tunnel rail link between Detling and Malling.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. and leaned Friend made a direction on 5 November 1991 to the local authorities concerned. This varies the present safeguarding directions for the channel tunnel rail link in Kent so that these no longer apply to the west of the A249 at Detling.

Browniesside

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will now publish the report of the inspector who conducted the public inquiry into objections to the A1 Browniesside improvement scheme.

Mr. Chope: The decision letter and inspector's report on the statutory orders for the A1 Browniesside improvement scheme will be issued in a matter of weeks.

Blighted Homes

Sir. John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will be using his new powers under the Planning and Compensation Act 1991 to make voluntary acquisitions of blighted homes regardless of their distance from the proposed new highway scheme in question.

Mr. Chope: Section 62 of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991 gives my right hon. Friend the power to acquire property which in his opinion will be seriously affected by the Department's road schemes. The criteria by which he will exercise his discretion are under consideration.

Driving Licence Fees

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the income from driving licence fees during 1990-91.

Mr. Chope: The income from driving licence fees for the year 1990-91 was £22,305,780.

High-speed Rail Link

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will publish the precise details of the channel tunnel rail link route as it passes through the Dartford constituency; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he expects the original Ove Arup consultation scheme to visit the Dartford constituency to discuss the implications of the chosen channel tunnel rail link route upon local householders and communities;

(3) if the route he has approved for the channel link in concept deviates significantly from that running at March 1990.

Mr. Freeman: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which I gave today to my hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner).

Road Accidents

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action his Department has taken over the past year to reduce the number of people who are killed or injured on the roads.

Mr. Chope: I have today published the "Road Safety Report 1990-91" which describes the measures to reduce casualties that the Department, together with the Scottish and Welsh Offices, have promoted over the past year. Copies have been placed in the House Library.

Central European Time

Sir Gerrard Neale: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the effect of a move by the United Kingdom to central European time on the number of fatal and serious road accidents; and whether the Government support such a move.

Mrs. Rumbold: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to estimates by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory set out in the Green Paper "Summer time: A Consultation Document", CM722. The responses to the Green Paper revealed considerable difference of opinion within the United Kingdom about options for future summer time arrangements. Policy on those arrangements therefore remains under consideration.

Smoke Emissions

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will specify what type of smoke measuring equipment will be required for use in heavy goods vehicle testing stations.

Mr. Chope: The vehicle inspectorate is currently studying which smoke opacity measuring equipment should be installed in heavy goods vehicle testing stations.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will bring forward proposals to amend the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations to require the identification of manufacturers' emission standards as recorded at COP testing on under-bonnet plates.

Mr. Chope: There is no need to do this. Information on vehicle manufacturers' recommended emission levels is readily available from the manufacturers and their agents and from certain specialist publications.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what standards will be used to assess emissions of smoke from heavy goods vehicles.

Mr. Chope: The current test relies on a visual check of smoke density by vehicle examiners to standards which are published in the heavy goods vehicle inspection manual. The same standards will be applied when smoke meters are introduced into the testing scheme.

Cycles

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps are taken by his Department to ensure that cycles using the public highway are equipped with an audible means of warning.

Mr. Chope: In 1984, there was consultation upon a proposal to require pedal cycles to be fitted with bells. The proposal was not implemented because it was subject to many objections from cycling organisations and also the Pedestrians Association. The issue will be considered further when the Pedal Cycles (Safety) Regulations are updated next year.

Remote Sensing Equipment

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for the use of remote sensing equipment to detect in-use vehicles which exceed the new MOT standards for carbon monoxide; and what action will be taken.

Mr. Chope: None.

DEFENCE

Operation Buffalo Nuclear Tests

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to remove nuclear debris from the site of the Operation Buffalo nuclear tests and to store such debris in a nuclear waste depository.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: This is a matter fror the Government of Australia.

Maralinga Nuclear Test Site

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his current estimate of the extent of plutonium contamination of the Maralinga site, resulting from the minor trials of British nuclear weapons.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The latest assessment of the extent of contamination of the Maralinga site is contained in the report by the technical assessment group entitled "Rehabilitation of Former Nuclear Test Sites in Australia" published by the Australian Department of Primary Industries and Energy in November 1990. I will arrange for a copy of this report to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest assessment of the extent of radioactive contamination of the Maralinga site of the British nuclear bomb test; and what is his latest estimate of the cost of a clean up.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The latest assessment of the extent of contamination and cost of clean-up of the Maralinga site is contained in the report by the technical assessment group entitled "Rehabilitation of Former Nuclear Test Sites in Australia" published by the Australian Department of Primary Industries and Energy in November 1990. I will arrange for a copy of this report to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimates his Department has made of the cost of decontamination of the Maralinga range, South Australia; what representations he has received on this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Newport, (Mr. Flynn), on 5 November, Official Report, column 43. Estimates of the cost of options for rehabilitation of the former nuclear weapon test sites at Maralinga and Emu Field are set out in the report of the technical assessment group entitled "Rehabilitation of Former Nuclear Test Sites in Australia" published by the Australian Department of Primary Industries and Energy in November 1990. I will arrange for a copy of this report to be placed in the Library of the House.

Regiments

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out the dates for restructuring the regiments of the combat arms.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is intended to implement the majority of the regimental mergers and other restructuring progressively over the next four years. Plans have been made for the following major changes to take place by early 1993:

Early 1992

40 Army Engineer Support Group and RHQ 28 Engineer Regiment amalgamate.

30 Field Squadron Royal Engineers disbands.

Mid 1992

2nd and 3rd Royal Tank Regiments amalgamate

4th/7th Dragoon Guards and 5th Royal Inniskilling Dragoon Guards amalgamate.

The 1st, 2nd and 3rd Battalions of The Royal Regiment of Fusiliers merge to form two battalions.

The 1st, 2nd and 3rd Battalions of The Royal Anglian Regiment merge to form two battalions.

The 1st, 2nd and 3rd Battalions of The Royal Green Jackets merge to form two battalions

52 Field Squadron (Construction) Royal Engineers disbands.

244 Signal Squadron (Air Support) disbands.

Late 1992

The 1st and 2nd Battalions of 2nd King Edwards VII's Own Gurkha Rifles merge to form one battalion.

13th/18th Royal Hussars and 15th/19th The King's Royal Hussars amalgamate.
The Life Guards and The Blues and Royals combine.
The Royal Hussars and 14th/20th King's Hussars amalgamate.
49 Field Regiment Royal Artillery disbands.
22 Signal Regiment disbands.

Early 1993
The 1st, 2nd and 3rd Battalions of The Queen's Regiment together with The Royal Hampshire Regiment amalgamate to form a regiment of two battalions.
The 1st, 2nd and 3rd Battalions of The Light Infantry merge to form two battalions.
27 Field Regiment Royal Artillery disbands.
50 Missile Regiment Royal Artillery disbands.

Detailed planning for later years has not been finalised but it is expected that the following timetable will apply:

1993
The 1st and 2nd Battalions of The Royal Irish Rangers merge to form a single general service battalion.
The Second Battalions of the Coldstream Guards and the Scots Guards are placed in suspended animation.
The Cheshire Regiment and The Staffordshire Regiment amalgamate.
The Queen's Own Hussars and The Queen's Royal Irish Hussars amalgamate.
1st and 4th Royal Tank Regiments amalgamate.
16th/5th The Queen's Royal Lancers and 17th/21st Lancers amalgamate.
45 Field Regiment Royal Artillery disbands.
94 Locating Regiment Royal Artillery disbands.
23 Engineer Regiment disbands.
10 Field Squadron Royal Engineers disbands.
16 Field Squadron Royal Engineers disbands.
229 Signal Squadron disbands.

1994
The Queen's Own Highlanders and The Gordon Highlanders amalgamate.
The Gloucestershire Regiment and The Duke of Edinburgh's Royal Regiment amalgamate.
The Royal Scots and The King's Own Scottish Borderers amalgamate.
The Second Battalion of the Grenadier Guards is placed in suspended animation.
2 Field Regiment Royal Artillery disbands.
46 Air Defence Battery Royal Artillery disbands.
26 Engineer Regiment disbands.
38 Field Squadron Royal Engineers disbands.
1st Armoured Division Headquarters and Signal Regiment disbands.

1995
2nd King Edward VII's Own Gurkha Rifles, 6th Queen Elizabeth's Own Gurkha Rifles, 7th Duke of Edinburgh's Own Gurkha Rifles and 10th Princess Mary's Own Gurkha Rifles merge to form a single large regiment of three battalions.
71 Amphibious Support Squadron Royal Engineers disbands.
28 Signal Regiment disbands.
NORTHAG Air Support Radio Squadron disbands.

By 1997
As part of the drawdown in Hong Kong: there will be a reduction of one further Gurkha battalion; The Queen's Gurkha Engineers, The Queen's Gurkha Signals and the Gurkha Transport Regiment will each reduce to one squadron; and 660 Squadron Army Air Corps will disband.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Population (Ethnic Groups)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average sentence length of the prison population for each major ethnic group.

Mrs. Rumbold: The readily available information for 1990 is given in the table. The differences between the average sentence lengths received by males in the major ethnic groups in 1984-85 were discussed in Home Office Statistical Bulletin Issue No. 17/86 "The Ethnic Origin of Prisoners: The Prison Population on 30 June 1985 and Persons Received July 1984—March 1985, paragraphs 24-27" a copy of which is in the Library. The differences were found to be associated with a range of factors including the type of offence, the type of court which had passed sentence, and the number of previous convictions.

The average sentence lengths recorded for some of the female groups may be unrepresentative in that they are based on small numbers of persons.

Torture

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received the report on the visit to the United Kingdom by the European committee for the prevention of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: We have received the committee's report and have recently responded to it. Subject to the committee's agreement, we plan to make its report and the Government's response publicly available as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made.

City Status

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications he has received for city status; and if he will list those towns seeking city status.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: It is likely that the Queen will wish to grant city status to one town to mark the 40th anniversary of her accession. I have received representations that their town might be chosen for this from and on behalf of the authorities of the following 20 towns in England: Blackburn; Bolton; Brighton; Chelmsford; Colchester; Croydon; Dudley; Guildford; Ipswich; Middlesbrough; Milton Keynes; Northampton; Preston; Sandwell; Shrewsbury; Southend-on-Sea; Stockport; Sunderland; Telford; and Wolverhampton.

Dogs

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to publish the first set of centrally collected statistics related to the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991.

Mrs. Rumbold: Information relating to 1991 prosecutions is expected to be available towards the end of 1992.

Prison Officers

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the general secretary of the Prison Officers Association; and what subjects were discussed.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend last met the chairman and general secretary of the Prison Officers Association on 25 July 1991. I met them on 7 November. Subjects discussed at these meetings included the reorganisation of London prisons, the use of police cells, the corporate objectives process, the current review of the prison estate, contracting out and the Prison Service Union's application for recognition.

Prison Escapes

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners have escaped from prisons in the United Kingdom in each of the last three years up to 1 November.

Mrs. Rumbold: The figures are as follows:

	Number
Year ended 1 November 1989	169
Year ended 1 November 1990	185
Year ended 1 November 1991	316

Reports of all escapes are analysed to identify methods and possible preventive measures. The numbers of escapes nevertheless remain a cause for concern.

Joseph Arthur Lewis Baker

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is yet in a position to write to the hon. Member for Stockton, South about the matters relating to Joseph Arthur Lewis Baker raised on 22 October 1991, Official Report, column 539.

Mrs. Rumbold: I have written to my hon. Friend.

Prison Cells, London

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison cells were out of use on 1 November at London prisons due to the work taking place on the installation of an internal sanitation system.

Mrs. Rumbold: Three hundred and four cells.

Relate

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are being used to decide the forthcoming level of grant allocation to Relate.

Mr. John Patten: Subject to parliamentary approval of supply estimates the level of grant to Relate's central administrative costs in 1992-93 will maintain cores funding in real terms. Additional funding will be made available in 1992-93 for other activities designed to improve the organisation's management structures at national and local level.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will show the level of grant expenditure allocated to Relate each year since 1979, both at current prices and showing the percentage change in the level of funding.

Mr. John Patten: The information is as follows:

	Grant (£ cash terms)	Percentage increase on previous years
1979-80	418,000	-
1980-81	555,000	32·8
1981-82	704,000	26·8
1982-83	750,000	6·5
1983-84	788,000	5·0
1984-85	827,460	5·0
1985-86	864,570	4·5
1986-87	890,500	3·0
1987-88	912,870	2·5
1988-89	935,910	2·5
1989-90	958,890	2·5
1990-91	1,006,840	5·0
1991-92	1,107,500	10·0
1992-93	[1]1,511,400	36·5

[1]Subject to Parliamentary approval of Supply Estimates.

In addition Relate received a special grant of £600,000 over the three years 1988-89 to 1990-91.

Sunday Trading

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration his Department is giving to the use of section 43 of the Shops Act 1950 to enable shops to trade legally on Sundays during the Christmas period.

Mrs. Rumbold: Section 43 of the Shops Act 1950 contains no power to vary the provisions of the Act which are concerned specifically with Sunday trading.

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue guidance on which shops and markets may open and which goods may be legally offered for sale in England on Sundays between 17 November and Christmas.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply to a question from him given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 5 November 1991 at column 46.

PC Tony Salt

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands as to why PC Mark Bury was permitted to retire on medical grounds before disciplinary action was taken against him, following the various false statements he made about the circumstances surrounding the death of his colleague, PC Tony Salt;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands as to the date on which Assistant Chief Constable Meften became aware of the statement by the widow of PC Salt regarding the discovery of her husband's kubaton; and what action he took;

(3) if he will call for a report from the West Midlands police regarding the disciplinary action taken against the officers responsible for obtaining confessions from Messrs. Peter Gibbs, Mark Samuels and Tony Frances on charges of murdering PC Tony Salt;

(4) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands as to (a) the date when the widow of the late PC Tony Salt made a statement regarding the discovery at home of her husband's kubaton, (b) the date the statement was passed to the Crown prosecution service and (c) the date charges were dropped against the three men accused of Mr. Salt's murder.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. These are matters for the chief constable of the West Midlands.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will order a public inquiry into the death of PC Tony Salt; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No.

Young Offenders

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what plans he has to encourage the establishment of projects similar to the Ilderton motor project in Deptford;

(2) if he will list the community-based projects in the United Kingdom which attempt to rehabilitate young people convicted of the offence of taking away a vehicle without the owner's consent; and how much Home Office funding has been allocated to such projects in recent years.

Mr. John Patten: The Home Office is providing £157,000 to seven motor projects this financial year under the young adult offenders grant scheme which exists to support voluntary organisations offering supervision to a wide range of offenders, in partnership with probation services. These projects are:

Guiding Hands Assocation, West Glamorgan	20,787
Croft Motor Trust, North Yorkshire	4,100
Car Offender Project, West Sussex	27,774
Dragon Wheels, South Glamorgan	2,194
NACRO New Careers Training, West Yorkshire	69,653
Telford Drive, Shropshire	21,679
Mendip Motor Project, Somerset	11,300
Total	157,487

Similarly the Home Office makes grants available through the safer cities programme to motor projects with the aims of crime prevention. Grants in this financial year are:

Salford Swinton Karting	2,005
Salford General Education in Automobile Responsibility	12,000
Nottingham Wheelbase	13,500
Hull Orchard Park Wheels	750
Coventry Henley Green Motorcycle	16,000
Bradford Motor Education	16,500
	60,755

No comprehensive record is held centrally of similar projects in England and Wales not funded by the Home Office.

Overall provision for the young adult offender grant scheme is being increased from £2·8 million this financial year to £3·8 million next; further applications will be invited shortly and motor projects as well as others will be welcome to apply.

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many young offenders have been transferred from Hewell Grange to other institutions since 1 September 1991.

Mrs. Rumbold: The following numbers of young offenders have been transferred from Hewell Grange since 1 September:

	Number
Week commencing 1 September	Nil
Week commencing 8 September	5
Week commencing 15 September	Nil
Week commencing 22 September	95
Week commencing 29 September	2

On 30 September the role of Hewell Grange was changed from that of a young offender institution to a category D open prison for adult males.

Football (Policing)

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a table showing, for each year since 1986, (a) the total number of police officers on duty at Football League matches in England and Wales, (b) the total attendance at Football League matches in England and Wales, (c) the total number of police officers as a percentage of the total attendance at Football League matches in England and Wales and (d) the total number of police officers in England and Wales.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Information on the number of police officers on duty at Football League matches is not held centrally. On 31 July 1991 I wrote to the hon. Member with details of the attendance at Football League matches in England and Wales; those details were placed in the Library. The number of police officers in England and Wales is contained in the following table:

	Police strength at 31 December
1990	127,090
1989	126,110
1988	124,759
1987	124,102
1986	121,550

NATIONAL FINANCE

British Telecom

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the costs to the Government of (a) advertising, (b) marketing, (c) fees to advisers and (d) receiving bank and registration costs in connection with the sale of further shares in BT from (i) March 1990 to date and (ii) projected costs from March 1990 to March 1992.

Mr. Maude: Costs for the BT sale will be reported to Parliament after the sale has been completed. Sales proceeds will be appropriated in aid of the expenses of the sale.

Civil Service Recruitment

Mr. Beith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any plans to improve recruitment and retention levels in the civil service in the London area.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Recruitment and retention in the civil service is monitored carefully. There have been very significant improvements in the recruitment and retention position of the civil service in the London area, due in part to the changes in pay which the Government have introduced over the past three years.

Monetary Union

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact on the United Kingdom net contribution to the community budget of the proposals on cohesion in the draft treaty on monetary union.

Mr. Maude: Cohesion is best achieved by sound macro-economic policies, supported by the existing structural funds, within which there is provision for commitments to be doubled in real terms by 1993 in comparison with 1987. Future levels of the funds will be considered as part of the review of Community finances, not within the intergovernmental conferences. There is no reason why economic and monetary union should justify increases in the funds; sound open-market policies should bring about the convergence of economic performance necessary before any decision could be taken to move to a single currency.

Savings (Taxation)

Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give figures for the taxation on savings in each OECD country for savings of (a) £10,000 and (b) £20,000.

Mr. Maude: The tax charge would depend on the type of investments held and the degree to which they produced income or capital gains subject to tax, as well as the amount of income and gains from other sources received by the saver and the availability of tax allowances and reliefs.

Guest Houses

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what amount of revenue has been lost from uncollected uniform business rates from guest houses accommodating more than six paying guests.

Mr. Key: I have been asked to reply.
This information is not available.

THE ARTS

Regional Arts Boards

31. Mr. Soames: To ask the Minister for the Arts what progress has been made on the setting up of the new regional arts boards.

Mr. Renton: I am delighted to tell my hon. Friend that excellent progress has been made. The 10 new regional arts boards formally came into being as planned on 1 October this year. The chairman and vast majority of board members have been appointed, and there remains only a small number of staff appointments to be made.

Arts, London

33. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Minister for the Arts what financial assistance is currently given to the arts in London out of public funds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The Arts Council spent £19·3 million in London in 1990-91 on its own clients and through Greater London Arts. In addition, the Arts Council made grants totalling just under £51·5 million to the major national companies, which are mainly based in London.

Local authorities in London also provide support for the arts from public funds.

Victoria and Albert Museum

34. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he next plans to visit the Victoria and Albert museum to discuss the increase in its collection of fine arts.

Mr. Renton: I have made several visits to the Victoria and Albert museum and am familiar with the extent of its magnificent collections of fine arts. Last week I was pleased to announce additional funding of £5 million over four years to the museum to enable it to concentrate conservation of these collections in a single building at South Kensington.

Arts Sponsorship

35. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Minister for the Arts by how much the demand for business sponsorship incentive scheme awards exceeds the funding available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The business sponsorship incentive scheme has been very successful in attracting sponsorship, with 2,075 sponsors and £45 million new money for the arts since 1984. The scheme is currently confined to new sponsors and demand for matching awards is close to the current ceiling of £3·5 million. From 1992-93 the annual budget will be increased to £4·5 million to help sustain the continuing growth in business sponsorship of the arts.

Museums (North-West)

37. Mr. Pike: To ask the Minister for the Arts what industrial museums he has visited in the last 12 months in the north-west.

Mr. Renton: Since my appointment as Minister for the Arts in November 1990 I have visited the Quarry Bank mill at Styall in Cheshire, and the museum of science and industry in Manchester in June. Last week on a return visit to Manchester, I was pleased to announce a special grant of £200,000 in 1992-93 towards that museum's 1830s warehouse project.

Birmingham (City of Music)

Mr. Roger King: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will visit Birmingham during its year as Arts Council city of music in 1992.

Mr. Renton: I was delighted to be present at the launch on 7 October of "Sounds like Birmingham", which sets out a full and exciting range of events to celebrate Birmingham's year as City of Music. It will also play a prominent part in National Music Day. I am inviting the EC Ministers of Culture to join me in Birmingham on 7 September 1992 to mark our presidency of the European Communities.

CIVIL SERVICE

Executive Agencies

41. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service if he will make a statement on the achievements of the next steps agencies.

Mr. Renton: Next steps is progressing well. We are today publishing the 1991 annual review on next steps agencies together with the Government reply to the seventh report of the Treasury and Civil Service Committee. The annual review shows agencies meeting and beating targets for quality of service, financial performance and efficiency and gives many instances of improved service to customers.

Mr. Cash: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service when the Government intend to reply to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee's seventh report of Session 1990-91, on the next steps initiative; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The Government are today publishing, as Cm 1761, the reply to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee's latest report on next steps.

The Government are able to report further good progress in implementing next steps, with 56 agencies now established and 32 more announced candidates. Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue are moving towards full operation on next steps lines. In all, by next April over half the civil service should be covered, and some 70 agencies due to be established by next July. The Government are committed to completing the coverage as far as practicable by the end of 1993. Details of all existing agencies are set out in the second annual review of next steps, published today as Cm 1760, which also sets out their targets and the results they are achieving.

The Government welcome the Committee's continuing endorsement of next steps, its recognition of the substantial progress that has been made, and its constructive recommendations. The Government remain firmly committed to taking forward this major programme of change, to making the reforms durable, and to ensuring that they deliver all the benefits of which they are capable. Next steps is leading to a more effective and adaptable civil service, with all its traditional values of propriety and impartiality intact, but better attuned to deliver the high-quality public services for which the citizen increasingly looks.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Divorce

Mr. Battle: To ask the Attorney-General what information he has concerning the total cost of processing divorce applications in England and Wales in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available.

The Attorney-General: The information sought is not readily available. It is estimated that the administrative cost of processing divorce proceedings in the High Court and in the county courts in each of the last four years was:

	£ million
1987-88	16·5
1988-89	17·0
1989-90	18·3
1990-91	20·5

A substantial proportion of these costs is recovered by way of court fees, as follows;

	£ million
1987-88	13·8
1988-89	14·8
1989-90	15·9
1990-91	16·9

The net cost of legal aid and advice in divorce and related matters during the same period was:

	£ million
1987-88	95·6
1988-89	109·6
1989-90	117·4
1990-91	137·0

Court Hearings

Mr. Butcher: To ask the Attorney-General if he will ensure that during court hearings of serious crimes, witnesses for the prosecution are securely separated from defendants' associates and defendants' witnesses while on court premises.

The Attorney-General: Segregated witness waiting rooms are provided in existing court buildings wherever possible. For new Crown court buildings, the design standards provide for a sufficient number of witness waiting rooms per courtroom and a separate witness suite which incorporates toilet facilities. Listing officers will, whenever possible, list cases so that witnesses and others involved are not kept waiting unnecessarily on court premises.

Mr. Butcher: To ask the Attorney-General if he will ensure that witnesses attending hearings of serious crimes are invited to attend the court on a phased basis rather than having to be present at all times during a particular day.

The Attorney-General: So far as possible, the Crown prosecution service tries to minimise delay for witnesses waiting to give evidence, and it is current practice to phase the attendance of witnesses in lengthy trials.

County Court Rules

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Attorney-General what is the average time taken to hear a disposal action at Lambeth county court under order 9, rule 3(3) of the county court rules; and what is the reason for this length of time.

The Attorney-General: There is no longer a hearing for a disposal action under order 9, rule 3(3). In line with the Lord Chancellor's objective of ensuring that business in the civil courts is dealt with at the most appropriate level this function is now undertaken by court staff.

Extradition (Ireland)

Mr. Stanbrook: To ask the Attorney-General what arrangements have been made (a) to comply with the terms imposed by the Irish Republic on the endorsement of British warrants under the Irish Extradition (Amendment) Act 1989 and (b) to comply with the Irish demand for formal adoption of the speciality rule in extradition arrangements between the United Kingdom and the Irish Republic.

The Attorney-General: The effect of the Extradition (Amendment) Act 1987 in the Republic of Ireland is that a warrant issued in the United Kingdom can be backed for execution in the republic only if the Attorney-General in the republic is satisfied that there is a clear intention to prosecute the person, and that this intention is based on sufficient evidence. To enable the Attorney-General in the republic to discharge this duty, I have agreed that, in cases arising in England, Wales and Northern Ireland, I shall supply him with a certificate confirming the prosecuting authority's intention to prosecute, a statement detailing the facts of the case, and a statement of the relevant law. These documents are not required, however, if the person concerned has been ordered to stand trial following a consideration of the evidence by a judicial authority, since the relevant provisions of the 1987 Act do not apply to such a case.

There is no statutory speciality rule that applies to extradition arrangements between the United Kingdom and the republic. There is an agreement between the United Kingdom and the republic, however, which the Government have no plans to change and under which the consent of the requested state is required before charges, other than those for which the offender's return was ordered, may be substituted or added, save in the limited circumstances where the substituted offence is one for which the jury could enter an alternative verdict notwithstanding that the indictment contained only the charge for which his return was ordered.

PC Tony Salt

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Attorney-General if he will order an inquiry into the failure of the Crown prosecution service to disclose to solicitors for the persons charged with murdering PC Tony Salt the statement by his widow regarding the discovery of her husband's kubaton; on what date it was disclosed; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The Crown prosecution service is committed to full discharge of its obligation to disclose to persons charged with criminal offences or to their lawyers all material not included in the prosecution case which has some bearing on the offences charged and the surrounding circumstances of the case. The acting Director of Public Prosecutions has not yet been able to ascertain whether there was a failure in this particular case but has asked for a report upon the circumstances. I will write to the hon. Member in the light of that report.

Trade and Industry Select Committee

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Attorney-General what progress has been made in his consideration of the papers sent to him by members of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry relating to the alleged harassment of members of that Committee; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney General: I refer my hon. Friend to the answers which I gave to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery on 6 November 1991, at column 113.

Inter-agency Steering Group

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement concerning the inter-agency steering group appointed to prepare plans for the implementation of the report of the working group on pre-trial issues.

The Attorney General: The Lord Chancellor, the Home Secretary and I have approved the implementation plan submitted recently by the steering group. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

In the preparation of the plan, the steering group consulted organisations and professional bodies with a direct interest in the working group's report. The steering group concluded that the interdependent nature of the recommendations means that it is necessary to implement the report as a package to achieve worthwhile improvements in the effectiveness and efficiency of pre-trial and court procedures, for example the proposed national time guidelines for the progress of cases will only be realised if the police produce the standard of prosecution files required, the Crown prosecution service —CPS—serves advance information on the defence by the first hearing date, and the courts revise listing practices.

The police, the CPS and the courts are required to adopt new approaches to their work which will substantially improve the quality of services provided to victims, witnesses, defendants and others involved in criminal proceedings. The agencies concerned have demonstrated their determination to act by the steps already taken to implement some of the recommendations. The majority of the recommendations will be implemented over the next two years, and those with significant resource implications will come into effect as the funds become available. The implementation dates allow for the introduction of certain recommendations, for example typed dual police files, in stages which reflect the degree of change required in different police forces, CPS areas and court centres.

Because of the inter-related nature of recommendations it may be some time before the full benefits are seen to have been achieved across the system as a whole. My ministerial colleagues and I are nevertheless satisfied that there is a very positive joint commitment to ensure progress in the shortest possible time scale.

Social Security Tribunals

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Attorney-General if he will introduce provisions to ensure that the Office of the Social Security Commissioner supplies claimants with details as to the reasons why they have been refused leave to appeal against a decision of a social security tribunal.

The Attorney-General: It is not proposed to alter the provisions of the Tribunals and Inquiries (Social Security Commissioners) Order 1980 which exempts commissioners from the obligation to give reasons for decisions on applications for leave to appeal.

Shops Act 1950

Mr. Randall: To ask the Attorney-General what new initiatives he will be taking to ensure that the Shops Act 1950 is enforced over the Christmas period.

The Attorney-General: It remains the responsibility of local authorities to consider with their legal advisers what means are at their disposal.

Mr. Randall: To ask the Attorney-General what practical means local authorities now have at their disposal to carry out their responsibilities for enforcing the Shops Act 1950.

The Attorney-General: Parliament has given local authorities the primary responsibility for enforcing the provisions about Sunday trading in the Shops Act 1950. I shall take account of all relevant circumstances known to me, including developments in the courts, in deciding whether any new initiative by me is appropriate.

Attachment of Earnings Orders

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Attorney-General what assessment he has made of the implications of attachment of earnings orders for the security of an individual's employment.

The Attorney-General: No such assessment has been made. Employers have had a statutory obligation to comply with attachment of earnings orders since the commencement of the Attachment of Earnings Act 1971. If an individual is concerned about the effect of an attachment of earnings order on his relations with his employer, he may ask the court for a suspended order under which he makes payments directly to the creditor. Under this arrangement, a copy of the order is not sent to the employer.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what a 3 per cent. increase in real terms in aid for developing countries, over the survey period referred to in the ODA press release of 6 November, would be in cash terms for the same period.

Mrs. Chalker: The overseas aid budget for developing countries is planned to increase to £1,980 million in 1994-95 compared with the original planning figure for 1991-92 of £1,721 million; this is an increase in cash terms of 15 per cent.

Simple Truth Appeal

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the allocation of funds raised for Kurdish refugees by the Simple Truth appeal.

Mrs. Chalker: The British Red Cross, which helped to distribute the funds, confirms that all of the £57,042,000, including the £13,832,000 raised in the United Kingdom, has been accounted for. The Government were pleased to contribute £10 million. We are satisfied that these funds have been properly used. Of the £10 million, we contributed US$10 million to United Nation agencies and £5 million to the British Red Cross.

The British Red Cross figures show that of the £57,042,000, £56,098,000 has been distributed, leaving £396,000 in reserve earmarked for programmes in Iraq this winter; £250,000 of that sum was dispatched early last week to supplement winterisation programmes already in being. The difference of £548,000 represents British Red Cross's commendably low expenses.

PRIME MINISTER

Irish Republic (Legislation)

Mr. Stanbrook: To ask the Prime Minister in how many cases proceedings in the Irish Republic under their Criminal Law (Jurisdiction) Act 1976 have been requested by United Kingdom prosecuting authorities since 1976; in how many cases proceedings in the United Kingdom under the Criminal Jurisdiction Act 1975 have been requested by prosecuting authorities in the Irish Republic since 1975; and if he will make a statement on this reciprocal legislation.

The Prime Minister: Since 1976 there have been 32 applications by the United Kingdom prosecuting authorities for proceedings in the republic under the 1976 Act. There have been no applications from the prosecuting authorities in the republic under the 1975 Act, but 18 persons have been prosecuted in the United Kingdom under that Act for offences allegedly committed in the republic.

"Voice"

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Prime Minister if he will place in the Library a copy of his reply to a letter to him from "Voice" dated 11 October.

The Prime Minister: No. It is not my normal practice to do so.

Political Advisers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister, further to his reply of 5 November columns 42-43 about political advisers to Ministers, whether any of the individuals work for Ministers of lower rank than Secretary of State or equivalent.

The Prime Minister: Yes. Six do so.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister, further to his reply of 5 November columns 42-43 about political advisers, whether there is any limit on the number of political advisers who can be appointed by individual Ministers.

The Prime Minister: My approval is required for the appointment of all special advisers.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister, further to his reply of 5 November, columns 42-3, about political advisers to Ministers, if he will list the names of the individuals concerned.

The Prime Minister: The names of the special advisers (political) currently serving are as follows:

Mr. K. Adams	Mrs. E. Laing
Mr. L. Anisfield	Mr. W. Lightfoot
Mr. E. Bickham	Mr. R. Marsh
Mr. G. Black	Mr. J. Mayhew
Ms. A. Broom	Ms. S. McEwen
Ms. L. Campey	Mr. P. Miller
Mr. T. Collins	Mr. P. Moman
Mr. M. Fraser	Mrs. K. Ramsay (part-time)
Mr. J. R. M. Gardner	Dr. W. Robinson
Mr. C. M. Grantham	Mr. A. Rosling
Mr. H. Harris-Hughes	Mr. A. Ross-Goobey
Mr. J. Hill	Mr. D. Ruffley
Mrs. S. Hogg	Mr. I. Stewart
Ms. S. Hole	Lady Strathnaver
Mr. A. Kemp (part-time)	Mr. N. True
Mr. T. Kerpel	Miss B. Wallis (part-time)
Mrs. T. Keswick	Mr. A. Young

Civil Service (Sexual Harassment)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Prime Minister if he will develop a female contact point in the civil service management structure where women can seek guidance when suffering from sexual harassment.

The Prime Minister: The civil service is committed to providing a working environment which is free of harassment for all staff. Departments and agencies are advised to ensure that women who feel that they have been subjected to sexual harassment are able to go to a woman officer for advice and support in dealing with the problem. In many departments and agencies there are specially designated women officers to contact in case of sexual harassment. Specific training is available for those dealing with complaints of sexual harassment.

Single Parents

Mr. Battle: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list all Government policy initiatives taken since 1987 which aim to assist single parents.

The Prime Minister: The information is set out in the table.

Policy initiatives taken since 1987 to assist lone parents

Department/ Date	Policy initiative
EMPLOYMENT September 1988	Lone parents who have been in receipt of Income Support for at least 26 weeks may enter Employment Training even if they do not meet the usual eligibility criteria.
HEALTH Since 1987	The National Council for One Parent Families and Gingerbread have received over £1 million in core grants.
Since 1987-88	Gingerbread has received a total of £90,000 for its local groups from the Department's under fives small grants scheme.
Early 1988	Over £1 million of the RPI error monies was spent by 10 voluntary organisations on many different projects for lone parents.
Since 1989-90	The second Under Fives Initiative includes 4 local projects, costing in all over £300,000, to help understand better the effect of childcare services on the economic circumstances of lone parents.
HOME OFFICE 1991	In the Maintenance Enforcement Act 1991 the Government has given courts additional powers to enforce the payment of maintenance, which will help to ensure that single parents receive the monies to which they are entitled. The Act will be implemented in spring 1992.
LORD CHANCELLOR'S 1989	Single Parents can benefit from the new orders provided under the Children Act 1989. One of the Act's main principles is that parents should, wherever possible, come to an agreement about the future of their children without the intervention of the court. The Act also gives unmarried fathers the chance to apply for formal parental responsibility for their children.
SOCIAL SECURITY April 1988	The structure of personal allowances in Income Support provide that all lone parents aged 18 or over receive the full adult rate of benefit, normally only available from age 25. The Income Support lone parent premium is paid on top of the family premium to those lone parents who do not qualify for another type of premium. Income Support earnings disregard is £15 a week for lone parents, compared with a £5 disregard for most single people. Family Credit introduced: a much more generous scheme for all low income families than the Family Income Supplement scheme. In Family Credit lone parents get the same adult credit as two parent families. One Parent Benefit is ignored when calculating entitlement to Family Credit. Higher levels of lone parent premium in Housing Benefit and Community Charge Benefit. Housing Benefit and Community Charge Benefit rules for lone parents generally aligned with those in Income Support.
October 1989	Lone parents under 18 who have to live away from home entitled to the over 18 rate of Income Support personal allowance.
April 1990	Lone parent premium in Housing Benefit and Community Charge Benefit increased.
October 1990	Earnings disregard for those lone parents not on Income Support but receiving Housing Benefit or Community Charge Benefit increased from £15 to £25 a week.
Planned for April 1992	Reduction in qualifying hours rule in Family Credit from 24 to 16 hours a week. Corresponding change in Income Support. Introduction of £15 maintenance disregard in Family Credit, Disability Working Allowance, Housing Benefit and Community Charge Benefit. Child Support Unit Becomes operational and takes on existing liable relative work in preparation for the establishment of the Child Support Agency.

Department/ Date	Policy initiative
Planned for Spring 1993	Child Support Agency becomes operational. The Agency will trace absent parents, assess, collect and review child maintenance, and ensure that payments are made regularly.
WELSH OFFICE	Gingerbread is helped through the Support for Child and Family Services' grant scheme.
1991-92	A total of £24,440 has been awarded to Gingerbread to meet part of the costs of their Swansea office and of a development officer in North Wales.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make the European Community's policy for disabled people one of his priorities at the Maastricht summit.

The Prime Minister: We believe that existing provisions for disabled people at the European level are satisfactory. In addition, a number of new proposals relating to disabled people are under consideration.

London Government

Mr. Tracey: To ask the Prime Minister how many representations he has received calling for a directly elected council for the London conurbation; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: As far as I am aware none, although my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has received a dozen or so, mostly in response to consultation on the review of local government outside London and the metropolitan counties. I am aware that the main opposition parties and the Association of London Authorities want to recreate a Greater London council in all but name. I have no plans for changing the basic structure of local government in London.

Child Benefit

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy not to allow names and addresses of child benefit claimants to be sold or passed on outside the Department of Social Security.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 8 November 1991]: It is Government policy that all personal information, including names and addresses, held in social security records should be regarded as confidential and should not normally be disclosed to a third party without the consent of the person concerned. Information may normally be disclosed without consent to assist the police in the investigation of a serious crime; to meet the welfare needs of the individual concerned; to meet statutory requirements, for example, to other Government Departments or organisations which act as agents of the DSS in paying benefit; and to prevent the duplication of payments from public funds. We have no plans to change this policy.

Executive Agencies

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what changes have been made in the arrangements regarding the sending of letters from chief executives of executive agencies to hon. Members in response to parliamentary questions when the House is not sitting.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 8 November 1991]: The aim of the arrangements for chief executives to write direct to hon. Members is to ensure that the replies are full, prompt and as helpful as possible. It is for individual Ministers to determine how they will achieve this, including when the House is not sitting.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list each Department and each executive agency which employs its target quota of people with disabilities.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 8 November 1991]: All departments and agencies work to increase opportunities for people with disabilities, whether registered or unregistered, under a civil service code of practice on the employment of people with disabilities. The civil service compares favourably with the private sector and in 1990 six departments and agencies exceeded a 3 per cent. level of staff registered as disabled. The Government will continue to seek to ensure that disabled people have opportunities for employment in departments and agencies which are at least as good as those of able bodied people.

Offensive Odours (Cardiff)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Prime Minister what consultations he has had concerning the Butetown main foul sewer and offensive odours in the area of the Cardiff bay pierhead broadwalk.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 8 November 1991]: During my visit to Cardiff bay on 20 September the problem was raised by local residents.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Adult Education

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he is taking to develop the provision of non-vocational adult education classes and increase the access to vocational classes for mature students.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the Further and Higher Education Bill, which was introduced in another place on November 4. Our proposals are designed to increase participation and improve opportunities in further education, including for adults.

English Teaching

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to legislate for the regulation of schools teaching English as a foreign language.

Mr. Eggar: There are no plans for the regulation of private sector schools teaching English as a foreign language. Consumer choice, backed by the independent voluntary accreditation schemes, appropriately safeguards proper standards in the non-maintained further and higher education institutions.

Howbury Grange School

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received on the future of Howbury Grange school, Slade Green, Erith.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend has received five letters about the Howbury Grange school. Four expressed opposition to its proposed closure and one sought technical information about the statutory procedures relating to school closures.

IQ Tests

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information is provided in the syllabus to students at teacher training colleges on IQ or mental tests for children.

Mr. Fallon: The Secretary of State's criteria for the approval of courses of initial teacher training state:

"on completion of their course students should have developed skills in the evaluation and recording of pupil performance, including in particular the testing and assessment requirements related to the National Curriculum and, where relevant, the preparation of pupils for public examinations."

ENERGY

Energy and the Environment

12. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what response he has made to the House of Lords European Affairs Select Committee report on energy and the environment.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government provided the Committee with a response to each of the report's conclusions and recommendations on 16 October; with the agreement of the Committee, we placed a copy of the response in the Library on 7 November. A debate on the report is taking place this afternoon in another place.

Coal Mining (Employment)

14. Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he intends to meet the chairman of British Coal to discuss the levels of employment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the chairman of British Coal regularly to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

Oil and Gas Revenues

15. Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the value of production in the United Kingdom continental shelf of the oil and gas revenues to the United Kingdom Exchequer.

26. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the value of production in the United Kingdom continental shelf of oil and gas revenues to the United Kingdom Exchequer.

Mr. Moynihan: In his autumn statement, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave his estimate of the value to the United Kingdom exchequer of UKCS oil and gas production as being £2·5 billion for the financial year 1990-91.

Nuclear Waste Disposal

16. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with his counterparts in other European Community countries on the disposal of nuclear waste from electricity production on the sites of nuclear power stations and other nuclear installations.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Neither the Secretary of State for the Environment, who has policy responsibility for nuclear waste management, nor myself, with responsibility for nuclear energy policy more widely, has recently had discussions with European Community counterparts on the disposal of nuclear waste from power stations and other nuclear installations.

Electricity Generation

17. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on progress towards the establishment of independent electricity generation projects.

Mr. Wakeham: The Government's policy is to encourage the development of competition in generation. The first new independent power station since privatisation, at Roosecote, has already started supplying electricity to the grid; construction work has now started at three other sites; and the Government are aware of around 20 other projects at various stages of consideration.

27. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the percentage of energy generation from (a) nuclear and (b) renewable sources in 1995 and 2000.

Mr. Wakeham: I anticipate that the contribution made to electricity generation by renewables will grow strongly in the future. Nuclear generation will also continue to make a substantial contribution.

Solar Energy

18. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what research is being undertaken into the potential for active solar technology in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Moynihan: I announced on 19 August a review which is presently under way to investigate developments in active solar heating during the last 10 years. As part of that review we are undertaking a comprehensive survey of the United Kingdom active solar heating industry.

Non-fossil Fuel Obligation

19. Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the future of the non-fossil fuel obligation.

Mr. Wakeham: The non-fossil fuel obligation continues to ensure the availability in the national interest of nuclear generating capacity and, as my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy informed the House last week, is providing for the construction of greatly increased amounts of renewables-sourced generating capacity.

Refuse Incineration

20. Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment he has made of the contribution to energy needs that could be provided by (a) refuse incineration and (b) sewage sludge incineration and the technical possibilities of achieving acceptable standards for either or both.

Mr. Moynihan: Energy recovery from refuse and sewage sludge incineration can be an economically attractive and environmentally acceptable disposal route. Our review of renewable energy will consider the potential contribution from such sources of energy.

Combined Heat and Power

21. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a further statement about combined heat and power schemes.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Government fully recognise the environmental and energy efficiency benefits of combined heat and power and the Energy Efficiency Office continues to promote the wider use of the technology under its best practice programme. Interest in CHP is at a high level and the prospects for CHP in the 1990s are most encouraging.

Coal Industry

22. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next intends to meet the chairman of British Coal to discuss the future of the coal industry.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the chairman of British Coal regularly to discuss all aspects of the industry.

Insulation

23. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his most recent estimate of the annual amount spent on insulation measures in the private and public sectors.

25. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his most recent estimate of the annual amount spent on insulation measures in the private and public sectors.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: This information is not available. However, public sector expenditure to promote energy efficiency amounts to in excess of £1 billion.

Renewable Energy

24. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what new initiatives he plans to increase the volume of energy generated by renewables.

Mr. Moynihan: The second Renewables Order laid before the House on 5 November has resulted in a very substantial increase of 472 MW of capacity being contracted with the regional electricity companies. I am currently reviewing our renewable energy strategy and a revised forward plan is expected in spring 1992.

Energy Efficiency Office

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total budget granted to the Energy Efficiency Office in each year from 1986-87 to 1991-92.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The following figures give the budget provision for the Energy Efficiency Office in each year from 1986-87 to 1991-92:

	£ million
1986-87	21·3
1987-88	18·9
1988-89	20·3
1989-90	15·0
1990-91	23·3
1991-92	41·9

Clean Coal Technology

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what recent initiatives he has taken to promote research and development into clean coal technology.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In partnership with United Kingdom industry, British Coal and overseas agencies we have recently launched five new clean coal projects with a contract value of £20 million.

Wind Technology

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the obligation for wind technology under the 1991 Non-Fossil Fuel Obligation Renewables Order, calculated on the same basis as that used for the other technology bands in the statement of 5 November by the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), Official Report, columns 329-41.

Mr. Wakeham: The wind tranche of the 1991 renewables non-fossil fuel obligation has been set at a level that will build up to 82·43 MW declared net capacity. I understand that the regional electricity companies have entered into contracts for some 49 wind projects at a price of 11p/kWh.

Electricity Shareholders

Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the number of electricity vouchers sent to customer shareholders in the 12 regional electricity companies.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Nearly 1 million people who bought shares in their regional electricity companies last December were sent vouchers in August. The breakdown in respect of each company is as follows:

Electricity vouchers issued by 1 October 1991:

Company	Number of vouchers
Eastern Electricity	62,099
East Midlands Electricity	62,300
London Electricity	27,344
Manweb	98,284
Midlands Electricity	137,083
Northern Electric	72,456
NORWEB	43,267
SEEBOARD	83,667
Southern Electricity	46,091
South Wales Electricity	79,924
South Western Electricity	72,038
Yorkshire Electricity	159,845
Total	944,378

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Debt Counselling

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list debt counselling services which are currently funded wholly or in part from his Department's budget; and what plans he has to expand funding of debt counselling services.

Mr. Leigh: My Department does not provide funds specifically for debt counselling services and has no plans to do so. The main provider of debt counselling services nationally is the Citizens Advice Service which, through the network of citizens advice bureaux, advises on debt problems as part of its general advisory work. Individual bureaux are funded mainly by local authorities. My Department funds the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux and Citizens Advice Scotland which provide the support services to the local bureaux. Total DTI grant-in-aid in 1991-92 to NACAB and CAS will be about £12 million.

Many lending institutions have already provided funds to support debt counselling services; the Government would like to see more following that lead.

Insurance Services Group

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken within the specific powers and responsibilities of his office to assist civil service employees that have been or will be affected by the sale of the Insurance Services Group of the Export Credits Guarantee Department.

Mr. Sainsbury: Over 500 of ECGD employees have volunteered to transfer to the privatised new company which will take over the business of the Insurance Services Group. The decisions on who will be offered jobs in the new company and who will remain in ECGD will take account as far as possible of the preferences expressed by the employees. If there should be a surplus of people remaining in ECGD after all the transfers have taken place, every effort will be made to find them other jobs in the civil service. The appropriate unit of Her Majesty's Treasury has been alerted accordingly.

Engineering Steel Industry

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has of the effect exercised upon the engineering steel industry by the increases in electricity prices in recent months; and if he proposes to offer advice or take any action in regard to this matter.

Mr. Leigh: I am aware of the concern expressed by companies in the engineering steel industry about electricity price increases. Monitoring the operation of the electricity market is a matter for the Director General of Electricity Supply, who is also aware of this concern.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Baltic States

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he proposes for the return to the three Baltic sovereign states of their gold deposit made at the Bank of England in 1940.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have invited each Baltic Government to send a representative to London for a first round of discussions on the gold and other financial issues. Talks were held with the Estonian delegation on 7 November and the Latvian delegation on 8 November. In both cases it was agreed that a further round of discussions should be held. The discussions were friendly and useful progress was made. Talks with the Lithuanian delegation have been arranged for 13 November.

Western Sahara

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what support is being given by Her Majesty's Government to the Sahrawi refugees in the western Sahara.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have not provided any bilateral financial assistance to western Saharan refugees. However, we have given our full support to the United Nations Secretary-General's settlement plan, which envisages the holding of a referendum early next year. This will enable the Saharawi to determine their own future. We have contributed, both in terms of finance and personnel, to the United Nations mission (MINURSO) responsible for the organisation and conduct of the referendum.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the situation in the western Sahara in respect of the progress on the United Nations peace plan; and what action is being taken by the United Kingdom Government to support the peace plan.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) on 5 November, column 27.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the European Council of Ministers last discussed the problems of disabled people; and when he next expects the Council of Ministers to discuss these problems.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The Council of Ministers agreed a Council resolution on 31 May 1990 on the integration of disabled young people into ordinary systems of education.

The Commission has published this year proposals concerning disabled people under its social action programme, but they have not yet been scheduled for Council discussion.

Croatia

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he is taking to bring the fighting in Croatia to an end.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: On 8 November we and our EC partners agreed a number of economic measures against Yugoslavia. We shall now be working towards a United Nations Security Council resolution imposing restrictions on the sale of oil to Yugoslavia.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements he is making to provide a package of aid to assist the people of Croatia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are contributing £250,000 to the International Red Cross Committee's effort in Yugoslavia. Together with our share of the 1 million ecu already committed by the European Community this brings our total contribution to over £1·3 million.

European Union

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress in the current negotiations on European political, economic and monetary union leading up to the ministerial European Council on 8 December.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Following the European Council in Luxembourg on 28-29 June, the Netherlands presidency has made good progress in leading negotiations on both political and economic and monetary union towards settlement at the European Council in Maastricht on 9 to 10 December.

On political union, the presidency has held a number of ministerial sessions of the intergovernmental conference since July and has made good progress on the basis of the Luxembourg presidency's text produced in June. A revised presidency text was produced on 9 November. It will be for the presidency to reconcile the differing views of member states in order to achieve an agreement acceptable to all at Maastricht.

On economic and monetary union discussions are now focussed on a composite text of draft treaty amendments circulated by the Netherlands presidency on 28 October. The text is a useful basis for further negotiations, but neither the United Kingdom nor other member states are committed to any particular part of its contents.

EC Draft Treaties

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what circulation has been given by the current Presidency of the European Council to the texts of their proposal for draft treaties on economic and monetary union and on political union; and what restrictions have been placed on their availability.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The Luxembourg presidency circulated a draft treaty text on economic and monetary and political union on 18 June in advance of the Luxembourg European Council. The Netherlands presidency produced composite draft treaty texts on political union on 24 September and on economic and monetary union on 28 October. They also produced, on 9 November, a revised treaty text on political union in advance of the Conclave of Foreign Ministers, 12 to 14 November. These texts are circulated by the presidency to those participating in the intergovernmental conferences—that is, the member states and the Commission. These are working documents in a confidential negotiation, but they have in practice rapidly become public and are or will all be available in the Library of the House.

Vietnamese Migrants

Mr. David Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Vietnamese migrants in Hong Kong.

Mr. Hurd: On 9 November, 59 Vietnamese illegal immigrants were repatriated from Hong Kong to Vietnam. This group was made up of so-called double-backers—those who did not qualify as refugees, who volunteered to return to Vietnam from Hong Kong once, thereby benefiting from repatriation payment by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, but who re-entered Hong Kong illegally for a second time, together with members of their family. All were screened again after arrival in Hong Kong and, after appeal, were again determined not to qualify for refugee status under the terms of the 1951 United Nations convention and its 1967 protocol.

The repatriation was carried out in full accordance with standard international practices, over a two-day period, and in line with the internationally agreed comprehensive plan of action, in particular the provision that all those who are not refugees should return home. On 8 November the illegal immigrants were moved from the Nei Kwu detention centre to a transit centre at Kai Tak airport. On 9 November, they were transported by air to Vietnam. Those returned will spend up to three days in the British-financed Co Nhue transit centre near Hanoi to obtain identity documents before travelling by bus to their home villages.

The Vietnamese Government have guaranteed that no illegal immigrant who returns to Vietnam will face persecution. They will facilitate the monitoring of all those who return by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and others to ensure that these guarantees are fully respected. In the last two and a half years, more than 11,500 Vietnamese migrants have returned voluntarily to Vietnam from Hong Kong without a single substantiated case of persecution.

Further repatriation will be arranged in the coming weeks. We welcome the fact that of the 160 double-backers whom we had originally intended to return to Vietnam on 9 November, more than half chose to opt for the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees' voluntary repatriation scheme. There remain almost 63,000 Vietnamese migrants in Hong Kong. We hope that all those determined to be illegal immigrants in Hong Kong will similarly opt to volunteer to return to Vietnam.

Hong Kong

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what changes he envisages in his relationship with the Hong Kong Legislative Council following the recent elections.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We share the wish expressed by the Governor of Hong Kong to build up a co-operative partnership with the new Council. This is essential for the continued success of Hong Kong. We look forward to keeping in close touch with members of the Council.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

Sittings of the House

Mr. Allen: To ask the hon. Member for Berwick upon Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, what is the cost in constant prices, in overtime, other payments and overheads, of sittings of the House beyond 10 pm for each year since 1961 for which records exist.

Mr. Beith: It is not possible to provide the information requested without disproportionate cost. It is expected, however, that the systems necessary to identify many of the elements of such expenditure in future will be established as a result of the implementation of proposals agreed by the House in respect of the report made by Sir Robin Ibbs to the House of Commons Commission.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Members' Pay and Allowances

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make it his policy to publish the reports of (a) the Hay Management Consultants into the office costs allowance, (b) the Office of Manpower economic report and (c) the Top Salaries Review Body report on Members' pay and allowances.

Mr. MacGregor: As part of the Top Salaries Review Body's review of the office costs allowance, the Office of Manpower Economics commissioned a report from Hay Management Consultants and ran a questionnaire survey of Members of Parliament. It is a matter for the review body to decide whether either or both of these are published. However, I am happy to draw the hon. Gentleman's question to the review body's attention.

Select Committees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many departmental Select Committee reports there have been since the inception of the system; and how many have been debated on the Floor on a substantive motion.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 13 June 1989, col. 357, which gave information for the period from 1979 until then. Since that time 196 reports and 90 special reports have been published by the departmentally related Select Committees. None has been debated on substantive motions; but several have been debated in other ways, including debates on estimate days and other occasions when reports were cited on the Order Paper as relevant to proceedings in the House.

Suspended Sittings

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many times a Minister of the Crown has used the power to suspend the sitting under Standing Order No. 10 since 14 July 1969.

Mr. MacGregor: The last occasion was 14 July 1969.

Thefts

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many thefts have been reported in the Palace of Westminster for the latest year.

Mr. MacGregor: The police in the Palace of Westminster have recorded 92 incidents of theft in the parliamentary precincts since 1 January 1991. Five arrests have been made in the same period.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will initiate measures to provide all Members who wish it, with keys to their offices so they can secure their property against theft; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: Members occupying the new accommodation in 1 Parliament street are already being issued with keys to their rooms. In other parliamentary outbuildings and the Palace of Westminster itself, keys can be made available to Members on request to the Serjeant at Arms. Keys are also provided for all desks and filing cabinets and it is a great help to the security staff if Members can ensure that desks and filing cabinets both in their own rooms and in their secretaries' rooms are locked when not in use, that the keys are not left in easily accessible places and that articles of value, such as portable television sets, telephones and cash boxes, as well as confidential papers are locked away when offices are left unattended.

Special Standing Committees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will list the occasions when Special Standing Committees have been established; and what proposals he has to use these procedures in the current Session.

Mr. MacGregor: The following Bills have been referred to Special Standing Committees: in Session 1980-81, the Criminal Attempts Bill, the Deep Sea Mining (Temporary Provisions) Bill [Lords], and the Education Bill; in Session 1981-82, the Mental Health (Amendment) Bill [Lords]; and in Session 1983-84, the Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Bill [Lords].

As I indicated to the House on 7 November, col. 581, this procedure is really best suited to specialist, highly technical measures which are not really of party-political controversy: I doubt if any of the Bills in the current Session fall into this category.

Private Members' Bills

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Lord President of the Council what was the cost to public funds, in each of the last four Sessions of Parliament, of printing Private Members' Bills introduced under the ten-minute rule which never reached the Second Reading stage.

Mr. MacGregor: The costs of printing all the Bills of the House are borne by HMSO, which aims to recover its costs from sales revenue.

The estimated cost, including materials, of printing Private Members' Bills introduced under the 10-minute rule which did not reach the Second Reading stage in each of the last four Sessions is as follows:

1987-88	7,500
1988-89	11,900
1989-90	11,500
1990-91	7,100

Guillotine Motions

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will list the occasions on which the Government have introduced the guillotine allocation of time order since the 1979-80 Session, indicating after how many hours in Committee on each Bill it was introduced and the total number of hours in Committee.

Mr. MacGregor [holding answer 8 November 1991]: The information is supplied in the table.

SCOTLAND

Salmon Fisheries

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will list all the bodies and individuals from whom he received formal or informal representations about the east coast salmon fisheries between the date when the report on the fisheries was first delivered to his Department and the date of its publication; and whether he will list any further bodies or individuals whom he consulted on the matter.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: No. Views about east coast salmon net fisheries were stated or sent in by very many bodies and individuals while the report was in preparation. There were, however, no consultations about the report or its contents which, as section 39 of the Act makes clear, were matters for my right hon. Friends the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretary of State for Scotland to consider and present to Parliament.

Examinations Statistics

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the number of pupils in Scotland who were presented for exams in those standard grade subjects offering credit, general and foundation level in 1991; what are the corresponding figures for the number of pupils who actually sat each of those exams; and if he will publish a breakdown of these figures for each local education authority.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is set out in the tables. It includes data for those examinations offered at credit and general levels only: that is, biology, chemistry, physics and the optional writing examinations in French, Gaelic (Learners), German, Italian, Russian and Spanish.

Crofters

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the total amounts of money awarded under the crofter building grants and loans scheme in each of the past five financial years; what is the amount awarded so far in the current financial year; and what were the amounts awarded specifically to fishermen who are not crofters for each of the same years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The approved expenditure under the crofters building grants and loans scheme in each of the past five financial years and the first six months of the current financial year is set out in the table.

	Total Approved Expenditure £	Approved Expenditure —fishermen feuars £
1986-87	3,402,000	64,000
1987-88	3,885,500	121,500
1988-89	2,977,500	121,500
1989-90	3,586,500	94,500
1990-91	4,027,500	31,000
April 1991 to 30 September 1991	2,175,000	31,000

Red Deer

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent studies he has received and considered relating to the red deer population; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The most recent study of this nature is the report on "The Management of Wild Red Deer in Scotland", commissioned by Rural Forum. My right hon. Friend considers that this report is a helpful contribution to public debate and is timely in view of the current review of deer legislation. It will be studied in detail in the context of the review.

Scottish Food

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action his Department is taking to promote Scottish food and drink, both in the United Kingdom and abroad; and whether he has any plans to help fund a body similar to Scottish Food Promotions Ltd.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Government support for the industry's marketing of food and drink is provided through Food From Britain, which is accountable to all four Agriculture Ministers. In Scotland, additional public support is provided by Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise. The Scottish Office provides specific forms of assistance for exporters and is supporting the National Farmers Union of Scotland's plans for comprehensive quality assurance systems on farms. Since the closure of Scottish Food Promotion, SE and HIE have commissioned Trade Promotions (Scotland) Ltd. to arrange a Scottish presence at major trade fairs. There are no plans to set up another company to perform other functions of SFP.

School Reports

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action is being taken by his Department to monitor the implementation of recommendations made in HM inspectorate of schools' reports on individual schools.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: After a sufficient interval to give an opportunity to act on a report—usually a period of several months after publication—the inspectorate mounts a follow-up inspection to discuss the report and any action which has been taken on it with the director of education and the head teacher.

School Meals

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many children are receiving free school meals in each of the education authorities in Scotland expressed as a percentage of the total number of children taking school meals.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested, taken from the 1991 annual school meals census return, is as follows:

Percentage of children taking school meals who receive free meals

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans his Department has to improve the diet of Scottish schoolchildren.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: An objective of health education in schools is to encourage pupils to adopt a well-balanced and healthy diet. The place of health education in the curriculum is being reviewed as part of the 5-14 development programme.

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any plans to reintroduce the nutritional requirement for school meals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Nutritional standards for school meals have never been prescribed in Scotland.

Cumbernauld High School

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action has been taken by his Department to monitor the implementation of the recommendations made by HM inspectorate of schools' report on Cumbernauld high school in 1990.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Cumbernauld high school was inspected in January and February 1990, the inspectorate report was published in June 1990 and a follow-up inspection was made by the inspectorate in January 1991.

Corporal Punishment

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has had from Kilsyth primary school board concerning corporal punishment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The school board wrote to me on 29 October advocating the reintroduction of corporal punishment in schools as a deterrent of last resort. Following a judgment in the European Court of Human Rights in 1982, the legal safeguards covering the administration of corporal punishment by staff in Scottish schools were withdrawn and this form of sanction was abolished.

Fish Farming

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what support his Department has given to the fish farming industry in Scotland since 1979.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Department has given support to the fish farming industry in various ways.

The Scottish Office provides scientific advice and research through the marine laboratory in Aberdeen. Spending on relevant research has amounted to some £4 million in the last five years.

The Department also provides supplementary funding to fish farmers seeking grants from the European Community (EC Regulation 4028/86). Such assistance has amounted to £1·321 million to date. In addition, financial assistance has been provided through Highlands and Islands Enterprise and its predecessor for fish farms, fish processing investment, and for other forms of assistance, estimated at some £34 million since 1979.

The Department has also committed funding under the integrated development programme and the agricultural development programme for the Scottish islands for fish farming amounting to £4 million in total since 1982.

Royal Observer Corps

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what training facilities will be available to local authorities taking on the responsibilities of the Royal Observer Corps; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what arrangements have been made to ensure the maximum use of existing expertise and equipment during the transfer of Royal Observer Corps duties to local authorities; how many volunteers will be sought; which authorities have already developed parallel arrangements and what those arrangements are; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what plans have been made for the transfer of Royal Observer Corps duties to local authorities; by what date the transfer is expected to be complete; who will undertake these duties in the interim period; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if additional finances will be made available to local authorities in order to carry out the role of the Royal Observer Corps; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Following the statement on the Government's emergency planning review made on 10 July 1991 by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, columns 393-96, preliminary discussions have been held with local authorities in Scotland on what new monitoring arrangements may be appropriate following the standing down of the Royal Observer Corps and what role the former ROC volunteers might have in these new arrangements. While no conclusions have yet been reached on these matters, the aim will be to make as much use of ROC resources as possible.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement concerning the future plans for Royal Observer Corps centres at Raigmore, Inverness, and the RIMNET system on Tiree.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Home Office has responsibility for the Royal Observer Corps facility at Raigmore. Officials of my Department are considering with their opposite numbers in the Home Office whether an alternative civil defence use for the centre might be found.

The radioactive incident monitoring network system on Tiree is one of 16 sites throughout Scotland established under the national response plan to cater for the response to nuclear incidents occurring overseas. There are no plans to discontinue the use of the site on Tiree and it will continue to be part of the network.

College Management

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what added costs will arise from the change in management of colleges in the Further and High Education (Scotland) Bill because of the requirements under section 20 of the Value Added Tax Act 1983.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: An accurate assessment of the colleges' liability for value added tax after 1 April 1993 will be made when a precise breakdown is available of the sum to be transferred to the Secretary of State's budget for the funding of further education colleges.

Football (Policing)

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing, for each year since 1986,. (a) the total number of police officers on duty at Scottish Football League and Premier Division matches in Scotland, (b) the total attendance at Scottish Football League and Premier Division matches in Scotland and (c) the total number of police officers as a percentage of the total attendance at Scottish Football League and Premier Division matches in Scotland and (d) the total number of police officers in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not held centrally, but I will write to the hon. Member.

Civil Defence Budget

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total annual budget for civil defence provisions for 1991-92 and for each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Office Home and Health Department's annual budget for civil defence provision over the period in question has been as follows:

	£ million
1978-79	0·8
1979-80	1·1
1980-81	1·4
1981-82	2·4
1982-83	3·7
1983-84	6·5
1984-85	7·5
1985-86	5·4
1986-87	5·3
1987-88	5·8
1988-89	6·1
1989-90	7·0
1990-91	7·9
1991-92	7·6

Rural Enterprise Programme

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is now able to announce the outcome of the review of the operational areas for the business development scheme of the rural enterprise programme.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I am pleased to announce today that the rural enterprise programme's business development scheme, which aims to help farmers and crofters develop new businesses, will now be extended into two additional areas of the Highlands and Islands. The new areas are Dunoon/Cowal, Oban/Lorn and Mid-Argyll/Kintyre, and Badenoch/Strathspey and Upper Moray. Locally based project officers will be appointed as quickly as possible and I hope the first awards for approved projects in the new areas will be made by spring 1992.

The response to the BDS from the four existing operational areas of south-east Sutherland, West Ross, Lochalsh and Lochaber has been most encouraging, with some 30 projects already approved and many more under consideration. The REP offers generous levels of support and I am very pleased at the response so far. I hope that farmers and crofters in the two new operational areas will also respond positively to this opportunity which aims to make agricultural producers in the highlands and islands more secure in the face of growing pressures to reduce agricultural support.

Sheltered Housing

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will increase resources for Scottish local authorities to be able to increase their sheltered housing provision; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 7 November 1991]: Resources totalling £454·5 million were announced in March for housing capital investment in authorities' own stock in 1991-92. It is for local authorities to decide how best to deploy the resources available to them to meet local housing needs, including the need for sheltered housing provision if this is seen as a priority in their areas.

Wild Birds

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state which sites he intends next to designate as special protection areas under EC directive 79/409 on the conservation of wild birds, and which sites he intends to so designate before 1 December.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 8 November 1991]: Consultations are taking place about the designation of eight special protection areas at present. It is not possible to say which site will be designated first or to give dates for possible designation.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Hospital Laundry Services

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why the Eastern health and social services board rejected the tender for laundry services in the Royal group of hospitals.

Mr. Hanley: The only tender received for the laundry services contract in the Royal group of hospitals unit of management was from the in-house contractor. Since that tender price substantially exceeded the present cost of the service, the Eastern health and social services board quite correctly decided in this particular case not to award the contract but to re-tender the work within 18 months.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment has been made of the reasons for there having been only cross board and in-house tenders for laundry services in the Eastern health and social services board.

Mr. Hanley: All reasonable steps are taken to generate private sector interest in laundry services contracts. The small number of commercial firms with the capability of and interest in undertaking laundry contracts in Northern Ireland have decided not to submit tenders for contracts in EHSSB. Such decisions are a matter for them and I do not intend to speculate as to their reasons. However, the absence of private sector competition in this particular case does not prevent the board from achieving the objective of competitive tendering which is to test the cost-effectiveness of the service.

Civil Defence

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement regarding civil defence measures in the event of a nuclear explosion either in peace or war.

Dr. Mawhinney: I am currently reviewing civil defence arrangements in Northern Ireland in the light of the answer which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary gave to a question from the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) on 10 July, Official Report, columns 393-96. While the new arrangements will be similar to those being developed for the remainder of the United Kingdom, some variations will be necessary to take account of different organisational and administrative structures within the Province.

CRISP Programme

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give the criteria for benefiting under CRISP—the community regeneration initiative special project—programme and urban development grant, indicating any change in those criteria in the last year, and list the persons and bodies which administer the same.

Mr. Hanley: The CRISP initiative is targeted on towns and villages with populations below approximately 10,000 in areas of particular disadvantage and is available to community groups and district councils.

Urban development grants are available for developments in specified areas of Belfast and Londonderry where the intention is to let or sell the completed projects and for refurbishments or new buildings within these areas aimed at achieving physical and economic regeneration.

There has been no change to the criteria for the UDG scheme or CRISP in the last year.

These programmes are administered by the Department of the Environment.

Grant outside Belfast and Londonderry is provided under the urban development programme which is funded by the International Fund for Ireland and I have asked the chairman of the fund to write to the hon. Gentleman. I will place a copy of his letter in the Library.

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the towns and villages that have benefited and will benefit from the CRISP—community regeneration initiative special project—programme and urban development grant, giving the total amount and population in each case.

Mr. Hanley: The moneys committed under the CRISP programme which is funded by the International Fund for Ireland and the Department of Environment, are shown in the table:

Town	Amount Approved £ million	Population (Approximately)
1. Coalisland	2·700	3,800
2. Castlederg	1·570	2,900
3. Carrickmore	1·880	1,000
4. Keady	1·500	3,200
5. Belleek	1·890	1,000
6. Dromore (Co. Tyrone)	0·670	1,000
7. Belcoo	0·314	1,100
8. Newtownhamilton	0·600	1,200

It is not possible to say which applications will receive approval in the future.

The urban development grant scheme applies only to Belfast—population 280,972—and Londonderry—population 94,721. At 31 October 1991, £68 million had been committed or expended on approved projects in the two cities.

Grants outside Belfast and Londonderry are provided under the urban development programme which is funded by the International Fund for Ireland. I have asked the chairman of the fund to write to the hon. Gentleman and I will place a copy of his letter in the Library.

Care Standards

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will place in the Library copies of specifications for care standards required by the four units of management in the Eastern health and social services board.

Mr. Hanley: Service specifications for three services—catering, domestic and laundry—have been individually prepared for all nine units of management in the Eastern health and social services board. A sample copy of each of the three services has been placed in the Library.

School Nurses

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many school nurses were employed in Northern Ireland in (a) 1975, (b) 1980, (c) 1985 and (d) 1990.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is given in the table.

Chronic Pain

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland at which clinics sufferers of chronic pain can be treated within the national health service; what is the extent of funding for treatment of chronic pain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Treatment for sufferers of chronic pain is provided at out-patient clinics in the following hospitals in Northern Ireland:

Eastern Board: Belfast City, Royal Victoria, Musgrave, Ulster, Mater, Bangor.
Northern Board: Waveney, Coleraine, Whiteabbey.
Western Board: Altnagelvin.
Southern Board: Craigavon, South Tyrone.

A clinic is also provided for outpatients on a weekly basis at the Queens university department of anaesthesia and there is a clinic for in-patients at the Belfast city hospital. Information about the extent of funding for the pain relief service is not held centrally.

Cardiac Operations

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people are currently waiting for cardiac operations at the Royal Victoria hospital, Belfast; what is the average waiting time; and what proposals there are to reduce the waiting time for such operations.

Mr. Hanley: There were 991 people waiting for cardiac operations at the Royal Victoria hospital, Belfast at the end of September 1991 and I have set out below the details of how long they have been doing so. The recent completion of the £1·5 million extension to the cardiac recovery area at the RVH will permit an increase in the number of operations and an additional cardiac surgeon and supporting staff will be appointed soon to support this increased workload. Boards are also actively considering the possibilities of purchasing further operations from outside Northern Ireland. The Western board has already taken an initiative this year in buying additional cardiac operations for its resident population from hospitals in London.

North and West Belfast Unit of Management

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list in tabular form for the years 1986 to 1991 the numbers in post in the North and West Belfast unit of management in the grades (a) senior management, (b) middle management, (c) medical, (d) nursing, (e) social workers, (f) social work assistants and (g) support staff.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested in respect of the North and West Belfast community unit is set out in the table:

Notes:
1. Whole time equivalent figures are shown in brackets.
2. The figures show the number of staff in post at 30 September of each year.
3. Figures for 1990 and 1991 include staff in Muckamore Abbey hospital which prior to 1 April 1990 was a separate unit of management.
4. Medical figures do not include registrars, senior registrars and consultants who are not on the unit payroll.

Residential Homes

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of (a) residential care homes and (b) nursing homes in operation for each year since 1979.

Mr. Hanley: The information is as follows:

[2] From 1988 information on residential care homes has been collected on a financial year basis. All other data on such homes are in relation to end of year.
[3] Figures at 31 December each year.

DSS Benefit Advisers

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list by local office the number of DSS benefit advisers appointed since the new DSS Benefits Agency was set up.

Mr. Hanley: Social security operational matters are the responsibility of Mr. Alec Wylie, chief executive of the Social Security Agency. He has written to the honourable Gentleman and copies of his reply will be placed in the Library and the Public Information Office.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of people receiving supplementary benefit or income support who were (a) residents in residential care homes, (b) residents in nursing homes, (c) residents over pension age, (d) residents under pension age, (e) elderly residents, and (f) mentally ill residents for each year since 1979.

Mr. Hanley: Full information is not available in the form requested. The available information for the years 1987 to 1990 is as follows:

Number of people receiving supplementary benefit/income support

ENVIRONMENT

Regalian Building, Vauxhall Cross

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what Government work will be undertaken at the nine-storey building currently under construction by Regalian at Vauxhall Cross on the Thames Embankment.

Mr. Yeo: The building is for occupation by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Royal Parks (Staff)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many staff of the royal parks are being made redundant; and what is the total redundancy payment.

Mr. Yeo: A total of 342 industrial staff have received redundancy notices. It is estimated that redundancy and early retirement payments will total £3·05 million.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many current staff of the royal parks live in tied accommodation; how many will be allowed to remain when contractors take over; and what will happen to the rents of those who remain.

Mr. Yeo: A total of 35 current staff live in royal parks lodges. The 22 industrial staff who have received redundancy notices will be allowed to continue living in their lodges whether they are employed by contractors or not. Those who are not already paying fair rents will be required to do so with the increase being phased-in over a period depending on the size of the change.

Methane

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimates he has available for the quantity of methane loss into the atmosphere from the British gas industry.

Mr. Baldry: Data on United Kingdom methane emissions are published annually in the "Digest of Environmental Protection and Water Statistics," copies of which are placed in the Library of the House. The latest estimates, for 1989 in Digest no. 13, show that gas leakage from the distribution system accounted for 340,000 tonnes of methane, and venting from oil and gas platforms together accounted for a further 175,000 tonnes of methane.

Sports Facilities (Tendering)

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on how local authorities must draw up contracts for competitive tendering of the running of sports facilities so that the private sector has a fair chance to compete; and what powers he has to ensure that fair competition is encouraged with regard to the kinds of tasks set out in the tender documents.

Mr. Key: Under the Local Government Act 1988 local authorities are required to avoid anti-competitive behaviour in carrying out tendering for work subject to the Act. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has sanction powers which he may use if he considers that an authority has failed to comply with the statutory requirements, including the requirement to avoid anti-competitive behaviour. In March 1991, we issued a circular (1/91) giving guidance on factors that the Secretary of State would consider in reaching a view on whether local authorities had acted anti-competitively. We are seeking powers in the Local Government Bill to strengthen our ability to prescribe what is, or is not, to be regarded as anti-competitive behaviour. We have just issued a consultation document "Competing for Quality —Competition in the Provision of Local Services" setting out our proposals for the use of those proposed powers.

Thames House, Millbank

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he consulted the Royal Fine Arts Commission before commencing work on the listed building Thames house, Millbank.

Mr. Yeo: The Royal Fine Arts Commission was consulted after minor works to remove redundant services had started but before the start of the main works.

Wild Birds

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation banning the importation of all wild birds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The Government share the concern that has been expressed about the possible effects of trade on the wild populations of many species and about the conditions in which animals—especially birds—are transported. These are international problems which require international solutions and we are therefore pressing for stricter controls throughout the European Community and beyond.

Conservation action must be based on sound science. Earlier this year I therefore commissioned the Government's scientific advisers, the Joint Nature Conservation Committee (JNCC) and the Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew, to review the evidence as to whether the trade in wild-taken animals and plants was compatible with maintaining species at satisfactory levels. The JNCC's report was submitted on 31 July and copies are available in the Library of the House. The report gives unequivocal support for the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora (CITES), which is the foundation for conservation controls on trade in the European Community and most of the rest of the world. The Committee does not advocate extensive bans but has made some wide-ranging recommendations for tightening the present controls. The report of the Royal Botanic Gardens submitted recently reaches similar conclusions and makes detailed recommendations on plants. We will make this available as soon as possible.

I therefore wrote to the European Commission on 14 October, urging it to propose that the Community takes steps to:

- strengthen measures to prevent illegal trade in endangered species and to ensure that specimens of these species are used to bring conservation benefits;
- make more systematic checks on the effect of trade on species whose survival might become threatened, to ensure that it continues only at sustainable levels;
- monitor trade in more species:
- make sure that appropriate care is taken of all species listed in CITES.

We intend to make clear the importance we attach to early progress at the Environment Council next month.

Because of his responsibilities for the welfare of animals during transport, my hon. Friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, joined me in this approach to the Commission, to press for strict controls on trade in any species which are particularly vulnerable to stress and mortality as a result of transport or captivity.

Listed Buildings (Alterations)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what bodies he consults before commencing major alterations to listed buildings.

Mr. Yeo: Clearance is sought from the local planning authority in line with DOE circulars 18/84 and 8/87. The local planning authority will in turn consult with various heritage bodies, though where significant proposals are concerned my Department will normally have had prior discussions with these bodies.

Planning Permissions

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions in each of the last 10 years has (a) the South Herefordshire district council granted a planning permission as a departure from the structure plan, (b) such a planning consent been granted as a result of an appeal and (c) if he will give the same information for other non-metropolitan district councils in England.

Mr. Yeo: This information is not held centrally.

Local Government Finance

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to what extent there is non-payment of the community charge in the current year; and what support he is giving to recover the unpaid community charge.

Mr. Key: At the end of June community charge receipts in England averaged 12 per cent. of local authorities' budgeted charge income. This figure was however affected by delays in issuing community charge bills due to the general reduction of £140 in headline charges announced in the Budget and it is not possible to draw conclusions about overall collection for the year. We will be publishing information on the second quarter of the year shortly.

The Government strongly support local authorities' efforts to collect the community charge. We have given them wide ranging collection powers and if these are used to the full authorities should be able to collect the charge from those people who have not paid.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will immediately review community charge benefit regulation No. 89 in order that full time married students can receive poll tax relief without affecting the spouse's claim.

Miss Widdecombe: I have been asked to reply.

Regulation 89 of the Social Security Community Charge Benefits (General) Regulations 1989 (SI 1989/1321) provides for excess benefits that have arisen where claimants have not declared all of their capital assets. We are not aware that this regulation has caused any difficulties in particular in relation to full-time married students.

Non-student partners of registered students can claim community charge benefit, while the student is entitled to relief and only pays 20 per cent. of the charge. The benefit awarded to the non-student partner takes account of the couple's joint circumstances.

Local Authorities

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will publish a list of each local authority in England, its political control and the amount paid in attendance allowance and expenses to the highest paid councillor in each authority in respect of the most recent two years for which the information is available;

(2) what information he has in respect of councillors' attendance allowances and expenses for each local authority in England.

Mr. Key: This information is not collected by my Department. Each local authority must, on request, make available for inspection a record of allowances paid and the names of the recipients.

Mortgages

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to meet the Council of Mortgage Lenders to discuss the establishment of a code of practice for mortgage lenders.

Mr. Yeo: At the suggestion of this Department, the Council of Mortgage Lenders issued statements of practice on the handling of mortgage arrears and of possession procedure in February this year.

Air Pollution

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of occasions on which the one-hour and the eight-hour World Health Organisation guideline values for ozone were exceeded at each Warren Spring Laboratory monitoring site in the last year for which data are available.

Mr. Baldry: The number of days during which the one hour (76ppb) and the eight hour (50ppb) World Health Organisation guideline values for ozone were exceeded at the Department of the Environment's monitoring sites in 1991 are as follows:

	WHO guideline exceedences, days
	1-hour	8-hour

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the air quality bulletin system to ensure that appropriate information and advice is provided to the public during eight-hour sustained pollution episodes.

Mr. Baldry: The advice currently issued during ozone episodes follows recommendations in a report by the Chief Medical Officer's advisory group on the medical aspects of air pollution episodes, published in May this year. In accordance with the group's recommendations, it is issued when hourly mean ozone concentrations exceed, or are expected to exceed 100 parts per billion. We see no reason at present to alter this practice, but the arrangements will be kept under review.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the United Kingdom-wide newspapers, radio and television stations which have agreed to print or broadcast his Department's advice on what to do if air quality becomes poor.

Mr. Baldry: Advice on what to if air quality becomes poor is obtained from the telephone information system and from general practitioners.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the United Kingdom-wide newspapers, radio stations and television stations which agreed to print or broadcast air quality bulletins on a regular basis.

Mr. Baldry: Air quality bulletin information is currently available on a daily basis on page 583 of Ceefax and in the Guardian and the (London) Evening Standard. Weather forecasts on BBC and ITV report episodes and forecasts of poor air quality. The air quality bulletins are provided free of charge to all radio and television stations and newspapers that take the weather information provided by the Meteorological Office.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to assess the effectiveness of the air quality bulletin system in its first year of operation.

Mr. Baldry: My Department assesses continuously the effectiveness of the bulletin system. It has been extended, improved and made more accessible in a number of ways since its introduction in October 1990. The media are making increasing use of it.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the weekly average number of calls received by his Department's air quality call line (a) in total and (b) seeking advice on what action to take if air quality becomes poor.

Mr. Baldry: The weekly average number of calls received on the Department's air quality call line during October 1991 was about three and on the air quality advice line, 32 over the same four week period.

Noise

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the progress so far made in implementing the recommendations of his Department's noise review working party published in October 1990.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Memberf for Burnley (Mr. Pike) on Friday 8 November 1991, at c. 310-03.

Send-a-penny Campaign

Mr. Grist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many pennies and representations he has received in connection with the send-a-penny campaign designed to improve the provision, cleanliness and accessibility of public conveniences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: The Department has received 235 pennies and 88 representations. For over 100 years authorities have had an absolute discretion as to whether, and how, they provide public conveniences. We have no plans to change this.

Hedgerows

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures the Government are planning to introduce to protect hedgerows; and when these will be presented.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave today to the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley).

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to bring forward detailed legislation to protect hedgerows.

Mr. Baldry: In July I announced the Government's revised proposals to protect hedgerows. These include two main elements: a proposed scheme to require owners and occupiers to notify intended removal of hedgerows—linked with new powers for local authorities to register key hedgerows; and proposed new incentives to promote environmentally beneficial management.

The former requires legislation, which we shall seek to introduce when parliamentary time permits. However, the proposed incentives scheme does not depend on new legislation and we are discussing with the Countryside Commission and others the best means of taking early steps to implement this.

Housing Investment Programme

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he has had with the Institute of Housing with regard to the allocation of the housing investment programme.

Mr. Yeo: The institute commented on the Secretary of State's recent proposals that more account should be taken of local authorities' performance and plans in the allocation of housing capital resources. Their views were taken into account. The Secretary of State announced on 30 October his decision to proceed to implement these proposals.

Building Industry

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent consultations he has had with the Federation of Master Builders about the state of the building industry.

Mr. Yeo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has had no such consultations.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has had from building firms about the effects of the recession on the building industry.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning on 6 November 1991 at column 154.

Housing Expenditure

Mr. Aspinwall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of how he plans to use the increases in public expenditure on housing announced in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's autumn statement, and his proposals for local authority housing subsidy.

Sir George Young: Public expenditure on housing will be nearly £7·8 billion next year, an increase of 4·9 per cent. on previous plans, and will rise further to £8·2 billion by 1994-95. This rising programme will increasingly focus on tackling run-down council estates and providing for families in housing need. Our plans include:

—£350 million extra over three years to provide nearly £1,200 million in total for the enhanced estate action initiative which I announced in July, and more for housing action trusts in the two later years, to continue our policy of focusing resources on the most run-down council estates;

—the Housing Corporation's capital programme of new social housing to go on rising as planned to £1·7 billion next year and over £2 billion thereafter, to provide 120,000 homes over three years mainly for the benefit of homeless families and others in housing need;

—£30 million next year for a continuation of the successful programme of new rural housing financed through local authorities;

—£25 million over three years for bringing flats over shops back into use;

—£70 million over three years for a new grant to help authorities meet the costs of replacing privately leased accommodation for homeless families;

—over £1·5 billion each year in grants and borrowing approvals for local authorities' mainstream housing capital programmes of renovating their own estates, supporting housing associations, and helping low-income private owners to renovate their houses;

—£3·75 billion in 1992-93 for subsidies to council housing, including rent rebates for low-income tenants.

Lower construction costs—down nearly 10 per cent. since this time last year—and lower land prices are helping us to get more output from current levels of public expenditure. The table gives further details of the breakdown between main spending areas. I shall announce further details of specific programmes, and of capital allocations to individual authorities and of the Housing Corporation's development programme, over the coming weeks.

[1]Housing Corporation forecast gross capital expenditure: 1991-92 £1,731 million; 1992-93 £1,770 million; 1993-94 £2,004 million; 1994-95 £2,052 million.

[2]Includes Estate Action: 1991-92 £266 million; 1992-93 £365 million; 1993-94 £407 million; 1994-95 £423 million.

My Department is also today consulting local authorities about my proposals for the management and maintenance allowances and rent guidelines to be used in calculating authorities' entitlements to housing revenue account subsidy next year, and I have placed the consultation papers in the Library with a list of proposed allowances and guidelines for each authority. I plan to introduce important new measures to help raise standards of management and maintenance in council housing. First, I propose an average increase of 6½ per cent. in management and maintenance allowances, allowing a real improvement in service to tenants. Second, I propose further moves towards targeting allowances according to the type of housing that each authority owns and the differing management problems they face, thereby directing £93 million more to the authorities with the greatest needs. On rents, I propose increases in guidelines averaging £2·44 a week—to give a new average guideline of £27·33—and ranging from £1·20 to £4·50 a week, thus continuing our policy of encouraging authorities to charge rents that better reflect the relative value of housing provided while remaining on average well below market levels. Responsibility for setting actual rents remains with individual local authorities. Housing benefit will normally meet the whole of any rent increase for the two thirds of tenants receiving it.

Backed by this substantial public expenditure provision, and by recent initiatives to drive up standards and secure better value for money, our housing policies will continue to focus—though constructive partnerships between all the agencies involved in providing housing—on encouraging owner-occupation for those who can afford it, on helping homeless families, and on widening choice and improving service for tenants especially on the most run-down council estates.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensioners

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many individuals his Department were unable to trace to tell them they could make up their contributions to claim a full pension.

Mr. Jack: The responsibility for tracing individuals for contributions purposes is a matter for Miss Ann Chant, the chief executive of the Contributions Agency. She will write to the hon. Member and a copy will be placed in the Library and the Public Information Office.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the cost to the Treasury of the additional claims for mortgage interest payments from those pensioners who will be entitled to claim income support as a result of the uprating statement; and how many individuals will be able to claim such payments.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 5 November 1991]: We estimate that fewer than 5,000 pensioners with a mortgage could become entitled to claim income support as a result of the uprating statement. The extra cost to the Treasury is negligible.

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much money the Government received from pensioners through deductions from their pensions occasioned by stays in hospital longer than six weeks in each year since 1988-89.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many low income pensioners are expected to gain from the measures in the uprating statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The proposed uprating income support by a full 7 per cent. from next April will give increases substantially above the current level of inflation to around 3·5 million low-income pensioners where the claimant or partner is aged 60 or over.

Furthermore, there will be rises in addition to the uprating increase for older and disabled pensioners who receive the higher pensioner premium. Couples will get £1·50 per week extra and single claimants £1·00. This measure alone will add £60 million in a full year to the help available to low-income pensioners.

The income support limits for residential care and nursing homes are also to be increased by £15 in nearly all cases. This rise is significantly greater than inflation and represents additional funding of £200 million per year.

As a result of the proposed uprating it is expected that up to 400,000 people will become newly eligible to claim income support and the majority of these are likely to be pensioners.

Pensions

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what approximate amount per week will be payable as a SERPS addition to their pension to those who have been on average earnings throughout their working life if they retire in 1991, 1992 and for each subsequent year for which forecasts exist.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is given in the table.

The amount of additional pension payable for a man experiencing age specific male average earnings throughout his working life and a woman experiencing age specific female average earnings during her working life retiring in each year from 1991 to 2061.

Benefits

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the circumstances in which the social fund or any other benefits can be used to purchase services from the national health service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: Social fund payments for medical items are specifically excluded from the scope of the fund. People in receipt of other social security benefits are free to choose how they wish to spend their money. Income support or family credit recipients are entitled to free prescriptions, optical tests and dental treatment.

The provision of NHS services is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what policy he follows in exercising his discretion to round benefit rates up or down under section 63(5) of the Social Security Act 1986; and what exceptions have occurred to that policy since 1986.

Miss Widdecombe: The rounding rules of all benefits are reviewed annually as part of the uprating exercise. No established practice exists which would pre-empt our discretion in this matter.

SERPS

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many individuals are in receipt of a state earnings-related pensions scheme pension higher than £60 a week.

Miss Widdecombe: The most recently available statistics, based on a 10 per cent. sample of those in receipt of retirement pensions in March 1991, indicate that no one in that sample was in receipt of an additional pension (SERPS) higher than £60 per week.

Residential and Nursing Homes

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what provision his Department is making to provide for the shortfall between the fees charged by residential homes and nursing homes and the level of income support under community care; and what assistance his Department can give to those who meet the normal qualifying conditions but whose fees are above the benefit limit and who are unable to meet their charges in full.

Miss Widdecombe: The present system of income support limits will be preserved for existing recipients who are resident in homes when the new community care arrangements are introduced in April 1993. As now, under those arrangements there will be limits to the level of benefit available for different types of care and these will be reviewed regularly. Subject to the normal qualifying conditions, people whose fees are at or below the limit will have their charges met in full.

The current income support limits for the various categories of residential and nursing home care represent the maximum amounts available. Any additional assistance—for example, that provided by relatives or charitable organisations—is, however, disregarded in the calculation of income support entitlement. This provision will continue under the new arrangements from April 1993.

Under the present arrangements, as an alternative to placing people in their own residential accommodation, local authorities have powers to place people in private residential care homes and meet their fees in full, recouping from the resident an assessed amount towards the charge where appropriate. LAs can also make weekly cash payments in certain circumstances to people in independent homes where the fees are more than the appropriate income support limit. This provision will continue under the new community care arrangements after April 1993 for those residents with preserved income support rights.

Funeral Expenses

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the current cost of providing funeral expenses to those pensioners on income support; and what is the number who have secured such help.

Mr. Scott: In the last full year for which records are available (1990-91) 12,702 awards of funeral payments were made totalling £7,631,107 to pensioners on income support; in the first six months of this year 6,015 awards have been made totalling £4,094,645. Funeral payments from the social fund are also paid to people who are receiving family credit, housing benefit and community charge benefit.

Mental Handicap

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on how income support for the mentally handicapped is calculated regarding training, education, employment and other day care elements now; and how it is planned to be changed after 1 April 1993.

Miss Widdecombe: Income support is calculated in accordance with the relevant regulations by reference to the individual's circumstances including any recognised extra expenses, and other income or capital. Mentally handicapped people undergoing training, education, employment or receiving day care are eligible for income support on the same terms as other disabled people. There are special rules to enable disabled people to retain the disability premium during training and to encourage them to take up employment or advanced education. Severely disabled young people may be entitled to income support while undertaking full-time non advanced education or if they are unable to participate in youth training. These special rules are likely to continue after April 1993. The provision of day care by local authority social services departments and community care arrangements from April 1993 are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Residential Care Allowance

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will detail expenditure on income support residential care allowances for the years 1988-89 and 1990-91 by the different residential and nursing home categories for each benefit area.

Miss Widdecombe: Because of the sample size of the data collected on the number of residents and expenditure in residential care and nursing homes it is only statistically sound for the larger categories of care. Information is not available for expenditure split into areas. The available data are shown in the following table:

Estimated expenditure

£ million

Lone Parents

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to increase the amount of earnings disregard before benefits for lone parents are affected.

Mr. Jack: The earnings disregard for lone parents of £15 was increased in housing benefit and community charge benefit in October 1990 to £25. We have no plans for further change at present.

Homeless Families

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what account was taken of the need of children of homeless families in bed-and-breakfast accommodation to have a balanced diet in the review of the arrangements for income support of homeless families.

Miss Widdecombe: Since April 1989 people in board and lodging accommodation have been treated in the same way as most other recipients of income support. They therefore now receive housing benefit to cover the cost of their accommodation and also standard income support personal allowances and premiums to meet their day-to-day living expenses.

The income support rates, including premiums, are regularly reviewed and from April 1992 the Government propose to increase these by a full 7 per cent.

Family Credit

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he is taking to improve the service given to self-employed people seeking help through family credit.

Mr. Jack: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) earlier today.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures he has taken to improve the working of the cold weather payments scheme.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 7 November.

Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much was paid out on cold weather payments over the last winter period; and what was the cost of administering these payments.

Mr. Scott: In 1990-91, 1,430,000 cold weather payments were made, at a cost of almost £8·6 million. Administration costs were approximately £3·6 million last year, but they will reduce considerably this coming winter because payments will be made automatically by national computer rather than clerically.

Child Support Act 1991

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what consideration has been given to the impact on black communities of the provisions in the Child Support Act 1991.

Mr. Jack: The provisions of the Child Support Act 1991 will apply equally and be administered equitably in respect of all persons who are habitually resident in the United Kingdom. The Government consulted widely on the proposals in the White Paper "Children Come First" including the Commission for Racial Equality. A consultation document containing details of the proposed contents of the regulations to be made under the Act, was published on 1 November. A copy has also been sent to the Commission for Racial Equality. A full list of all the organisations being consulted was given in my reply to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) on 7 November. The Government will consider carefully all comments on the consultation document before the regulations are finalised and laid before Parliament next year.

Family Credit

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he is taking to improve the service given to self-employed people seeking help through family credit.

Mr. Jack: There are already over 50,000 families on family credit, around 15 per cent. of the caseload, where the main earner is self-employed. The average payment of family credit in these cases is £44·10 a week, compared with £28 a week for families where the main earner is an employee.

We have commissioned a research study, which is being carried out by the social policy research unit at the university of York, into family credit for the self-employed. The study, which is well advanced, with information due to become available during next year, will enable us to determine what changes in assessment and procedures are called for in order to further improve the way we handle claims from the self-employed.

Severe Disability Premium

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the estimate for the number of people in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Derbyshire who will no longer be eligible for severe disability premium after 11 November.

Miss Widdecombe: The arrangements in Great Britain, including Derbyshire, should ensure that no one who has secured the premium prior to 21 October will lose it after 11 November. The arrangements made in Northern Ireland are the responsibility for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claims for severe disability premium were made in each of the years since its conception, and at what cost; how many reviews for non-award were requested; and how many were accepted.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 5 November 1991]: The severe disability premium is a component of income support, housing benefit and community charge benefit, and is not the subject of a separate claim. Information on the number of reviews for non-awards is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The number of people not receiving income support but receiving housing benefit and community charge benefit, which included the severe disability premium, is not available prior to May 1990. However, the figures for May 1990 are 9,000 people for housing benefit and 17,000 for community charge benefit. The number of people receiving income support which included the severe disability premium on a particular day is as follows:

May	Number
1988	35,000
1989	45,000
1990	62,000

Source: Annual Statistical Enquiry.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total full year cost of increases in income support limits for people in residential care and nursing homes announced in the last two years.

Miss Widdecombe: The estimated full-year cost of the April 1991 increase in residential care and nursing home limits is £225 million and for the April 1992 increase, £190 million.

HEALTH

Paediatric Pathologists

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many paediatric pathologists there are in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally. All regions were required to have at least one paediatric pathologist in post by 31 March and to have conducted a review of the need for further posts by 1992. All regions have met these objectives except in one case where there has been difficulty in filling the post.

National Health Service Charges

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the current average levels of charges for (a) glasses, (b) dental treatment, (c) eye tests and (d) dental checks; how many of each took place in each of the last five years in Nottingham health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Since July 1986 all spectacle dispensings, and since April 1989 a large proportion of sight tests, have been carried out privately. No information is collected on the levels of private charges. The maximum charge for lenses prescribed by the hospital eye service is £63·15.

The average patient charge for a course of dental treatment paid by patients paying the full charge in the financial year 1990-91 was approximately £26. There are three levels of dental examination for which the associated patient's charge is £3·75, £5·25 and £12.

It is not possible to provide figures on a comparable basis for the number of sight tests carried out over the period requested as figures are not collected on the number of sight tests carried out privately.

The numbers of dental examinations and dental treatments provided under the general dental services in Nottinghamshire family health services authority in the last five years is shown in the table.

	Dental examinations	Dental treatments
1985	635,560	692,120
1986-87	652,660	715,870
1987-88	651,480	724,580
1988-89	671,930	761,950
1989-90	623,049	722,966

The figures in 1988-89 were boosted by the announcement during the year of the proposed introduction of a charge for dental examinations from January 1989, and depressed in 1989-90 because people had brought forward their visits to the dentist. The evidence suggests that the number of dental examinations in England and Wales is now returning to the level it had reached before the announcement of the charge was made. The number of courses of dental treatment carried out in England has increased by 4·9 million, or 18 per cent., since 1979.

Residential and Nursing Homes

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to ring fence those resources his Department considers necessary for local authorities to meet the fees for those in residential and nursing homes either (a) to meet current demand or (b) the demand expected under community care.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. It is for the local authorities to decide on the right balance between spending on residential, day and domiciliary services in the light of the needs of people in their area and, where they support people in homes in the independent sector, to negotiate fees with home owners.

Optical Charges Vouchers

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if will make it his policy to increase the value of vouchers for optical charges in line with charges made by manufacturers to opticians.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is already our policy to set voucher values with reference to nationwide average manufacturers' prices.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the cost of extending to disability working allowance claimants entitlement to the remission of prescription charges.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The estimated cost would be about £2 million.

Pharmaceutical Price Retail Scheme

The Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the £4 million pharmaceutical price retail scheme ceiling over which an annual financial return was required from the pharmaceutical industry was last approved; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Pharmaceutical suppliers with sales of £4 million or more to the national health service have been required to submit annual financial returns to the Department under the terms of the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme since 1984. The present scheme is due for renegotiation next year.

Divorces

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has concerning the total number of children whose parents have been divorced in England and Wales in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Dorrell: The number of children of divorcing couples in England and Wales is shown in the table:

	Children aged under 16	Children aged 16 or over
1990	152,877	68,181
1989	148,162	68,405
1988	150,176	70,120
1987	148,911	68,394
1986	151,964	71,394
1985	155,740	71,152
1984	148,600	71,620
1983	155,562	70,987
1982	158,268	68,455
1981	159,403	66,572

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the total number of divorces in England and Wales in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Dorrell: The information is shown in the table.

Divorces in England and Wales

	Number
1990	153,386
1989	150,872
1988	152,633
1987	151,007
1986	153,903
1985	160,300
1984	144,501
1983	147,479
1982	146,698
1981	145,713

Disabled People

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the implementation of sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friends the Members for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) and for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth), on 22 March, at columns 254-55. I made it clear that the community care reforms have largely overtaken the provisions of these sections. The Government intend to review the need to implement these sections after several years' experience of the community care arrangements.

Organ Transplants

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions have taken place between himself and representatives of the United Kingdom transplant authority about improving the system by which health regions exchange human organs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State discussed this matter during a visit to the United Kingdom transplant support service authority on 7 November. Human organs for transplantation are allocated by the authority in accordance with criteria agreed by the medical profession. The authority has arranged for meetings with the profession to consider ways of improving the system to ensure that organs available for transplantation are distributed as effectively and equitably as possible.

Patients Charter

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what new and additional resources he has committed to meeting the objectives of the patients charter, excluding from his reply the costs of the publication and its preparation and distribution.

Mr. Dorrell: Making services more responsive to patients, which is the key aim of the charter, means doing things differently and more effectively. All the charter standards are already being achieved somewhere in the NHS. We want to bring all parts of the service up to the standards of the best.

Residential and Nursing Care

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will outline the timetable from 1993 onwards for transferring to local authorities the moneys currently spent by the Benefits Agency on residential and nursing care.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: There will be a single formal transfer of resources from the Department of Social Security to local authorities in the 1992 public expenditure survey, covering the years 1993-94, 1994-95, 1995-96. Provision for both social security and local authorities in subsequent surveys will be determined in the light of the declining number of cases with preserved entitlement under social security rules and the rising demand for local authority services, including demographic changes.

Nasogastric Feeding Tubes

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will arrange for nasogastric feeding tubes to be available on prescription from general practitioners.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The resource and other implications of making nasogastric feeding tubes available on GP prescription are under consideration.

General Practitioners

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what decisions he has taken about payments to general practitioners who achieved higher targets in health promotion clinics, minor surgery, immunisations and vaccinations and cervical cytology.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend gave my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) on 7 November at columns 259-60.

Bexley District Health Authority

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received on the funding of Bexley district health authority.

Mr. Dorrell: Since my previous reply to my hon. Friend on 14 May 1991 at column 134, we have received no representations.

Abortion

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when an official from his Department visited the Merseyside nursing home abortion clinic in Parkfield road, Liverpool, to inspect and approve its new method of disposing of the bodies of aborted unborn babies, introduced on 1 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No visit has been made in connection with this particular aspect of the clinic's operation.

HIV

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many non-haemophiliacs in the United Kingdom have contracted HIV infection as a result of contaminated NHS blood/tissue transfers; and how many of those became infected before the introduction of the screening of donations in October 1985.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 5 November 1991]: There have been 50 reports in England, Wales and Northern Ireland of HIV infections in people who received blood or tissue in the United Kingdom before screening of donations was introduced in 1985. There have been no reports of infection occurring due to blood transfusion since then. One HIV infection occurred in 1986 due to tissue transfer.

EMPLOYMENT

Delta Programme

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, in relation to the European Commission's DELTA 91 programme (a) the names, organisations and areas of expertise of the members of each of the DELTA programme's technical evaluation committees, (b) the titles of the proposals which have been accepted for funding by the Commission and (c) the names of each organisation participating in each proposal.

Mr. Forth: The European Commission is responsible for the administration of the Telematics programme, of which DELTA 91 is a part. Member states have agreed to maintain confidentiality until the Commission publishes the results of the selection process. This is likely to be in December.

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether the organisation appointed to act as DELTA 91 United Kingdom technical assistance unit made any bids for funds under the programme, either as a main contractor or as a partner; and how much the organisation which acted as DELTA 91 United Kingdom technical assistance unit was paid to provide that service.

Mr. Forth: Member states have agreed to maintain confidentiality about all applications to the Telematics programme, of which DELTA is a part. The DELTA 91 United Kingdom technical assistance unit was appointed after full competitive tendering, in line with public purchasing policy. The value of contracts are commercial in confidence and are not disclosed.

Special Needs Training

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will show both at 1991 prices and as a percentage of the total training budget, the amount allocated for training for people with special needs for each year since 1987.

Mr. Jackson: Information on expenditure on training for people with special training needs is not separately identified.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will show what proportion of the budget for the TECs is allocated to provide training for people with special needs.

Mr. Jackson: The proportion of training budgets allocated to provision for people with special training needs is the responsibility of individual training and enterprise councils and is determined by local needs and priorities.

Wages Underpayment

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many employers have been prosecuted for underpayment of employees in each year since 1980.

Mr. Forth: The number of employers prosecuted for paying their employees less than the statutory minimum remuneration required by the appropriate wages council orders is detailed in the table.

Year	Number of employers prosecuted
1980	8
1981	8
1982	4
1983	2
1984	2
1985	2
1986	2
1987	3
1988	9
1989	9
1990	7
1991	[1]12

[1] To date.

These figures include two prosecutions in Wales, one in 1987 and one in 1988.

Hoiger Subir Majhi

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will obtain information from the Health and Safety Executive about the activities of the executive in connection with the accident to Hoiger Subir Majhi at Ambrosia creamery, Lifton, Devon, on 28 November 1990, and if he will make a statement on the reasons why it was decided not to undertake legal proceedings.

Mr. Forth: The Health and Safety Executive were notified by telephone of the accident to Mr. Majhi at 3.35 pm on Thursday 29 November 1990. HSE determined the steps being taken by the company to carry out its own investigation into the accident and obtained an assurance that the machine would not be brought back into use until HSE were satisfied that it was safe to do so. The following day HSE obtained assurance that the necessary steps had been taken to safeguard the machine and that a thorough investigation was continuing. HSE therefore arranged to visit the factory on Tuesday 4 December to investigate the accident.

HSE's inspector was given notes of the investigation undertaken by the company and copies of statements taken. He interviewed a number of people at the factory and saw a video recording of the machine taken by the company after the accident, and discussed the accident with the senior union representative on site. Safety representatives had been involved in the company's investigation from the outset. The inspector was not able to interview Mr. Majhi at that stage because he was in hospital.

The company sent a memo on safety to all staff and introduced a new system of machine checks to prevent a recurrence of the accident.

Having considered all the evidence, a prosecution was not brought by HSE because:

(a) there was doubt whether danger which gave rise to the accident was reasonably foreseeable within the terms of the Factories Act.

(b) it was not possible to determine how and whom might have been responsible for the damaged guard mechanism; and

(c) the company has a generally good approach to health and safety and responded quickly and effectively to the accident.

Building Societies

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if the Health and Safety Executive is satisfied that pneumatically operated safety screens now being installed on customer service counters by building societies can be operated with proper regard to the safety of staff and public; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The Health and Safety Executive's experience of this type of screen to date is not sufficient to allow them to comment on it. It is for employers and others with duties under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 to ensure that equipment used in their undertakings does not put the health and safety of their staff or the public at risk.

Manual Handling

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects the Health and Safety Commission to publish the consultative document on manual handling; what period will be allowed for consultation; and when he envisages the regulations will be laid before Parliament.

Mr. Forth: The Health and Safety Commission's consultative document on the manual handling of loads was published on 7 November; a copy has been placed in the Library. The Commission has invited interested parties to comment on the proposals set out in that consultative document by 9 March next—that is, within four months. The European Community directive on manual handling requires member states to implement it by 31 December 1992; it is my intention that regulations will be made and brought into effect in time to meet that deadline.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current budget for overseas travel for the Health and Safety Executive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: Health and Safety Executive's expenditure on overseas travel is not a separate item, but is provided from within a general HSE travel and subsistence budget which takes account of the need for, for example, work in connection with EC matters. Some of HSE's overseas travel is reimbursed by the European Commission; that carried out by the nuclear installations inspectorate is charged out to the nuclear industry.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state the number of health and safety inspectors employed by the executive in each division; how many are full time and part-time; what vacancies exist in each category; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The information requested is as follows, at 1 November 1991:

HSE Division	Number of Inspectors
Field Operations Division	914·5
Nuclear Installations Inspectorate	164·0
Technology and Health Sciences Division	136·5
Inspectorate of Mines	38·5
Offshore Safety Division	57·0
Railway Inspectorate	28·0
Resources and Planning Division	8·0
Safety and General Policy Division	12·5
Special Hazards Division	16·0
Health Policy Division	9·0
Executive Support Branch	13·0
Hazardous Installations Policy Branch	6·0
Research and Laboratory Services Division	1·0

Of these, 1,387 worked full time and 34 part time, part-timers being counted as half units. Targets for each inspector category are set for the end of the planning year. The number of vacancies calculated against the 1 April 1992 targets are given in the table:

Inspector occupational grouping	Number of vacancies
Agricultural	0·0
Factory	17·0
Specialist	0·5
Mines	0·0
Quarries	4·0
Nuclear Installations	10·0
Railway	7·0
Offshore Safety	61·0

Considerable efforts are being made to fill inspector vacancies, particularly those for offshore safety inspectors. Thirty-four successful candidates have joined or are shortly expected to join HSE as offshore safety inspectors from a recruitment competition earlier this year. Two competitions are currently under way and 19 further successful candidates have already been selected from these. There are currently 12 successful candidates for factory inspector posts waiting to join the organisation and applicants for factory and nuclear installations inspector jobs will shortly be interviewed.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will obtain from the Health and Safety Executive information about the activities of the executive in connection with the crane failure at St. Mary's, Isles of Scilly, on 13 July 1991; and what steps have been taken to prosecute those persons responsible for overloading the crane and causing a crane to be operated without an effective safe load indicator.

Mr. Forth: The Health and Safety Executive was informed about the accident by police a few hours after it happened on Saturday 13 July.

The police told HSE's Plymouth office that the crane which had overturned while offloading a cargo container was in a dangerous condition with its rear wheels in the air and the jib resting on the jetty and the sea bed. HSE's inspector wished to visit the scene of the accident directly, but was prevented from doing so by heavy fog which had led to the suspension of commercial sailings and flights to the island. The inspector was not in the circumstances able to visit the scene until Monday 15 July.

Police advice was that it was imperative that the crane should be made safe as the area surrounding it could not be closed off. HSE's inspector therefore briefed the police by telephone on how to ensure the crane's safe retrieval and the recording of the information needed to establish the cause of the accident.

Making the crane safe involved some dismantling, and during this process part of the jib became detached and sank to the sea bed. This loss of part of the jib and damage to other parts of the crane sustained during the overturning meant that it was not possible for HSE to gather the evidence needed to establish if the crane was overloaded or not, and thus to mount any prosecution in this case. An automatic safeload indicator was, however, seen on the crane.

Textile and Footwear Industry

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the numbers employed in the textile and footwear industries per month, by industry, using the latest figures, for each month of 1991.

Mr. Jackson: The number of employees in employment in the textile and footwear industries in Great Britain were as follows:

Thousands

	Unadjusted for seasonal variations
	Footwear SIC Group 451	Textile SIC Class 43
1991
January	44·2	185·4
February	44·0	186·4
March	43·4	182·6
April	42·6	183·2
May	42·1	182·2
June	41·7	181·1
July	41·4	183·7
August	40·6	183·2

EC Legislative Competence

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what legislative competence the EC has in respect of deciding, by majority voting, matters relating to (a) maternity leave and (b) the length of the working week, and under what legislative authority.

Mr. Forth: It is for the European Court of Justice in the final analysis to determine such matters.

Existing directives which are concerned with terms and conditions of employment have been based on article 100 of the treaty of Rome—establishment or functioning of the common market—or article 235—measures necessary to achieve the objectives of the Community but which are not provided for elsewhere in the treaty. These articles require unanimity in the Council.

The European Commission has cited article 118A—health and safety of workers—as the proposed legal base for its draft directives on pregnant workers and working time. Under article 118A, the Council may adopt directives through qualified majority voting.

Building Industry

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has had concerning redundancies in the building industry.

Mr. Forth: This Department has had a number of representations about employment in the building industry. A wide range of training, enterprise and employment measures are available to help unemployed people.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the number of redundancies in the building industry for the first three quarters of 1991.

Mr. Forth: It is estimated that there were 3,066 confirmed redundancies in the construction industry in Great Britain in the first quarter of 1991, 3,423 in the second quarter and a provisional total of 2,079 in the third quarter of 1991.

Working Time Directive

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the Council of Ministers meeting on the draft directive on working time.

Mr. Forth: The Labour and Social Affairs Council met on 6 November 1991. The draft directive on working time was not discussed.

WALES

Pembrokeshire Health Authority

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received concerning the application for national health service trust status from Pembrokeshire health authority; how many have been in support of the application; and how many against.

Mr. David Hunt: A total of 101 representations have been received during the consultation period of which 50 did not support the establishment of the trust. I intend shortly to announce my decision having taken into account the comments received, alongside the individual merits of the application.

Nebulisers

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the estimated cost of providing nebulisers free of charge to all NHS patients requiring them in the present financial year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The information requested is not available centrally; this is a matter for individual health authorities. District general managers have been reminded of their duty under section 1 of the National Health Service Act 1977 to provide health service free at the point of delivery to NHS patients except where there is statutory provision for charging.

Long-term Unemployment

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many long-term unemployed people there are in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: On 11 July 1991 there were in Wales 27,784 claimants who had been unemployed for more than 12 months.

Uniform Business Rate

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the amount of unpaid uniform business rate in each of the counties of Wales since its inception.

Mr. David Hunt: National non-domestic rates came into force on 1 April 1990. The information available is given in the following table:

Arrears of non-domestic rates at 31 March 1991[1]

County Area[2]	Arrears (£,000)	Amount due[3] (£,000)
Clywd	4,597	51,292
Dyfed	2,202	36,564
Gwent	4,039	60,400
Gwynedd	1,378	23,610
Mid Glamorgan	4,885	55,589
Powys	393	9,473
South Glamorgan	1,916	59,217
West Glamorgan	2,111	55,307
Total Wales	21,521	351,452

[1] As reported by charging authorities.
[2] Charging authorities grouped in county areas.
[3] Gross amount due less discretionary reliefs. Figures shown are provisional.

Pembrokeshire Health Authority

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in relation to the Pembrokeshire health authority's application for trust status (a) the date on which he received the application, (b) the date on which he will announce his decision and (c) the criteria he will use to reach his decision.

Mr. David Hunt: The application was received on 16 July and the three months' public consultation commenced on 1 August. I expect shortly to announce my decision whether to establish the trust. This will take into account:

(a) the comments received as a result of public consultation; and
(b) the individual merits of the application in demonstrating the benefits and improved quality of services to patients; the involvement of professionals, especially consultants in senior management; management capability and capacity, and the financial soundness of the potential trust.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the hospitals in Wales that propose to opt out or establish a NHS trust or have expressed an interest in doing so; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To date only Pembrokeshire has submitted an application to become an NHS trust. An announcement listing those units or hospitals invited to prepare an application to seek trust status in April 1993 will be made in a few weeks.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much of the financial contribution received by Pembrokeshire health authority, towards costs incurred through preparing an application for NHS trust status, has been used for public relations.

Mr. David Hunt: The contribution made available to Pembrokeshire health authority was to help towards costs incurred in preparing the application, associated printing and during the consultation period.

Adult Education

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to develop the provision of non-vocational adult education classes in Wales and increase the access to vocational classes for mature students in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: The development of and access to adult education is currently the responsibility of the local education authorities, the university of Wales and a number of voluntary organisations.

Patients Charter

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what new and additional resources he has committed to meeting the objectives of the patients charter in Wales, excluding from his reply the costs of the publication and its preparation and distribution.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The patients charter for Wales builds on existing good practice within the NHS. Some of the guarantees and standards in the charter are already being achieved by health authorities in Wales. Where the objectives in the charter are not presently being achieved, health authorities will need to use the resources allocated to them.

GP Fundholders

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a list of those GP fund-holding practices in Wales which have set up private companies for aspects of their patients' care.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: There are none.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish for each family health service authority area in Wales (a) the total number of GP practices, (b) the number of fund-holding practices and (c) the percentage of Welsh patients registered with a GP who belong to a fund-holding practice.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The information is as follows:

Family health service authority	Number of GP practices	Number of GP fund-holders
Clwyd	74	1
Mid Glamorgan	106	4
South Glamorgan	76	1
West Glamorgan	65	1
Gwent	95	—
Gwynedd	55	—
Powys	19	—
Dyfed	70	—

Some 3 per cent. of patients in Wales are covered by the seven fund-holding practices.

Parliamentary Questions

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his practice to answer hon. Members to whom he has replied to a parliamentary question with an undertaking to write, within one week of his reply.

Mr. David Hunt: My practice is to write to hon. Members as soon as possible.

Community Services Managers

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will give a list of community services managers, or their equivalents, within the health service in Wales, together with their grades and pay scales and any appropriate qualifications;

(2) if he will give a list of unit general managers within the health service in Wales together with their grades and pay scales and any appropriate qualifications.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my letter of 7 November, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Unit General Managers

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his practice to require health authorities to report to him the reasons for any dismissals from the post of unit general manager within hospitals in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: No. As I said in my reply on 17 October 1991 contractual matters pertaining to general managers fall entirely within the operational responsibilities of the employing authority.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Abattoirs

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number of small abattoirs currently not up to EC hygiene standards which will qualify for permanent derogation.

Mr. Maclean: All red meat abattoirs in Great Britain currently operate under licences granted by local authorities. With the exception of abattoirs approved for intra-Community trade, records are not routinely mentioned by the Department on the site of individual abattoirs. However, annual statistics derived from State Veterinary Service visits indicate that there are some 222 abattoirs in Great Britain which are eligible to qualify for a permanent structural derogation from the EC single market rules contained in Council directive 91/497/EEC. EC rules on hygiene and inspection apply to all abattoirs whether or not they qualify for a derogation.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number of small slaughterhouses and cutting plants currently not up to European Community hygiene standards which will qualify for temporary derogation until the beginning of 1996.

Mr. Maclean: Council directive 91/498/EEC enables member states, subject to approval by the EC standing veterinary committee, to grant temporary structural derogations to red meat slaughterhouses, cutting premises and cold stores of all sizes which are unable to comply with single market rules by 1 January 1993. All premises not currently EC approved may apply for a temporary derogation. However, this is a commercial decision for individual businesses and it is not possible accurately to estimate the likely numbers. The Department has recently made available to businesses a detailed free information pack on the new rules, including an application form for temporary derogations.

Wind Farms

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the level of grant aid which farmers can receive for the construction of wind farms from his Ministry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Grants are available only where the main purpose of the windmill is to serve the agricultural needs of the farm for electricity. The grant rate is 25 per cent. in the less-favoured areas and 15 per cent. elsewhere. Where the supply also serves a domestic dwelling or provides surplus power to another farm or an electricity company grant is paid on three quarters of the eligible costs.

Pesticides

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the present restrictions on the use of Atrazine and Simazine pesticides.

Mr. Maclean: United Kingdom use of Atrazine and Simazine are subject to statutory conditions of use such as maximum application rate, minimum harvest interval and operator protection requirements. Use of any pesticide in an unapproved manner is an offence under the Control of Pesticides Regulations 1986.

Fishing Industry

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what funds he has set aside for 1991-92 to fund a decommissioning scheme for the fishing industry.

Mr. Curry: None, but as I indicated in reply to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) on 5 November, at column 77 the Government are ready to consider industry proposals for decommissioning and the necessary funding provided these form part of a wider conservation package aimed at reducing fishing effort.

Food from Britain

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the level of funding given to Food from Britain in each year since 1985.

Mr. Curry: The information, which relates to the amount of Government grant for each financial year mentioned, is as follows:

	£ million
1985-86	6
1986-87	5
1987-88	4·1
1988-89	4·2
1989-90	4·5
1990-91	4·5

Sheep Dips

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will review his policy concerning the requirement of a single autumn dip for sheep; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Future arrangements will be considered when the results of this year's dip, which ended on 2 November, are available.

Non-fat Milk

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will place a copy of the European Commission reasoned opinion on regulation 164 relating to non-fat milk bulk distribution in the Library.

Mr. Curry: Reasoned opinions are confidential between the Commission and Government, being preparatory to possible court proceedings. It is established practice therefore not to publish their contents.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the new environmentally sensitive areas he intends to designate and how many existing environmentally sensitive areas he intends to expand; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: I plan to increase expenditure on environmentally sensitive areas in England by £75 million over the next three years. I will be making announcements concerning the designation of new areas and the improvements in the existing ESAs shortly.

Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number of recorded cases of spongiform encephalopathy in cats, with relevant dates.

Mr. Maclean: The number of recorded cases of spongiform encephalopathy in cats in Great Britain listed by date or clinical onset of the disease is as follows:

	Number
November 1989	1
January 1990	1
February 1990	1
March 1990	2
April 1990	1
May 1990	1

Cymag and Spannit

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the agricultural uses of (a) sodium cyanide (Cymag) and (b) chlorpirifos (Spannit).

Mr. Maclean: Sodium cyanide (Cymag) is a vertebrate control agent. It is not approved for agricultural use in the United Kingdom.

Chlorpirifos (Spannit) is approved for agricultural use on the following crops:

Calabrese or
Calabrese at drilling or transplanting

Kale or
Kale at drilling or transplanting

Drilling Carrott Potato

Swede or

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number of cases of BSE in cows born after the ban on the inclusion of ruminant protein in cattle rations.

Mr. Maclean: Three.

Sheep (Import Bans)

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those countries presently operating an import ban on sheep from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Curry: The information requested is as follows:

Argentina
Australia
Austria
Brazil
Canada
Chile
Malaysia
New Zealand
Sweden
Tunisia
Turkey
United States of America
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Farmed Salmon

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action the Government are taking to remedy the disturbance of the salmon market and to protect the farmed salmon industry from unfair competition.

Mr. Curry: The EC Commission adopted on Friday 8 November a regulation which introduces a scale of minimum import prices for imports into the European Community of fresh, chilled or frozen Atlantic salmon. The regulation came into force on 9 November, and will run until 29 February 1992.

I very much welcome this positive response by the Commission to the strenuous representations we have been making to secure a floor in the market, as protection against the threat of price collapse caused by unfair competition from Norwegian imports. Our producers have been left to struggle for too long, while huge stocks of frozen salmon have built up in Norway and consignments have been offered for sale at prices which have undermined the market. This has posed a severe threat to United Kingdom salmon farmers and to the economy of the rural areas where they operate.

I hope the measures that have now been introduced will restore stability to the market during the important pre-Christmas period.

Tecnazene

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will bring forward proposals to restrict the use of the fungicide Tecnazene.

Mr. Maclean: Tecnazene is under review by the independent Advisory Committee on Pesticides. Ministers in the six Departments responsible for pesticides will decide jointly on any appropriate regulatory action on the basis of expert advice from the ACP.

Milk Marketing Boards

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the monopoly powers of the milk marketing boards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Under Community law the United Kingdom is authorised to grant the milk marketing boards the exclusive right to buy from producers in their area the milk which they produce and market without processing, provided it satisfies certain minimum requirements. This right is coupled with an obligation on the boards to purchase the milk in question.

Farm Assistance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the proportion of the support provided by consumers/taxpayers directly and indirectly to farmers and horticulturalists which goes to the 1,000 largest owners of agricultural land, excluding woodland and rough grazing.

Mr. Curry: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) on 6 November, (Official Report, columns 165-66).

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give for England and Wales the amount of aid distributed to hill farmers under each category of assistance for each year from 1978-79.

Mr. Curry: This information can be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

Wyandotte Birds

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the destruction of rare Wyandotte birds following a court case brought against their owner, Mr. Clem Shaw, by Shropshire trading standards department.

Mr. Maclean: I am not aware of any destruction of Wyandotte birds owned by Mr. Shaw; nor has the Department issued any instructions for their slaughter.

Cattle

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will encourage a system of passports for finished cattle at auction;

(2) what information he has of the present usage of the system of passports for finished cattle at auction.

Mr. Curry: I understand that a "passport" system for cattle is operated in a number of member states of the European Community. Proposals for a common system of livestock identification are expected to be put forward by the European Commission to the Council of Agriculture Ministers. I have no plans to introduce changes to the system of cattle identification in the United Kingdom in advance of agreement on those proposals.

Rapeseed

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much rapeseed in the EC is used for animal feed; what is the cost to EC funds of using this feed; and if he will publish a table showing the total subsidies paid by the EC on ingredients to animal feed and the total value of feed produced.

Mr. Curry: In 1990-91, around 6 million tonnes of rapeseed were processed in the EC. The majority was crushed for oil and meal. Only the meal, which makes up around 60 per cent. of the seed by weight, is used in animal feeds. Some 290,000 tonnes of rapeseed were directly incorporated into animal feed. Expenditure on EC support subsidies for rapeseed in 1989, the latest year for which final figures are available, was 1,288 mecu—£843 million.

The other information requested is not available.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 12 November 1991

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Sir Allan Green

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Attorney-General what financial arrangements were made with the previous Director of Public Prosecutions as to compensation for his years of service.

The Attorney-General: The previous Director of Public Prosecutions has a pension entitlement, not payable until August 1997. He will receive now an ex-gratia payment of three months salary.

McKenzies Friend

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Attorney-General what was the cost to public funds of the Treasury Solicitor contesting the case in the Appeal Court in July on McKenzie's friend, what fees were paid to the barrister who acted as amicus curiae; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Treasury counsel was instructed by the Treasury Solicitor to appear as an amicus curiae in the case of R v. Leicester City Justices ex parte Barrow at the request of the Court of Appeal. Counsel did not appear in order to "contest" the appeal, but in order to assist the court on matters of law. The cost to public funds of such assistance to the Court of Appeal was £2,412·45. The amount of the fee paid to counsel is a matter of professional confidence between solicitor and counsel.

TRANSPORT

Stoke-Derby Link Road

Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he can report progress on the Stoke-Derby link road and the Derby southern spur.

Mr. Chope: Good progress is being made and the link road between Stoke and Derby is on target for completion in 1996.

I hope to be able to announce a decision on the route of the Derby southern bypass and spur by Christmas and to publish the remaining statutory orders for side road alterations and the compulsory purchase of the necessary land in the spring of 1992.

Tyre Tread Depths

155. Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will publish in full the new requirements on tyre tread depth regulations;

(2) if he will publish the date of making and the date of implementation of the new construction and use regulations concerning tyre tread depths; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: From 1 January 1992 the grooves of the tread pattern of every tyre fitted to the wheels of cars, light vans and their trailers must be of a depth of at least 1·6mm throughout a continuous band situated in the central three-quarters of the breadth of tread and round the entire circumference of the tyre. They will replace the current standard of 1mm of tread across three quarters of the tread pattern and visible tread in the remaining quarter. Vehicles first used before 3 January 1933 are exempt from these new requirements, because in many cases they have resilient, rather than pneumatic, tyres. The new standards on tyre tread depths of cars, light vans and their trailers are covered by the Road Vehicles (Construction and Use) (Amendment No. 4) Regulations 1990 (SI 1990 No. 1981) which were made on 28 September 1990.

Ipswich—Cambridge Rail Service

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report a list of the public service grants he has made to British Rail for the purpose of keeping open rail services between Ispwich and Cambridge over each of the past five years; whether those train services are meeting the performance targets and obligations laid down by his Department; if he will list those targets and obligations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Public service obligation (PSO) grant is a block grant paid towards the cost of maintaining all supported services. In 1990-91 British Rail received £699·9 million in PSO grant.

The quality of service standards applicable to services of this type are that 90 per cent. of trains should arrive within five minutes of the scheduled time and no more than 1 per cent. of trains should be cancelled. Performance against these standards is not monitored by the Department on a line by line basis. However, for the Anglia sub-sector, of which the Ipswich-Cambridge route is part, 86·9 per cent. of trains arrived within five minutes of their scheduled time and 2 per cent. of trains were cancelled in the year to September 1991.

A45, Bury St. Edmunds

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what portions of the A45 at Risby near Bury St. Edmunds are or have been closed over the past four weeks; and if he will publish a list of previous closures of this trunk road within five miles to the east and west of Bury St. Edmunds in each of the past five years, indicating in each case for how long portions of this highway were closed and how much public money was spent in each case, and in total for repairs or other purposes.

Mr. Chope: The westbound carriageway at Risby is currently being reconstructed and resurfaced.

Previous closures are attached. These do not include emergency works, routine maintenance or works for public utilities.

Year	Location	Scheme	Cost £000s	Duration	Traffic management
1985-86	Rougham-Moreton Hall	Carriageway maintenance and widening	1,200	12 weeks	Contraflow and lane closures
1987-88	Risby westbound on slip road	Repairs/resurfacing	40	2 weeks	Lane closures
1988-89	Beyton-Bury bypass	Carriageway maintenance and overlay	1,000	22 weeks	Contraflow and lane closures
1988-89	Risby-Westley	Safety fence works	100	19 weeks	Lane closures
1989-90	Risby westbound carriageway	Resurfacing	75	2 weeks	Lane closure
1989-90	Risby-Rougham	Surface dressing	50	2 days	Lane closure
1990-91	Bury St. Edmunds	Reconstruction-overlay	4,000	20 weeks	Contraflow
1990-91	Various sites	Surface dressing	50	2-3 days	Lane closures
1990-91	Risby-Kentford	Safety fencing	130	6 weeks	Lane closures
1990-91	Rougham	Closure of gap	50	3 weeks	Lane closures
1990-91	Various sites	French drain renewal	70	4 weeks	Lane closures

Car Pooling

159. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research his Department has carried out into congestion reduction from incentives for car pooling; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: An extensive programme of research was conducted following the Transport Act 1978 which liberalised the rules governing car sharing. It was apparent from this work and subsequent initiatives that it is particularly difficult to organise formal car pooling schemes and that when successful they can have the effect of reducing public transport patronage. We continue to keep the matter under review.

Shipping (Toxic Substances)

170. Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps the Government are taking to secure changes to United Nations shipping regulations in respect of classification of the toxicity of transported substances according to the results of LD50 tests.

Mr. McLoughlin: The United Kingdom Government have been actively involved in discussion within OECD of an alternative to the LD50 methodology. If an alternative is agreed, the appropriate United Nations Committee on the Transport of Dangerous Goods will consider the effect on transport regulations generally.

Lighthouses

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what borrowing limits apply to each general lighthouse authority;

(2) for each of the last five years, what is the amount of money allocated from the reserves of the General Lighthouse Fund to supplement light due costs;

(3) if he will give the current level of liquid reserves available to the General Lighthouse Fund; and what is his current estimate of the level expected in March 1992.

Mr. McLoughlin: Under section 662A of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (as inserted by the Merchant Shipping Act 1988) the borrowing limit applying to the General Lighthouse Fund is £100 million. This is not disaggregated to each general lighthouse authority. In the last five years the GLF reserves have met the following shortfalls of the income required to meet total operating costs plus depreciation:

Year	£ million
1986-87	3·2
1987-88	1·9
1988-89	5·9
1989-90	8·9
1990-91	[1]11·8

[1] Provisional.

The liquid reserves stood at £22·1 million at the end of October and are expected to be around or below £20 million by March 1992.

A4

Sir Barney Hayhoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what studies or plans are in hand for alterations at the junctions on the A4 road between Brentford and Hammersmith.

Mr. Chope: The report of the M4-A4 corridor study by Howard Humphreys and Partners was published on 3 October. It recommends a new link between the M4 and the A4 to relieve congestion on the elevated dual two-lane section of the motorway between junctions 1 and 2 and also recommends various improvements to A4 junctions. The report is now the subject of consultation. The improvement of the A4 junction with the A316 at Hogarth roundabout has been investigated by Sir William Halcrow and Partners Limited, as has the A4 junction with the A406/A205 at Chiswick roundabout. These reports are being considered. Frank Graham Consulting Engineers Ltd, the Department's agent for this part of the A4, is investigating right-of-way priorities at Hogarth roundabout and the provision of signals at Chiswick roundabout to cater for traffic from the Chiswick Park development in Chiswick High road. Their work is still at an early stage.

Dock Workers

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many hours dock workers have worked per week on average in each of the last five years in each of the major ports.

Mr. McLoughlin: Weekly average hours worked within the dock labour scheme as a whole were published in the annual reports of the National Dock Labour Board and were as follows (including overtime but excluding "under-employed" hours):

1986	1987	1988
39·5	41·0	42·0

I have no information on ports outside the scheme, or for the period from 1989 when it was abolished.

Ports (Operational Leases)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to give effect to section 17 of the Ports Act; and what particular regard his plans have for operational leases.

Mr. McLoughlin: It is intended that the affirmative order provided for in section 17(8) of the Act shall be laid before Parliament shortly. At the present time, the draft proposals for the provisions of the order, including provisions for leases of operational land, are the subject of consultation with the trust ports. It is too early therefore to say what the precise nature of those provisions will be.

Rural Bus Routes

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the total number of rural bus service routes in 1980 and the total number in 1990 in the United Kingdom.

Mr. McLoughlin: Between 1982 (the earliest year for which statistics are available) and 1990-91, vehicle mileage in the English shire counties increased by 19 per cent. But no breakdown between rural and urban mileage is available within this total; nor is information available on numbers of routes.

Rail Electrification

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the proportion of (a) Wales's and (b) Britain's railway network which is electrified; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: There are no electrified lines in Wales; as at 31 March 1991, 30 per cent. of British Rail's network was electrified or in the process of being electrified as a result of projects approved or under construction.

RNIB Needs Survey

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he has given to the report "Blind and Partially Sighted Adults in Britain—The RNIB Needs Survey"; what action he will be taking in relation to its findings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department of Transport has not yet received a copy of the report. We have asked the RNIB to send us one urgently so that we can consider it fully.

Nuclear Transport Routes

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he possesses in regard to the reasons for the diversion of the Pacific Teal away from its planned route from Japan to Barrow in Furness via the Panama canal during its voyage in December 1989 to February 1990; and what was the effect on the safe operation of the ship.

Mr. McLoughlin: The ships of Pacific Nuclear Transport Limited are capable of taking any of a number of different non-stop routes from Japan to Europe and have done so on a number of occasions. In this instance, because of uncertainties relating to transit of the Panama canal at that time, the decision was taken to use another route.

Departmental Restructuring

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of the recent restructuring of his Department and its implications for shipping and ports policy; if he will give details of the establishment in his Department as it relates to shipping and ports related posts; and if he will indicate which posts are currently unfilled or vacant.

Mr. McLoughlin: Some changes were made with effect from 2 September to the responsibilities of a number of directorates in the Department, but these had no implications for shipping and ports policy. There are some 1,020 shipping and ports related posts in the Department including 483 coastguard grades. As at 8 November there were five administrative vacancies, 13 specialist vacancies and 29 vacancies in coastguard grades.

Trust Ports

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of the liquid assets currently held by each trust port on 31 July 1991.

Mr. McLoughlin: Port authorities produce annual accounts, but I have no information on their mid-year financial positions.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how he plans to ensure that the objectives set out in the transfer schemes for trust ports are made binding on the successful bidder; and what safeguards exist to ensure that memoranda and articles agreed by him in respect of the new company will not be changed following the completion of the sale to the successful bidder.

Mr. McLoughlin: The purpose of a transfer scheme is to effect the transfer of a trust port's existing undertaking to a successor company with a view to the subsequent disposal of that company's securities: such schemes do not contain operational objectives for the successor company. However, in cases where a port is to be sold to a single buyer, objectives of sale are agreed between the authority concerned and the Government. Prospective purchasers will then be required to demonstrate to the authority in the bidding process how they intend to meet those objectives, and this information will be taken into account by an authority in their assessment of competing bids.

Such objectives cannot by their nature be legally binding. In determining the company's business objectives, and in deciding whether to make alterations to its memorandum and articles however, the new owner of the port will need to take account of the plans on which his bid has been based, and the statutory powers and duties of the company. The relevant provisions of the Companies Act 1985 relating to alterations to the memorandum and articles will of course apply in the same way as they do to any other company.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how amendments made by him to the proposed transfer schemes of trust ports are to be incorporated into competing bids.

Mr. McLoughlin: Before finalising their bids, prospective purchasers of a trust port will have the opportunity to acquaint themselves with the provisions of any order made under section 9 of the Ports Act 1991, confirming that port's transfer scheme with or without modifications. They will therefore be able to determine their final bid in the light of any modification which may have been made.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of those trust ports which have to date submitted proposals to privatise under the provisions of the Ports Act 1991; and if he will give in respect of each the timetable for (a) the deadline by which representations have to be received, (b) the completion date of the transfer of the trust port to the newly established company, and for (c) the date when it is expected to name the successful bidder.

Mr. McLoughlin: To date, four ports have formally submitted schemes of transfer: Tees and Hartlepool port authority, Medway ports authority, the Port of London authority for the port of Tilbury, and Clyde ports authority. The deadline for the end of the representations period in each case is as follows: for Tees, 24 September; for Medway, 2 October; for Clyde, 13 December. There is under the Act no representations period for the Port of Tilbury. The dates for completion of the transfer schemes and the naming of the successful bidder in each case are not yet known. The former will depend on the extent and nature of the modifications to any particular scheme that appears necessary in the light of representations and other factors and after consulting the relevant authority. The latter will depend on the date on which each authority recommends a bidder and the timing of the decision on whether to accept that recommendation.

Driving Licences

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the name of the marketing company that advised DVLC (Swansea) on its use of the drivers' licence computer base for the purpose of test-marketing the potential for commercial firms to advertise their services to applicants for driving licences.

Mr. Chope: The company advising the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency on the market research necessary to establish the potential of its database and dispatch equipment is Marketing Triangle Ltd.

Promotional Leaflets

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the driver and vehicle licensing centre intends to continue to send out promotional leaflets for the British School of Motoring with provisional driving licences.

Mr. Chope: The Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency concluded the test mailing on 4 October. No new mailing will take place until the results of the market research have been fully evaluated. In deciding future policy in this area, account will be taken of representations received.

Docklands Light Railway

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for the management of the Docklands light railway; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: We intend that there should be new management arrangements for the DLR. The railway has a vital role in the regeneration of Docklands, and there is a strong case for uniting it with the London Docklands development corporation, whose prime objective that regeneration is. Subject to the outcome of any necessary consultations, I therefore intend asking the chairman of London Regional Transport to transfer responsibility for the DLR to the LDDC. The effective date of the transfer will be announced when the necessary procedures and detailed arrangements are completed.

Civil Aviation Authority

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what objectives he has set for the new chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority.

Mr. Rifkind: I sent the following letter recently to Mr. Christopher Chataway:

This letter sets out the objectives which the Government wishes you to pursue as Chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority in fulfilment of the statutory functions of the Board. In the case of conflict between these objectives and the Authority's statutory duties, the statutory duties must prevail.

General Objectives

Safety. Your overriding objective must be to ensure that the CAA continues to promote, in an efficient and cost-effective way, high standards of safety in all aspects of civil aviation. I have made it clear that safety is the responsibility of the CAA and it is not my intention to interfere in the discharge of its duties.

Regulation. Subject to your responsibility for safety, and to other explicit statutory requirements, the Authority should impose as few burdens as possible on those whose activities it regulates. The United Kingdom civil aviation industry had to bear the full costs of regulation and the Authority must therefore continually strive to ensure that regulation is no greater than necessary.

I would expect your charges in relation to the services of the Economic Regulation and Safety Regulation Groups to cover their costs and to provide the required rate of return on investment without rising faster than the rate of inflation, taking one year with another, unless there were very good reasons for them to do so, and in all events to be as low as is compatible with the proper discharge of their responsibilities.

Costs and Quality of Service. The Authority should keep its costs under constant review and, where appropriate, should devise formal cost reduction programmes. Quality of service should also be carefully monitored. In the light of these considerations and or your overriding safety objective, in the course of your first year of appointment you should review all performance targets and indicators (including the development of appropriate unit cost indicators) for the Authority, and put to me proposals for the future, with a view to our agreeing them in time for inclusion of the targets in the 1992 Corporate Plan. You should continue to keep under review your arrangements for consulting users about the Authority's charges and I would be glad if you would cover this point in particular in your first annual report to me.

The Environment. While I have primary responsibility for regulating environmental disturbance attributable to civil aviation, in planning and providing its air traffic control services, the Authority should assess the possible effects of any changes on the environment, including the effects of noise. The Department should be notified in any cases where the Authority considers that adverse effects are likely to be significant. The Authority should also maintain its capacity to provide expert technical advice on environmental problems.

External Relations. The Authority must continue to seek to maintain good communications with Parliament, industry and the public so that each properly understands the CAA's various roles. It will be your continuing responsibility to deal, in correspondence and otherwise, with the concerns of Members of both Houses of Parliament as they affect the Authority's activities.

The Authority is both a regulator of the industry and a monopoly supplier of many air traffic control services, and you should ensure that the industry is kept in close touch with your plans, and has full opportunities to tell you of their views. The Safety Regulation Group Finance Advisory Committee is an example of a valuable consultation mechanism, and you should ensure that it is continued effectively.

Public Sector Financial Disciplines. The Authority should continue to stay within its External Financing Limit each year and the associated investment approvals limits. It should also continue to provide the Government with regular, timely flows of information so that the Authority's performance can be monitored both generally and more specifically against agreed strategies and targets and the External Financing Limit.

Over the three year period ending in 1991-92, the Authority has been working to a target annual average rate of return on average capital employed of 8 per cent. on a current cost basis; this target has applied to all the Authority's activities, except UK airspace air traffic services and Highland and Islands Airports Ltd. You should plan on the basis that this target will be maintained for the next three-year period, beginning in 1992-93, but it will be subject to review in the autumn of this year.

Corporate Planning. The Authority should prepare Corporate Plans reflecting the objectives in this letter (and the outcome of the previous annual Investment and Financing Review), including the External Financing Limit. Each year's plan should be submitted to me no later than April each year.

Organisation. You should ensure that an appropriate structure and management systems are in place to provide a cost-effective and commercial approach within the Authority, with effective control of both capital and current expenditure, so that the Authority can take a corporate view of its priorities, set targets for parts of the business and ensure that they are achieved.

The recent Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on National Air Traffic Services (NATS) made a number of recommendations, almost all of which were accepted by the Authority. These recommendations should be implemented in a timely fashion. I attach particular importance to those recommendations concerning manpower planning, for which appropriate systems need to be developed without delay.

Objectives for Economic Regulation

Within the relevant statutory requirements, and working with the Department in the international arena, the Authority should act to ensure that as far as possible, the United Kingdom travelling public is served by a healthy competitive multi-airline industry. Further steps towards liberalisation and the creation of a single market within the European Community will bring important changes in the next few years (on matters such as route licensing, the approval of fares, and probably the allocation of airport slots). The Authority should continue to be ready to advise the Government on necessary changes to policy and to legislation, and to revise its Statement of Policies on air transport licensing appropriately in response to changes in both.

It is important that the Economic Regulation Group's costs remain under effective control, so that increases in charges are kept to a minimum.

Objectives for National Air Traffic Services

The National Air Traffic Services (NATS) is run jointly between the Authority and the Ministry of Defence with staff provided by each. You should be aware of the Ministerial Directions to NATS which I shall soon be revising with the Secretary of State for Defence. The Directions will continue to require NATS to provide airspace capacity, on a cost effective and timely basis, to meet the needs of airspace users both civil and military but, recognising the increasing demand from aircraft operations, they will invite you—in consultation as necessary with the Secretary of State for Defence—to advise me on appropriate action in the event of demand for airspace exceeding capacity.

To this end it is essential that NATS' capital programme is implemented in a thorough and effective way, with due attention paid to project appraisal and to the delivery of projects (notably the New En-Route Centre and the Central Control Function) punctually and to budget. This will be a key responsibility for the new Chief Executive of NATS. The Authority have already made significant changes in NATS' project management arrangements, but it is important that these are maintained and followed through, and that the possible need for further changes is kept always in mind.

I also attach great importance to effective international working on air traffic control (ATC) matters; I look to the Authority for full support in helping to implement the plan endorsed by the European Civil Aviation Conference Ministers for harmonising and progressively integrating their ATC systems. Together with the Chief Executive of NATS, I should like you in due course to consider with your Board whether the new NATS organisational structure is proving to be appropriate to the ever-increasing international dimension of ATC work.

There have been long-running negotiations with BAA on the provision of aerodrome navigation services. I hope it will be possible to bring these to a conclusion soon, to put this important relationship on a firm footing.

Objectives for Safety Regulation

The Authority has its own safety responsibilities, but it is important that recommendations by the Air Accident Investigation Branch (AAIB) which are accepted should be followed up with all due promptness. I should like you to continue to send me a report annually on the way in which this is being done.

My predecessor was concerned at last year's increases in the charges made by the Authority's Safety Regulation Group. Since then a review of the Group's operation has been conducted and recommendations have been made. I would be grateful for a report by the end of the financial year as to what has been done in the light of the consultants' report.

The Group's future staffing levels and the level of charges to industry should reflect improvements in efficiency and working practices without of course compromising the effectiveness of the Group's safety functions. Progress on achieving this should be included in your annual reports on the achievement of your objectives.

The Safety Regulation Group is already playing a prominent role in international organisations such as the European Joint Aviation Authorities and should continue to do so. However, I would ask you to ensure that, as the role of such bodies grows, there should be as little duplication as possible between their work and that of the Group.

Objectives for Scottish Aerodromes

The primary objective for the Authority's Highlands and Islands Airports Ltd. (HIAL) subsidiary should be to seek to break even on its non-oil related operations after grant, consistent with ensuring that the aerodromes continue to meet the social needs of the communities which they serve. I would also be glad if you would examine the scope for unit cost indicators for HIAL.

General

The CAA is established as a nationalised industry separate from Government, and as such it should be free to pursue objectives and responsibilities, within the Corporate Plan accepted by the Government and the Internal Financing Review provision agreed for the next three years. You and your Board are responsible for the day-to-day management of the Authority and can expect to carry this out without interference from Government. At the same time, I am accountable to Parliament for the overall performance of the Authority and I have specific functions in relation to a variety of matters affecting the Authority. It is therefore important that I and my officials have access to the information that bears on my responsibilities, and you should ensure that there continues to be close relationship between my Department and the Authority on all matters of mutual concern.

I expect from time to time to review these objectives with you. I attach importance to receiving regular reports at the end of each financial year on your progress in implementing these objectives.

Vehicle Registration Numbers

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, if he will make a progress report on the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency's scheme to sell attractive registration numbers.

Mr. Chope: This highly successful and innovative scheme has proved to be very popular with the British motoring public. Since sales began in December 1989 over 100,000 numbers have been sold providing total receipts of over £55 million. Particular interest has been shown in the latest range of numbers to be made available taken from the 'A' prefix series which went on sale from 19 August this year. So far over 33,000 have been sold and they allow motorists who have vehicles registered on or after 1 August 1983 to obtain personalised numbers at a reasonable price. Numbers taken from the current issue 'J' prefix series are also available specifically for new car buyers. I have placed copies of the latest sales information leaflets in the Library.

Roadside Tests

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set an annual target for the number of roadside tests of emissions from heavy goods vehicles undertaken by his vehicles inspectorate.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 11 November 1991]: A total of 113,000 HGV's were inspected at the roadside during 1990-91, and a similar number will be inspected this financial year. All these vehicles are checked for excessive smoke. Wherever possible vehicles are selected for roadside checking where they appear to be emitting a high level of smoke.

THE ARTS

British Library

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Minister for the Arts what discussions are taking place between himself, the PSA, the main contractor and the Dutch supplier of the equipment for the basement book store at the British Library to ensure that the equipment fully meets its specification and that, if any modifications cause its in-service date to be delayed, proper compensation will be paid.

Mr. Renton: Both PSA Services and the construction manager have been in detailed contractual discussions since July with the Dutch supplier to ensure that the product meets its specification and is fit for its purpose. A number of technical shortcomings have already been rectified. The payment of compensation for demonstrated damage is part of the discussions. I am being kept fully informed.

The British Library is shorty to recommence testing to determine the extent of movement, if any, of books on the shelves, during book retrieval operations.

HOME DEPARTMENT

BBC

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the members of the BBC governing body and their current salaries.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The membership of the BBC Board of Governors and their annual remuneration is as follows:

	Annual remuneration with effect from 1 April 1991
Chairman
Marmaduke Hussey, Esq.	£54,145	On the basis of four days per week.
Vice-Chairman
The Rt. Hon. Lord Barnett, PC	£13,890	On the basis of one and half days per week.
National Governor for Northern Ireland
Sir Kenneth Bloomfield, KCB	£13,890
National Governor for Wales
John Parry, Esq, CBE,	£13,890
National Governor for Scotland
Professor Sir Graham Hills	£13,890
Governors:
Dr. John Roberts	£6,945	On the basis of one day per week.
Baroness James of Holland Park, OBE	£6,945
Bill Jordan, Esq.	£6,945
Keith Oates, Esq.	£6,945
Dr. Jane Glover	£6,945
Mrs. Shahwar Sadeque	£6,945
Lord Nicholas Gordon-Lennox, KCMG, KCVO	£6,945

The annual remuneration was increased by 7·5 per cent. from 1 April 1991 and is due to be increased by a further 1·9 per cent. from 1 December 1991. The increases are in line with those approved for groups covered by the Top Salaries Review Body.'

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement as to the outcome of the meeting between the Parliamentary Under-Secretary and the Trade Association of Television Retailers, held on 29 October, concerning the BBC's commercial use of the licence database.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I informed the RETRA representatives that I understood that the Director General of Fair Trading considered the BBC's Telecover promotion likely to promote competition; and that the Data Protection Registrar did not believe the BBC's use of licensing data for other purposes contravened the Data Protection Act 1984 provided the data protection principles were observed. I said also that the BBC had said that they would not promote Telecover in using future licensing data.

I invited the RETRA representatives to contribute to the forthcoming debate preceding the expiry of the BBC's charter in 1996, and to discussion of the draft EC directive on data protection.

Prisoners (Police Cells)

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average weekly cost of keeping a prisoner (a) in prison and (b) in a police cell.

Mrs. Rumbold: During the financial year 1990-91 the average weekly cost of keeping a prisoner in prison was £384 and in a police cell £1,400.

Animals (Scientific Procedures)

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost of the work of the Animal Procedures Committee in 1990.

Mrs. Rumbold: The cost of the work of the Animal Procedures Committee and its research sub-committee during 1990, which includes the fee paid to the chairman, the travelling and subsistence costs of its members and a notional amount to cover the servicing of the committee, was in the region of £29,000.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the amounts of revenue raised under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 in 1990 in fees for certificates of designation of scientific procedures establishments, in fees for personal licences and in fees for certificates of designation of breeding and supplying establishments.

Mrs. Rumbold: Some £1·7 million was collected in respect of certificates of designation and personal licences in force during 1990.

Nationality Applications

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of applications waiting for consideration for British nationality on 1 November.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: As at 31 October 1991, the number of applications for British citizenship awaiting determination was 54,897, of which more than 30,000 were at various stages of consideration.

Door Supervisors

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to control the activity of door supervisors on licensed premises.

Mr. John Patten: As a result of a meeting in September 1990 with representatives of organisations using and providing door supervisors, a survey of police forces was conducted earlier this year to provide information on the nature and extent of problems associated with door supervisors and on any schemes which had been set up to tackle these problems on licensed premises where identified.

The survey revealed that most parts of the country are experiencing some problems with door supervisors, including incidents of violent behaviour. Most of the local registration schemes in existence or planned focus on the need for identification, and to a lesser extent training, of door supervisors. In many cases, registration of door supervisors is a condition of the issue or renewal of a public entertainments licence. In some cases it is required that the employment of individual door supervisors be approved by a local committee, comprising representatives of the police and local authorities.

It is not possible at this stage to evaluate the effectiveness of these schemes since most of them are of relatively recent origin. The operation of a representative sample is, however, currently being monitored. We aim to have the interim results of this exercise next spring, to consult with interested parties and to publish a final report before the end of 1992. Our intention is then to issue guidelines to all police forces on the most effective means by which conduct of door supervisors may be controlled. In the meantime the Home Office will maintain close contact with interested parties.

National Crime Intelligence Service

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the date on which the new Welsh regional office of the national criminal intelligence service will be set up in Cardiff.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The location of branch offices of the national criminal intelligence service is being determined by a balance of operational and financial considerations. Current plans are that the branch office covering the police forces in south Wales and south-west England will be sited in Bristol.

Press Complaints Commission

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the chairman of the Press Complaints Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend and I met the chairman of the Press Complaints Commission on 14 March. The Home Office keeps in touch with the commission, and I met the chairman on 30 October.

Firearms

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all those hunts that hold (a) firearms licences and (b) shotgun licences and the people whose names appear on the licences.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for the grant of firearm and shot gun certificates lies with local chief officers of police. Details of certificates on issue are not held centrally.

Police Science and Technology Group

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what goods or services are to be supplied by the successful tenderer to the Home Office Police Department science and technology group tender 87/91; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The successful tenderer, British Telecom plc, will provide cardphone facilities at prison service establishments in England and Wales.

Chief Constables (Salaries)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the names and salaries of each of the chief constables in Britain.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Chief constables' current rates of pay are set out in Home Office Circular 70/1991. The names of all chief constables can be found in the Police and Constabulary Almanac. Copies of both documents are in the Library.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the total cost that was incurred in 1990-91 in pursuing poll tax enforcement procedures through the courts.

Mr. John Patten: About £3·4 million.

Niggers with Attitude Case

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in the light of the judgment in the NWA—Niggers with Attitude—case at Redbridge on 7 November, he will bring forward proposals to amend the Obscene Publications Act 1959.

Mr. John Patten: I cannot comment on the decision of a court in a particular case. The Government recognise that there is concern about the effectiveness of the Obscene Publications Act 1959. This is traditionally an area for Private Members and the Government are prepared to support any suitable proposals for amendments which would make the law more effective and which appear likely to command sufficient public and parliamentary support.

Magistrates Courts

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average cost per sitting hour of a magistrates court.

Mr. John Patten: The average hourly running cost of magistrates courts in 1990/91 was £216·85.

Drug Traffickers

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made towards further bilateral treaties to provide for the confiscation of the assets of drug traffickers.

Mr. John Patten: The United Kingdom has now concluded 23 such agreements or arrangements: 20 in respect of the proceeds of drug trafficking and three concerning the proceeds of all serious crimes. Ten of these agreements or arrangements are in force. In addition, the United Kingdom is able to assist 28 further countries in tracing, freezing and confiscating drug trafficking proceeds by virtue of our recent ratification of the 1988 United Nations convention against illicit traffic in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances (the Vienna convention). Details are as follows:

(i) Bilateral agreements or arrangements to trace, freeze and confiscate the proceeds of drug trafficking have been concluded with:

Anguilla
Argentina
Australia
Bahamas

Asylum

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the country of origin of those who applied for asylum in each quarter of 1990 and 1991, as listed in his answer of 21 October, Official Report, column 338.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 5 November 1991]: The information requested is given in the table. The figures are for principal applicants excluding dependants. The 1990 figures for some nationalities understate because of delays in recording, particularly for the fourth quarter.

ENERGY

Miners' Coal Entitlement

Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has on British Coal's plans with regard to the buy-out of mineworkers', former mineworkers' and their widows' coal entitlement at the end of the 1991-92 financial year.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: This is a matter for British Coal.

Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will ensure that provision is made in any future measures to privatise the coal mining industry to protect the concessionary fuel entitlement of mineworkers, former mineworkers and their widows.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Government will ensure that existing concessionary fuel entitlements from British Coal will be safeguarded following privatisation of the industry.

Nuclear Electric plc

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about the objectives he has set for Nuclear Electric plc.

Mr. Wakeham: Yes. The Government wish to preserve the nuclear option in order to maintain adequate diversity and security of electricity supply and obtain the benefits of this environmentally clean source of energy.

To secure the future of the nuclear option the company must demonstrate to the public that nuclear power is safe, clean and economic and that it should continue to have a major role in electricity supply in the longer term. I have therefore set the following objectives for Nuclear Electric plc:

(i) to increase profit and reduce total and unit costs;
(ii) to achieve a continued increase in electricity generation, provided that this is economically justified;
(iii) to achieve a progressive reduction in the company's dependence on the levy;
(iv) to complete Sizewell B to time and cost;
(v) to achieve a reduction in the costs of re-processing, de-commissioning and waste disposal and greater certainty about these costs;

All these objectives should be achieved whilst maintaining the company's excellent safety record.

PRIME MINISTER

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister what was the cost to the Exchequer of his visits abroad in 1990.

The Prime Minister: The cost of my visits abroad as Prime Minister in 1990 was £93,830.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister how many days he has spent abroad since assuming office.

The Prime Minister: I have spent 41 days abroad on official duties.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 12 November.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

BCCI

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister how many letters he has received from Gibraltar concerning the closure of the Bank of Credit and Commerce International.

The Prime Minister: I have received many representations concerning BCCI.

Indonesia

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Prime Minister when he last met representatives of the Indonesian Government; and what was the purpose of that meeting.

The Prime Minister: I met Dr. Habibie, the Indonesian Minister for Research and Technology on 19 June. We discussed a number of issues including commercial co-operation, particularly in the aerospace sector.

East Timor

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he has had regarding the Indonesian occupation of East Timor; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: We receive frequent representations on the subject of East Timor. We support the efforts of the United Nations Secretary General to promote a settlement acceptable to all parties.

No. 10 Downing Street

Mr. Gould: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what recent assessment he has made of the current standards of horticulture in the gardens of 10 Downing street;

(2) what consideration he has given to the security implications of the proposed contracting out of the management of the Downing street gardens.

The Prime Minister: The security implications of a contractor maintaining gardens in Downing street are considered in the same way as they are when other contractors' staff undertake work in Downing street or its gardens. The standards of gardening in 10 Downing street are high. Those standards will be maintained or improved when the work is bought in from the private sector.

WALES

Waiting Lists

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will state the number of patients waiting for non-urgent in-patient treatment waiting (a) more than one year, (b) more than 18 months and (c) 24 months or more, in Wales as a whole and by health authority in 1979, 1987 and the present.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Information concerning patients waiting for non-urgent in-patient treatment in Wales is collected centrally only on the basis of those waiting more than one year and became available for the first time in 1981. The available information is given in the following table:

Non-urgent cases waiting more than one year for admission as an in-patient as at 31 March

District health authority	1981	1987	1991
Clwyd	701	533	1,091
East Dyfed	49	363	939
Gwent	1,665	1,825	2,567
Gwynedd	422	175	719
Mid Glamorgan	3,386	2,761	2,306
Pembrokeshire	653	1,328	634
Powys	—	—	—
South Glamorgan	2,501	1,696	1,884
West Glamorgan	749	458	1,882
Wales	10,126	9,139	12,022

In March 1974 there was a total of 72,904 patients on hospital waiting lists in Wales; by March 1979 the figure had risen to 97,359 an increase of 24,455.

The number of patients treated in 1974, 1979 and 1990 was:

	1974	1979	1990-91
In-patient	328,793	349,695	482,445
New out-patient	444,032	428,739	551,464

The overall percentage increase/decrease in number of patients treated is as follows:

	1974-79 Per cent.	1979-90 to 1991 Per cent.
In-patients	Up 6	Up 38
New Out-patients	Down 3	Up 29

The latest information for 1990 also shows that 92 per cent. of patients admitted from a waiting list in that year had waited less than 12 months.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he plans to meet (a) health authorities, (b) county health councils and (c) leaders of the health service unions to discuss waiting lists.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: My right hon. Friend is to meet the chairmen of Welsh health authorities on 20 November when waiting lists and the length of time patients have to wait for treatment will be discussed. He has no plans at present to meet community health councils or leaders of health service unions. I am always happy to receive constructive comments in writing at any time.

Renal Patients

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list his initiatives to assist renal patients; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Dialysis facilities for patients suffering from end-stage renal failure have been provided at the following locations:

	Dialysis stations
North Wales
Main Renal Unit—Rhyl	7
Subsidiary Renal Unit—Bangor	6
Subsidiary Renal Unit—Wrexham	6

Main Renal Unit—Cardiff	11
Subsidiary Renal Unit—Cardiff	6
Subsidiary Renal Unit—Merthyr Tydfil	6

Proposals for a unit at Newport have been invited from Gwent health authority. We have also established a kidney transplant unit at the Cardiff royal infirmary. The treatment of most renal patients, however, is in the hands of district health authorities.

Lithotripters

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he proposes to install lithotripters in (a) north Wales and (b) south Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The final report of the all-Wales project group on lithotripsy, which is considering the need for and specification of lithotripter facilities for Wales and appraising location options, is expected to be submitted early in the new year.

Roads and Public Transport

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what financial support he has given to each of the counties of Wales in the last three years for capital and revenue expenditure on (a) roads and (b) public transport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: By agreement with the local authority associations, the bulk of revenue and capital funding to individual local authorities is provided through revenue support grant and basic credit approvals. These are not hypothecated to particular services. As an exception to this rule, transport schemes costing over £5 million attract transport grant; total support in the last three financial years is as follows:

County	1989-90 (£000s)	1990-91 (£000s)	1991-92 (£000s)
Clwyd	558	1,207	938
Dyfed	3,982	1,463	2,704
Gwent	8,349	6,966	14,708
Gwynedd	—	—	281
Mid Glamorgan	8,031	9,737	14,536
Powys	—	—	—
South Glamorgan	6,760	8,757	22,973
West Glamorgan	11,738	22,780	10,780
Total	39,418	50,910	66,920

RNIB Needs Survey

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consideration he has given to the report "Blind and Partially Sighted Adults in Britain—The RNIB Needs Survey"; what action he will be taking in relation to its findings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The Department has secured a copy of this report within the last week and we are studying it with interest. It is the result of a survey carried out in 1986-87, complementary to the wider disability surveys carried out by OPCS, whose reports were published in 1989-90.

We already have a programme of action in hand to improve services for people with visual impairments. In 1990 the Welsh Office issued a working group report "Co-ordinating Services for Visually Handicapped People" and in May of that year published a major guidance circular on best practice in the provision of support and care to people with physical or sensory disabilities.

That advice has been followed up by full guidance on the implementation in Wales of our comprehensive programme to improve community care for all groups which is set out in chapter 11 of the "Caring for People" White Paper [Cm 849]. In addition, the Welsh Office will publish shortly the report of the social services inspectorate inspection of services for people with visual impairment in Gwynedd. This was carried out with RNIB assistance and will be used with the RNIB national survey findings as the basis of a seminar on further guidance early next year.

GP Budget Holders

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many GPs in Wales are budget holders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Seven GP practices in Wales, comprising a total of 46 GPs, have been recognised as fund-holders from 1 April 1991.

Parents Charter

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State, for Wales (1) what is his estimate of the cost of distributing details of the charter for parents to each of the headteachers of Wales;

(2) how many copies of charter for parents he has distributed; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he proposes to make moneys available to local education authorities to enable their headteachers to inform parents of the contents of the charter for parents.

Mr. David Hunt: The charter for parents in Wales sets out in a single document the rights of parents with respect to the education of their children, the choices they can exercise, the information they can obtain about schools' performance and the influence they can have on the way schools are run. As such it is an invaluable reference document to which all parents should have access. I therefore sought the co-operation of the chairmen of governors and headteachers of all schools in Wales to have the document delivered to parents through pupils at their schools. The cost of distributing supplies to schools for that purpose is £11,911.20 and is being met by my Department. I am also making arrangements for copies of the charter to be made available to parents whose children are not yet at school through playgroup and nursery schools associations. Copies of the charter have also been made available to others on request. So far a total of 486,761 copies of the charter have been distributed.

Marginal Hill Farms

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to visit a marginal hill farm in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: I have visited many hill farms throughout Wales and will continue to do so in the future.

School Transport

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the practice of local education authorities in interpreting the statutory walking distance for school transport in the rural areas of Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: I have no reason to believe that LEAs are not properly observing the statutory provisions in the Education Act 1944 relating to walking distances in determining eligibility for transport from home to the nearest appropriate school for attendance. It is for the LEAs themselves to determine what constitutes an appropriate school.

Housing Revenue Account Subsidy

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will consult local authorities and other appropriate bodies regarding his proposals for housing revenue account subsidy in Wales in 1992-93.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The Welsh Office is today consulting local authorities, the Council of Welsh Districts and other interested bodies on proposals for determining each authority's entitlement to subsidy in 1992-93. Comments on the proposals are invited by 9 December. I am placing copies of the consultation proposals in the Library of the House together with estimates of the rent guidelines and management and maintenance allowances for each authority.

For rent guidelines we propose an average increase of £2·14 per week with increases for individual authorities ranging from £1·13 to £3·40 per week over the guideline rent which applies in the current year. This will continue the process of encouraging sensible levels of rent which better reflect the value of the properties concerned.

For management and maintenance allowances, we propose to increase the average allowance per dwelling from £712 to £766. The increase in the allowances for individual authorities will be based on the targeting system introduced in the current year which takes into account the condition of each local authority's stock.

The rent guidelines and the management and maintenance allowances are the assumptions the Government make in calculating each authority's entitlement to subsidy. It is for each council to set its own rent levels and to decide how much to spend on managing and maintaining its stock within its obligations under the Local Government and Housing Act 1989.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

CAP Products

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will bring up to date the information on surplus common agricultural policy products in his answer dated 12 May 1986, Official Report, column 367; and if he will add corresponding information for other common agricultural policy products.

Mr. Curry: The information, which covers all products on which there was relevant expenditure, is as follows:

Notes:
(i) The figures for public storage costs since 1988 are not compatible with earlier costs as stock is now depreciated on entry into intervention. Furthermore the cost of depreciation of 1988 stock is being reimbursed over the 5 years 1988-92.
(ii) 1987 expenditure was for 10 months only and 1988 expenditure was for 11½ months only.

Finance Statistics

Mr. Biffen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the total value of national aids to agriculture paid by each European Community country over the latest available 12 month period and the corresponding value of common agricultural policy payments.

Mr. Curry: The Government do not keep comprehensive details of the national subsidies and other state aids available to farmers in other member states, since to do so would not be a cost effective use of resources. All state aids are, however, subject to the provisions of articles 92 to 94 of the treaty of Rome, and member states are required to obtain the Commission's approval in advance for new state aids and modifications to existing aids and to send an inventory of all state aids to the Commission annually. The Government monitor, through their embassies in member states, the introduction of new state aids and modifications to existing aids, and draws any that seem to be of doubtful legality to the attention of the Commission.

Departmental Staffing

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the departments within his Ministry where he intends to increase staffing levels, indicating the numbers involved in each case, and when he expects the increases to take effect; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: I intend to increase staffing levels in the financial year 1992-93 as a result of the outcome of the recent public expenditure survey round. Additional staff will be placed primarily within divisions dealing with environmental issues and with work arising from the movement towards a single market. The funds allocated will pay for about 275 posts, but the precise total, and the breakdown between divisions will depend on decisions on the grade and mix of staff chosen.

Humming Birds

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with European Commission officials regarding the transportation of wild-caught humming birds and other nectar-feeding birds in the context of the proposed EC directive on transport of live animals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) on 7 November at col. 246.

Suckler Cow Premium

Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends to authorise payments of the suckler cow premium; and if he will pay this at the maximum rate allowed.

Mr. Curry: As I announced on 4 November, Agriculture Ministers have fixed the rates of suckler cow premium for the 1991-92 scheme year at the same rates which applied last year, viz £51·69 per head in the less favoured areas and £47·43 per head elsewhere. A statutory instrument putting these rates into effect is expected to be laid before Parliament later this week and payments to those who have already submitted their applications for premium will be made as soon as possible thereafter.

Common Agricultural Policy

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in which sectors he expects to increase his Ministry's spending in 1991-92 for the intervention board and other aspects of the common agricultural policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Based on latest forecasts of production, market and trade conditions, it is likely there will be increased CAP market support expenditure (class III, vote 1) in the beef, sheepmeat and sugar sectors, offset by reductions in the cereals, milk products and oilseed sectors. Expenditure on this non-cash limited vote, which is largely reimbursed by the Community, is sensitive to a variety of unpredictable changes. If necessary increased provision will be sought at the time of the Spring Supplementary Estimates. My reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) on 6 November at column 163 gives expected changes on Intervention Board Administration expenditure (class III, vote 2).

Agricultural Produce Marketing

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, further to his answer to the hon. Member for South Shields on 5 November, Official Report, column 78, if he will give the amount he intends to fund the organisations that promote the marketing of agricultural produce in (a) 1991-92 and (b) 1992-93; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: I have made provision for the following amounts:

	1991-92 £	1992-93 £
Food From Britain	4,500,000	4,800,000
Meat and Livestock Commission	249,000	264,000
Home-Grown Cereals Authority	120,000	120,000
Potato Marketing Board	300,000	300,000

Fishing Vessels

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions have taken place with European Governments and the Government of the United States of America to ensure that fishing vessles which use the Irish sea will be protected from submarine activity.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have been asked to reply.

Discussions took place at the recent 17th assembly of the International Maritime Organisation which resulted in an assembly resolution concerning the avoidance by submerged submarines of fishing vessels and their gear.

EMPLOYMENT

Claimants

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many unemployed claimants aged between 18 and 25 years have been unemployed for six months or more.

Mr. Jackson: Unemployment figures by age and duration are calculated on a quarterly basis. In July 1991, the latest available date, the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom aged 18 to 24 years who had been unemployed for six months or more was 263,274.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment by how many the unemployment claimant count has risen since October 1990.

Mr. Jackson: Between October 1990 and September 1991, (the latest date for which figures are available), United Kingdom seasonally adjusted unemployment rose by 755,800.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to computerise the matching of claimant details with job vacancy detail.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service Executive Agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the Agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the percentage increase in the number of unemployed claimants over the last 12 months; and what has been the percentage increase in claimant advisers during the same period.

Mr. Jackson: In the 12 months to September 1991, the total number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom, on the unadjusted basis, has increased by 46 per cent. Over the same period the number of claimant advisers, whose main function is to help longer term unemployed people, has increased by almost 24 per cent.

Local Offices

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many of the new integrated offices are located in what were previously unemployment benefit office premises; and what percentage this is of the newly converted offices.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service Executive Agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Training

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the annual performance target for employment training places for 1991-92; and what has been the attainment in the first six months of the current year.

Mr. Jackson: Plans are to provide an average of 149,000 trainees in training on employment training (ET) in Great Britain in 1991-92. By 12 September an estimated 130,000 trainees were in training.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make it his policy to provide for the training of those with special needs.

Mr. Jackson: It is the Government's policy to provide training for people with special needs through its arrangements with training and enterprise councils and through specialist residential training colleges. Many people with special needs will of course be covered by the Government's guarantees and aim.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the annual performance target for employment training places for 1990-91; and what was the outturn.

Mr. Jackson: An average of 215,000 trainees in training on employment training (ET) was planned in Great Britain in 1990-91. An average number in training of 196,000 was achieved.

Workers' Hours

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many British workers work more than (i) 40 hours a week, (ii) 50 hours a week and (iii) 60 hours a week, including overtime.

Mr. Jackson: The following table gives the estimates requested.

Usual hours[1] of work of employee and self-employed—Great Britain, Spring 1990

Hours per week	Thousands
More than 40	11,015
More than 50	3,687
More than 60	1,314

Claimant Adviser Interviews

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the average duration of claimant adviser interviews 12 months ago; and what it is now.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service Executive Agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Skills Analysis

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to analyse the skills of those registering as unemployed and available for work.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service Executive Agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Rehabilitation Courses

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are undergoing a course of rehabilitation (i) at employment rehabilitation centres and (ii) with outside agencies funded by the Employment Service; and what is the average weekly cost of these courses.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service Executive Agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Unemployed, Newham

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish details of the occupational breakdown of the unemployed register in the London borough of Newham.

Mr. Jackson: The information requested is not available.

Vacancy Statistics

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many vacancies were notified to employment offices and jobcentres in each of the past 10 years; and if he will publish a table showing (i) the actual number, (ii) the percentage of the total and (iii) the split between part-time and full-time.

Mr. Jackson: Following is the available information.

(i) The table shows the total number of vacancies in the United Kingdom, on the seasonally adjusted basis, notified to jobcentres for each year from 1981 to 1990.

(ii) Vacancies notified to jobcentres do not represent the total number of vacancies in the economy. The latest research indicates that nationally only about a third of all vacancies are notified to jobcentres.

(iii) Information on the number of vacancies notified to jobcentres split between part-time and full-time is only available for Great Britain, and on the unadjusted basis, from July 1986 onwards. The table shows the number of vacancies notified to jobcentres in Great Britain for each year from 1987 to 1990 and the split between full-time and part-time jobs.

(i) Vacancies notified to jobcentres in the United Kingdom (seasonally adjusted annual total)

Year	Vacancies
1981	1,799,300
1982	1,989,500
1983	2,180,300
1984	2,327,000
1985	2,419,400
1986	2,546,300
1987	2,716,700
1988	2,773,900
1989	2,712,500
1990	2,413,300

(iii) Vacancies notified to jobcentres in Great Britain (unadjusted annual total)

Year	Vacancies	Of which full-time vacancies	Of which part-time vacancies
1987	2,668,597	2,033,699	634,898
1988	2,725,832	2,035,023	690,809
1989	2,702,549	1,949,953	752,596
1990	2,372,129	1,667,182	704,947

Office Staff Statistics

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many staff were employed in (i) jobcentres and (ii) unemployment benefit offices in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service Executive Agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Labour and Social Affairs Council

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the outcome of the meeting of the Labour and Social Affairs Council held in Brussels on 6 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The Council addressed only one item—the proposed directive on pregnant workers. Agreement was reached on the two most important remaining provisions of the proposal, concerned with dismissal and in particular with the level of maternity pay and benefits.

On maternity benefits, the Council rejected the approach proposed by the European Commission of a quantified link with previous earnings. Instead, the Council agreed the principle that member states must at a minimum set the level of maternity benefit at the level of benefits that are paid when people have to be absent from work for reasons of health.

The Council also agreed a number of important protections for the health and safety at work of women who are pregnant or who have recently given birth.

The United Kingdom and all but one of the other member states supported this agreement.

The United Kingdom in addition recorded its concern at the proposed legal basis for this directive under the Treaty of Rome. The United Kingdom does not agree that such matters as leave, pay and other employment rights fall under article 118A of the Treaty, which is explicitly concerned with health and safety at work. The United Kingdom therefore registered its abstention in the voting on this directive. The Social Affairs Council is likely to adopt its formal common position at its next meeting.

The United Kingdom was represented by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment, my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth).

Training Schemes

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the cost of running training schemes through each of the previous methods; what is the cost of running training schemes through training and enterprise councils and local enterprise companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: Prior to the introduction of TECs and local enterprise companies in 1990-91 training schemes were run from the Department's area offices. Area office running costs were not separately identified from those of regional and head office.

During 1990-91 expenditure on TEC management fee in England and Wales was £36·195 million.

For 1991-92 the published estimate shows expenditure of £124·342 million on TEC management fee and residual area office running costs for England and Wales.

Running costs for programmes in Scotland are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

RNIB Needs Survey

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what consideration he has given to the report "Blind and Partially Sighted Adults in Britain—The RNIB Needs Survey"; what action he will be taking in relation to its findings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The Department already provides considerable help for visually impaired people, but we take seriously any indication that more needs to be done. We are therefore considering the recent RNIB report very carefully.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Employment will be meeting the RNIB in the near future to discuss this Department's services for people with disabilities in the light of the survey evidence.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Gulf States (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the recent visit of the Minister of Trade to the Gulf states.

Mr. Sainsbury: I visited Kuwait and Bahrain between 29 October and 3 November.

In Kuwait I met the Amir, Crown Prince, six Ministers, the Governor of the Central Bank and senior Kuwaiti officials. In Bahrain I met the Crown Prince, the Prime Minister and two senior Ministers. In Kuwait I was accompanied by seven senior British business men. In Bahrain I visited the "Rebuild Kuwait 91" exhibition at which 150 British companies were represented, the largest national group.

My visit strengthened the already excellent bilateral commercial relations with Bahrain and Kuwait and enabled me and the business team accompanying me to pursue various export opportunities.

Bankruptcy

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many bankruptcy petitions have been presented in Wales (a) in 1990 and (b) in the current year.

Mr. Redwood: During 1990 there were 855 bankruptcy petitions presented to the county courts in Wales. From January to September 1991 there have been 1,081.

Dressed Leather, Japan

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he intends to make to Japan to abolish the quota system that they place on imports of dressed leather; and what other action he proposes to take in this area.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 11 November 1991]: Following a complaint to the GATT by the EC Commission and the USA, the Japanese Government replaced their quotas on imports of dressed leather and leather footwear with a 60 per cent. rate of import duty with effect from 1 April 1986. Lower rates, between 20 per cent. and 27 per cent. are applied to limited quantities of these products.

The British Government and the European Commission have taken every opportunity to press the Japanese Government to reduce these unacceptably high levels of import duty and substantially increase the quantities admitted at the lower rates. They will continue to do so, both bilaterally and in the GATT Uruguay round negotiations. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will certainly raise this problem with the newly-appointed MITI Minister, as he did with his predecessor.

Exploited Labour

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what representations he has made and plans to make to countries which export goods to Britain manufactured using children or adults who are not paid a living wage;

(2) what plans he has to deal with the threat faced by the British textile and footwear industry from unfair competition from imports produced with cheap and exploited labour;

(3) what plans he has to determine which imports into Britain have been produced using forced child labour and to take steps to ban such imports.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 11 November 1991]: The Government urge all states who have ratified international instruments covering slavery, servitude, forced labour and similar institutions and practices to meet their obligations under those instruments, and also urges those states who have not done so to ratify at the earliest opportunity. This is carried out by the Government at all levels.

I am not aware of any specific cases which would justify making representations of the sort that the hon. Member mentions. Moreover, there would be severe practical difficulties in trying to identify goods which had been produced with allegedly forced or sweated labour, given the varied and complex channels of production and distribution in the textile and footwear industries. Customers can, of course, determine for themselves the acceptability of buying any particular product which may otherwise be lawfully supplied.

More generally, it is highly doubtful whether social conditions can be improved by restricting trade; indeed, opening up trade is more likely to contribute to economic growth in the developing world, which is a prime objective of the current GATT Uruguay round negotiations, and thus help to improve social conditions in those countries. Labour costs do not of themselves create unfair competition. Where competition is genuinely unfair, appropriate trade policy measures will remain available. The export interests of UK industry, including the textile and footwear sector, which has a meritorious record in this respect, also have to be borne in mind in striking the final balance.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the current position of the multi-fibre arrangement and bilateral agreements resulting from it.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 11 November 1991]: Our latest information is that 27 signatories of the multi-fibre arrangement (MFA) including the Community have accepted or provisionally accepted the protocol extending the MFA until the end of 1992. With the guidance of member states the Commission is now negotiating the necessary extensions to the bilateral agreements with individual exporting countries.

Israel

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the level of imports and exports between Israel and the United Kingdom each year since 1970 (a) as a percentage of all United Kingdom exports and imports and (b) at 1990 prices.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 11 November 1991]: The available information is published in table 1B of the annual editions of "Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom" (HMSO), available in the Library of the House. Statistics on United Kingdom trade with individual countries, in 1990 prices, are not available.

Negative Certificates

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to introduce legislation which prohibits the use of negative certificates for companies who trade with Arab companies and who wish to trade with Israel.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 11 November 1991]: None.

Textile and Clothing Markets

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to ensure that increased access to the United Kingdom textile and clothing markets is linked to reciprocal access and adoption by the relevant countries of market principles.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 11 November 1991]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Lee) on 6 November at column 126.

Care Home Proprietors

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why his investigations division is currently examining the affairs of the British Federation of Care Home Proprietors; when he expects these investigations to be completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 11 November 1991]: I cannot comment on the affairs of individual companies. I am prepared to consider any information the hon. Member may provide which might warrant an inquiry. Investigations under the Companies Act are confined to limited companies.

ENVIRONMENT

Property Valuation

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he has any plans to amend the Domestic Property (Valuation) Regulations 1991 to enable a garage or carport to be disregarded if it is required for meeting the needs of the disabled occupant;

(2) if he has any plans to amend the Domestic Property (Valuation) Regulations 1991 to enable an additional room to be disregarded if it is predominantly used by or required for meeting the needs of the disabled occupant.

Mr. Portillo: We are discussing with organisations representing disabled people their representations that other rooms and features should be disregarded within the valuation arrangements.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has any plans to amend the Domestic Property (Valuation) Regulations 1991 to enable the extra space within a property which is required by a wheelchair user to be disregarded.

Mr. Portillo: Under the regulations extra space required by a wheelchair user may be disregarded if it is a feature of a specially adapted additional bathroom, kitchen or lavatory. We are discussing with organisations representing disabled people their representations that other rooms and features should be disregarded within the valuation arrangements.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations his Department has received from organisations of and for disabled people with regard to the Domestic Property (Valuation) Regulations 1991.

Mr. Portillo: We have received representations about these regulations from the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation (RADAR), the Association of Disabled Professionals, and the Disablement Income Group.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if it remains his policy to restore the benefits of the Rating (Disabled Persons) Act 1978.

Mr. Portillo: Our policy was stated in the consultation paper, "A New Tax for Local Government". It is that necessary adaptions to the homes of disabled people should be disregarded in assessing the band into which the property should fall for the purposes of the council tax.

Community Charge

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to take against those local authorities, up to and including Bristol, which are least effective at collecting the community charge to prevent their continuing to create greater community charge in 1992 than they did in the current year.

Mr. Key: We have provided local authorities with stronger powers to collect the community charge than were available for domestic rates. These include attachment of earnings and deductions from income support. If authorities use the powers vigorously this should achieve a high collection rate. We have made it clear that there will be no amnesty for non-payers.

SSSIs

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will identify all the sites of special scientific interest suffering partial loss or long-term damage from April 1990 to March 1991.

Mr. Baldry: I shall write to the hon. Member shortly with the details requested.

Voluntary Sector Forum

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings of the voluntary sector environment forum have been held.

Mr. Baldry: There has been one meeting of the full forum. The working group set up at that meeting to consider DOE funding for Environmental work by the voluntary sector has met four times. The next meeting of the forum will be on 14 November.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the voluntary sector environment forum has produced any reports to Ministers on its work to date.

Mr. Baldry: The forum has a joint departmental and voluntary sector membership. A number of position papers have been produced by the members, and the forum's working group on DOE funding for environmental work by the voluntary sector has produced an interim report, which will be considered by the forum at its meeting on 14 November.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on progress made by the voluntary sector environment forum; and if he will set out the terms of reference of both the voluntary sector environment forum and the Advisory Committee on Business and the Environment.

Mr. Baldry: The forum has made useful progress in its discussions, particularly through the work of its working group on DOE funding for environmental work by the voluntary sector, which has helped to inform decisions on the second year of the operation of the environmental grant fund.

The terms of reference of the Forum as agreed at the first meeting are:

To provide a national forum for discussion between Government and environmental voluntary organisations on generic questions relating to the role of the voluntary sector in environmental protection, enhancement and related issues, and problems facing them in pursuing environmental goals, including:

—increasing the contribution of voluntary organisations (particularly non-environmental bodies) to environmental work;

—how the Government and voluntary sector can work together;

—Government support for the voluntary sector;

—helping the voluntary sector develop partnerships with other agencies; and —how voluntary organisations could use their experience in environmental work to contribute to the Government's environmental policies.

The terms of reference of the Advisory Committee on Business and the Environment are:

—to provide for a strategic level dialogue between Government and business on environmental issues, both of an immediate and topical interest and of a longer term nature.

—in liaison with other appropriate organisations, to help mobilise the business community in demonstrating good environmental practice and management, building on existing initiatives and activities.

—to provide a link with, and focus attention on, international business initiatives on the environment.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions Ministers or officials of his Department have met the voluntary sector environment forum.

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside chairs the main Forum, which has met once. The working group on DOE funding for environmental work by the voluntary sector has a joint membership of voluntary sector and departmental officials and has met four times.

Shellfish

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he will take to protect the United Kingdom marine environment from hazards associated with the introduction of non-native shellfish.

Mr. Baldry: My Department received a recommendation from the former Nature Conservancy Council that a number of non-native species should be added to schedule 9 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, including the following species of non-native shellfish: American hard shell clam; noble crayfish; signal crayfish; Turkish crayfish and Pacific oyster. The effect of such changes would be to make it illegal to release specimens of these species into the wild in Great Britain. We have consulted widely on the recommendations and expect to make an announcement shortly.

Smoking

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether Her Majesty's Government intend to ban smoking from all public places.

Mr. Baldry: We have no plans at present to legislate against smoking in public places. We intend instead to publish guidance later this year in the form of a code of practice, encouraging the voluntary implementation of smoking policies by owners and managers of all places visited by the public. Our policy is that non-smoking should be the norm in all public places, with separate facilities for smoking where appropriate.

The Government are committed to achieving the goal of a smoke-free environment and will monitor the effects of this initiative closely.

Zoos

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of dispensations granted under section 14(2) of the Zoo Licensing Act 1981 in each year since 1981.

Mr. Baldry: The Zoo Licensing Act 1981 came into force in April 1984. The number of dispensations issued under section 14(2) of the Act in each calendar year is as follows:

	Number
1984	29
1985	43
1986	8
1987	15
1988	7
1989	15
1990	12
[1]1991	11

[1] To date.

Wild-caught Birds

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will list those species of wild-caught birds which are traded and where doubt exists as to the sustainability of such trade, as recommended by the Joint Nature Conservation Committee.

Mr. Baldry: In section 5 of its report on the wildlife trade, the Joint Nature Conservation Committee listed 47 species about which it was concerned. Copies of the report —which indicated that the European Community has already taken action to restrict or prohibit trade in most of the species listed—were placed in the Library of the House last month.

Standard Spending Assessments

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what response he has made to the proposal of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities that the "other services" standard spending assessment should include an indicator of economic deprivation taking into account the extent of unemployment;

(2) what response he has made to the London Boroughs Association's proposal to alter the standard spending assessment by removing the need for the London Regional Transport adjustment.

Mr. Key: My right hon. Friend is considering all the representations which he has received from local authority representatives on standard spending assessments and will announce his proposals for 1992-93 shortly.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the "social services (children)" standard spending assessments for the London boroughs of Greenwich, Woolwich and Lewisham with the child population of each of those boroughs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: There is no London borough of Woolwich. The information for Greenwich and Lewisham, as requested, is shown in the following table.

	SSA for children's social services 1991-92 £ million	Children aged 0 to 17 years
Greenwich	14·070	51,746
Lewisham	22·890	52,352

The children's social services SSA is not simply based on the number of children in an area but takes account of a number of other factors which reflect the cost of providing a standard level of service.

Infant Mortality (Greenwich)

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from the London borough of Greenwich about the impact of the borough's infant mortality rates on its social services spending; and what has been his response.

Mr. Key: The London borough of Greenwich has made several representations that the children's social services standard spending assessment should include an indicator based on infant mortality rates. They have not tried to quantify the possible impact of the borough's infant mortality rates on its social services spending. My right hon. Friend is considering all representations received from local authorities on standard spending assessments and will announce his proposals for 1992-93 shortly.

Non-domestic Rates

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish an estimate of the actual total yield from the national non-domestic rate for the financial year 1990-91 and of the expected total yield for 1991-92.

Mr. Portillo: We estimate the total rate yield in England for 1990-91 to be £10,737 million and for 1991-92, £12,066 million.

Bank of Credit and Commerce International

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the total local authority funds at risk following the closure of the BCCI.

Mr. Key: My Department wrote on 27 September to local authorities in the United Kingdom asking them about deposits with BCCI. Returns were due to be submitted by 7 November. The information we have received to date is listed below.

Landfill Sites, Leicestershire

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many landfill sites he has discovered in Leicestershire; and how much has been given in supplemental credit allowance to pay for surveys.

Mr. Baldry: The discovery of landfill sites is a matter for local authorities, not the Secretary of State. Since the initiation in 1990-91 of the supplementary credit approval (SCA) programme for landfill gas works at closed landfill sites, the Department has approved SCAs for 13 sites in the Leicestershire county area. The number of the sites and the amounts for which SCAs have been approved for each authority (which may include both surveys and remedial works) are listed in the following table:

	Sites	£
Leicestershire county council	6	598,237
Blaby district council	1	230,000
Hinckley and Bosworth borough council	2	40,000
Leicester city council	3	155,000
North West Leicestershire district council	1	108,759
Total		1,131,996

Local Government Finance

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a list for each local authority showing the proposed basic credits approvals for 1992-93 broken down by service block as appropriate.

Mr. Portillo: Basic credit approvals for 1992-93 for individual local authorities will be announced in due course. I will arrange for a copy of this information to be placed in the Library of the House of Commons when it is available.

Bathing Water

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will announce the results of the survey of bathing water quality in 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Results from the survey carried out during the 1991 bathing season showed that 76 per cent. of the 453 identified bathing waters in the United Kingdom met the mandatory coliform bacteria standards of the EC Bathing Water Directive. This compares with 77 per cent. in 1990 and 76 per cent. in 1989.

These results are encouraging because overall compliance has remained steady in spite of the worse summer weather this year.

Completion of improvement schemes for some 20 bathing waters in the £2 billion clean up programme has helped to offset the effects of the poor weather and it is clear that the programme, which was expanded and accelerated last year, is beginning to deliver tangible environmental improvements. Many more schemes are due to be completed in the next few years so that by 1995 virtually all our bathing waters will be up to the required standard.

The 1991 results for the United Kingdom are set out in summary form. I shall arrange for a more detailed summary of results to be placed in the Library and we shall also be sending the detailed results to the Commission of the European Communities.

Urban Programmes

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what resources he is providing for his Department's urban group of programmes following the autumn statement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: The Government are making available an extra £100 million over the next two financial years to regenerate our inner cities and reclaim derelict land. The details for each programme are set out in the tables. These extra resources will ensure we capitalise on the progress we are already making in tackling run-down parts of our urban areas.

The urban development corporations (UDCs) are currently responsible for regenerating nearly 16,000 hectares of underused inner city land. We are proposing additional resources totalling £47 million, bringing the total Government input to over £650 million over the next two years. These will enable the UDCs to make further and faster headway revitalising these areas.

The further resources of £30 million for derelict land grant will bring the total available to over £220 million over the next two years, including over £20 million of forecast receipts ploughed back into the programme. These further resources will accelerate progress in reclaiming land for economic and environmental purposes, with a particular emphasis on badly contaminated land, reflecting the Government's continuing commitment to environmental policies.

The city grant programme, which encourages developers to bring derelict land and buildings back into productive use, will be boosted by an additional £18 million over previously planned levels, bringing the total grant available to £193 million over the next two years.

We have already announced that the eleven city challenge pacemakers will receive a total of £82·5 million each year for up to five years, from urban and housing programmes, to take forward their winning plans. These resources, together with the input by the local authorities and their private, voluntary and community partners, will be directed at achieving the comprehensive and lasting regeneration of those key localities.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Traffic, Donaghadee

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the change in traffic volume on the Newtownards road, Donaghadee near Cottown school over the past 10 years.

Mr. Needham: Figures for the past 10 years are not available. Between 1981 and 1988 traffic volume increased by approximately 21 per cent. from 2,518 vehicles per day to 3,050.

Work Forces

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what percentage of the economically active population of Northern Ireland are Protestant; and what percentages of the work forces of the Bank of Ireland were Protestant in the most recent figures available;

(2) what percentage of the economically active population of Northern Ireland are Protestant; and what percentage of the work force of Allied Irish Banks Plc were Protestant in the last available survey;

(3) what percentage of the economically active population is Protestant; and what percentage of the work force in the public sector is Protestant.

Mr. Needham: It is estimated from the 1990 labour force survey[1] that 60 per cent of the economically active population in Northern Ireland are Protestant.

The Fair Employment Commission's report "A Profile of the Workforce in Northern Ireland: A Summary of the 1990 Monitoring Returns" published in April this year, indicates that 65 per cent of the public sector work force are Protestant.

A report by the Fair Employment Agency published in March 1986 indicated that 42 per cent of the workforce of the Bank of Ireland and 28 per cent of that of Allied Irish Banks were Protestant. More recent information derived from statutory monitoring returns has not yet been published by the FEC.

[1] The labour force survey is based on a random sample of approximately 1 per cent of domestic properties and estimates produced from it are subject to sampling error.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of the economically active population within the area of the Eastern health and social services board are Protestant; and what percentage of the board's work force are Protestant.

Mr. Hanley: It is estimated from the 1990 labour force survey[1] that 68 per cent. of the economically active population within the area of the Eastern health and social services board is Protestant.

The board has indicated that at 1 January 1991 54 per cent. of its work force was Protestant.

[1] The labour force survey is based on a random sample of approximately 1 per cent. of domestic properties and estimates produced from it are subject to sampling error.

Milk Marketing Board

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the monopoly powers of the Northern Ireland Milk Marketing Board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Under Community law the United Kingdom is authorised to grant the milk marketing boards the exclusive right to buy from producers in their area the milk which they produce and market without processing, provided it satisfies certain minimum requirements. This right is coupled with an obligation on the boards to purchase the milk in question.

CRISP Programme

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much public money has been committed to the CRISP—community regeneration initiative special project—programme and to urban development grants; and how much money from other sources is committed to those programmes.

Mr. Hanley: Public expenditure under the urban development grant scheme is shown in the following table:

Urban development grant

	£ million
1982-83	Nil
1983-84	1·055
1984-85	1·595
1985-86	3·789
1986-87	8·009
1987-88	13·443
1988-89	9·424
1989-90	5·845
1990-91	6·499
1991-92	[1]8·300

[1] Estimate.

No funds from any other source have been committed to this scheme. The Government have allocated £8 million to the CRISP programme which, in addition, receives funding from the International Fund for Ireland. The international fund also provides finance for the urban development programme in towns outside Belfast and Londonderry.

I have asked the chairman of the fund to write to the hon. Gentleman and will place a copy of his letter in the Library.

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland under what authority public money has been committed to urban development grant and CRISP—community regeneration initiative special project—programme.

Mr. Needham: The Social Need (Northern Ireland) Order 1986.

Fair Employment

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many consultants have been appointed by the Fair Employment Commission to advise small firms on the implementation of fair employment practices; and if he will publish their names and addresses.

Mr. Needham: This is a matter for the Fair Employment Commission. I understand from the chairman that 76 consultants have been appointed and I have asked him to write to the right hon. Gentleman. A copy of the letter will be placed in the Library.

Low Fat Milk

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether it is intended to retain low fat milk within the milk marketing scheme operated by the Northern Ireland Milk Marketing Board.

Mr. Hanley: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the reply which my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food gave to the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) on 6 November at columns 165-66.

Road Deaths

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons have been killed in road accidents in Northern Ireland in each of the past five years; how many road accident deaths in Northern Ireland have been associated with excess alcohol consumption; how many due solely to exceeding the speed limit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is as follows:

	1986	1987	1988	1989	1990
Total killed in road accidents	236	214	178	181	185
Alcohol-associated road deaths[1]	48	48	27	41	53
Road deaths due to excessive speed[2]	52	63	51	53	35

[1] These figures include both drivers and pedestrians killed with alcohol in their blood.

[2] It is not possible to say how many road deaths in Northern Ireland were due solely to exceeding the speed limit, the figures given refer to deaths caused by excessive speed for the road traffic or weather conditions.

Schools

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many schools in Northern Ireland have applied for local management of schools; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Schools in Northern Ireland do not apply for local management of schools. From 1 April 1991, all controlled and maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools but excluding special schools have been funded on the basis of a formula. All secondary schools and colleges of further education have fully delegated budgets.

Inter-party Talks

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for what reason the Conservative party in Northern Ireland has been excluded from the inter-party talks on the future government of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Brooke: The Conservative party in Northern Ireland is no different from the Conservative party nationally. The Conservative party nationally has been represented by my hon. Friend the Minister of State and myself.

RNIB Needs Survey

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what consideration he has given to the report "Blind and Partially Sighted Adults in Britain—The RNIB Needs Survey"; what action he will be taking in relation to its findings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Although the report was based on a survey confined to Great Britain, its findings will be given careful consideration by Northern Ireland Departments and appropriate lessons drawn.

Security Forces (Live Rounds)

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many live rounds have been fired by the security forces since 1970.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 7 November 1991]: I understand that army records show that approximately 150,800 rounds have been fired by the police and army since 1970.

Plastic Bullets

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people have died as a result of the use of plastic bullets since 1970.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 7 November 1991]: Since 1970, 14 people have died as a result of being struck by plastic baton rounds, a further two people have also died as a result of being struck by rubber rounds, the use of which was phased out in 1975.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Safety

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now make it his policy to publish details of the membership of the nuclear-powered warships safety committee.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

Perisher Exercise

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy not to proceed with the Perisher exercise in the Firth of Clyde later this month.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I will write to the hon. Member.

Indonesia

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met representatives of the Indonesian Government; and what was the purpose of that meeting.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State last met representatives of the Indonesian Government when he visited that country in September. A wide range of issues of mutual interest was discussed.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Income Support

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many individuals came off income support because last year's social security uprating took the standard retirement pension above the income support level.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 1 May 1991 at column 249. The latest available information gives us no reason to change the estimate then given.

Benefits

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the number of unemployed claimants and lone parents on supplementary benefit or income support receiving financial help with mortgage interest each year since 1979; and what each of these numbers was as a percentage of total unemployed claimants and of total lone parents.

Miss Widdecombe: Estimates are given in the table.

Supplementary benefit/Income support

(1) No Enquiry was undertaken in 1985.
(2) Figures for numbers of claimants are rounded to the nearest 1,000.
(3) Figures from 1983 onwards are not comparable with earlier figures because Enquiry data was collected on a different basis.
(4) Supplementary benefit was replaced by income support in 1988.
(5) No estimate of the number of lone parents is available for 1990.

Child Benefit

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what administrative costs are expected as a result of the introduction of a higher amount of child benefit for the oldest child.

Mr. Jack: The administration of child benefit is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and copies will be placed in the Library and the Public Information Office.

Pensioners' Savings

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what pensioners' average real income from savings was (a) in 1979 and (b) in the most recent year for which figures are available; and if he will estimate the figure for 1992;

(2) what proportion of newly-retired pensioners had income from savings, other than their second or more pension, at retirement in (a) 1979 and (b) the most recent year for which figures are available; and if he will estimate the figure for 1992;

(3) what proportion of newly-retired pensioners had two or more pensions at retirement in (a) 1979 and (b) the most recent year for which figures are available; and if he will estimate the figure for 1992.

Miss Widdecombe: The average real income of single pensioners and pensioner couples from savings is estimated at £9·50 per week in 1979 and £19·90 in 1988 (both figures are at 1988 prices).

In 1979, 68 per cent. of newly-retired single pensioners and pensioner couples received income from savings, the corresponding figure for 1988 was 78 per cent.

In 1979, 50 per cent. of newly-retired pensioners and pensioner couples received income from both state benefits and an occupational pension; the corresponding figure for 1988 was 62 per cent.

Source: Family Expenditure Survey.

Note: Newly-retired pensioners are defined as single women aged 60-64, single men aged 65-69 and couples in which the man is aged 65-69. Single pensioners are defined as being aged 60 or over for women and 65 or over for men; pensioner couples are those where the man is aged 65 or over. No estimates of these figures are available for 1992.

Policies

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what policies he is bringing forward in the current parliamentary session to develop and enhance the social security system.

Mr. Jack: We intend to continue this Government's programme of developing the social security system in line with our priorities and of ensuring that it is effectively delivered.

In addition to the measures that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced to the House on 21 October, we expect to publish a discussion paper on the options for the equalisation of state pension age; to establish a new child support unit and to introduce, after the consultation now under way, detailed regulations under the Child Support Act passed in the last Session; to bring into operation the two new benefits for disabled people; to implement the changes to income-related benefits already announced which will help families with children, and particularly lone parents, to work if they wish to do so; to implement the citizens charter and, in particular, to introduce a charter for the customers of the Benefits Agency; and to improve further the quality and effectiveness of the delivery of services to customers through the development of the Department's executive agencies.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will make a statement about the entitlement to mobility allowance payments of claimants where cases fall within the scope of the European Court of Justice judgment in respect of Mr. R. Newton.

Mr. Scott: The effect of this judgment is that mobility allowance beneficiaries falling within its scope will continue to receive payment even though they have taken up residence in another European Community member state. The independent adjudicating authorities are already dealing with such cases in this way.

Income Support

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, further to his answer of 5 November, Official Report, column 93, on what date he will (a) issue a circular to local authorities about notifying those newly eligible for income support as a result of the uprating statement and (b) announce the results of his consideration of further steps.

Miss Widdecombe: The circular was issued to local authorities on 8 November. Any announcement about other steps, which will be taken in good time for the uprating, will be made as and when appropriate.

Local Offices

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many benefit claim offices in Nottingham have been closed to the public at any time during the past year during official opening hours because they were becoming overcrowded or because staff were over-pressed; which offices closed; and for how many days.

Miss Widdecombe: No Nottingham offices have closed during the last year because they were becoming overcrowded or because staff were over-pressed.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will set out, for each of his Department's offices in the country, the number of hours in each month of the last year that they were closed during normal daily opening hours of 9 am to 5.30 pm.

Miss Widdecombe: I understand from Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency that the information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Disability

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the moneys available from the European Community for helping people with disabilities in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) other member states.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is not held centrally. However, according to information received from the European Commission the total figures are as follows:

Specific measures for disabled people

HELIOS (1988-1991) 33 million ecu over 4 years
TIDE (1992-1994) 100 million ecu over 3 years
HORIZON (1991-1993) 180 million ecu over 3 years

Other Community programmes, actions and initiatives focusing on disabled people

European Social Fund (ESF)
European Regional Development Fund (ERDF)

(These form part of the Structural Funds for which a total of 2,607 million ecu were allocated for 1989-1993—350 million ecu in respect of the United Kingdom).

ERASMUS (1990-1992) 100 million ecu over 3 years
LINGUA (1989-1993) 200 million ecu over 5 years
ARION (1990-1991) 420 thousand ecu over 2 years
Youth for Europe (1988-1991) 18·5 million ecu over 4 years.

In most cases it is not possible to say how much of the sums involved were paid to recipients in the United Kingdom or in any other member state, payments being dependent on applications received or projects undertaken.

Departmental Circulars

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the circulars issued by his Department since 1 January 1991 (a) to local authorities and (b) to other organisations or individuals.

Miss Widdecombe: Housing benefit and community charge benefit circulars issued by the Department to local authorities are available in the Library. The other information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

RNIB Needs Survey

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what consideration he has given to the report "Blind and Partially Sighted Adults in Britain—The RNIB Needs Survey"; what action he will be taking in relation to its findings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I shall be meeting RNIB soon to discuss the implications of the survey.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will be meeting the organisations of and for blind people to respond to the findings of the report "Blind and Partially Sighted Adults in Britain—The RNIB Needs Survey".

Mr. Scott: I have written to the Director General of the RNIB, accepting his invitation to meet to discuss the report. A date has yet to be arranged.

Occupational Deafness

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans there are to include deafness suffered as a result of working in turbine halls of nuclear power stations as an occupational deafness qualifying for industrial injuries disablement benefit.

Mr. Scott: The Industrial Injuries Advisory Council advises the Secretary of State on the prescription of occupations under the industrial injuries scheme. The council issued a report "Occupational Deafness" (Cm. 1245) in October 1990 which recommended certain changes to ease the administrative problems in processing claims for occupational deafness. Some new procedures were introduced in April this year and subject to these being satisfactory further improvements are planned. The results will be monitored and when we are satisfied that the new procedures are working well we can then consider what scope there is for extending the present list of prescribed occupations.

Pensioners

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is the cost of administering the policy of withdrawing pension entitlement from pensioners resident in hospital for six weeks or more;

(2) what is the saving to the national insurance fund of not paying the state pension to persons resident in hospital for more than six weeks;

(3) if he has any plans to change the practice of withdrawing pension entitlement from those resident in hospital for more than six weeks in a year.

Miss Widdecombe: As with most social security benefits, the amount of retirement pension payable is reduced after the beneficiary has been in hospital for more than six weeks. A further reduction is made after 52 weeks.

These arrangements are based on the view that state funds should not make double provision for the same needs. As the national health service provides free maintenance as well as free treatment, it has always been the policy that maintenance benefits, also paid out of state funds, should not continue to be paid in full indefinitely. We have no plans to change this policy.

Information on the total saving to the national insurance fund and the administration costs involved is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Social Fund

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if social fund inspectors' review decisions are binding on local offices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: A determination made by a social fund inspector, under section 34(4)(b) of the Social Security Act 1986, must be implemented by a social fund officer.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish his estimates of (a) the amount included in his departmental budget to cover the 20 per cent. poll tax concessions required from those on income support and (b) the amount to be actually paid in poll tax by all those on income support.

Miss Widdecombe: Income-related benefit levels were adjusted in April 1989 to include help towards the 20 per cent. contribution that beneficiaries have to pay. That help is now an integral part of benefit levels which were uprated in April 1990 and April 1991. The estimated cost of the adjustment for 1991-92 is £580 million for all income-related benefits. These benefit levels will be uprated further from April 1992. The total cost of community charge due to be paid by people on income support in the current year is estimated to be £200 million.
Source: Modelling using data drawn from the 1986/7/8 Family Expenditure Surveys at 1991-92 prices and benefit.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give an estimate of the total amount of poll tax collected in 1990-91 from direct deductions from benefit.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Publicity

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide an up-to-date list of each television advertising campaign carried out, or to be carried out, by his Department during 1991-92, and of each other publicity campaign costing more than £100,000, giving for each (a) the topic, (b) the commencement date, (c) the duration and (d) the advertising, promotional and public relations companies involved.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 5 November 1991]: One television campaign has been carried out by the Department in 1991-92 for family credit. A television campaign explaining the new disability benefits being introduced next April is still at the planning stage. Budget provision exists for a further campaign on family credit but no detailed plans have been made.

The following campaigns will cost more than £100,000:

Topic	Commencement date	Duration
Family credit	2 September 1991	Five weeks
Disability	to be confirmed	to be confirmed

The Department's agency, appointed through COI, is BMP DDB Needham.

The Benefits Agency has carried out no television campaigns, and has no plans to run any publicity campaigns costing more than £100,000 in the period in question.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether his Department has sent unsolicited direct mail as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 5 November 1991]: The Department has not sent out unsolicited direct mail to individuals as part of the distribution of publicity material.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1991-92 and budgets for 1992-93.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 5 November 1991]: For information from 1979-80 to 1980-91, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 25 April 1991 at columns 540-41.

For 1991-92 and 1992-93 the information is as follows:

The total estimated outturn for publicity in 1991-92 is £12·27 million. Of this £4·4 million has been allocated to advertising.

Department of Social Security (other than Benefits Agency) 1991-92

	£ million
Television, radio and press (final allocation between media has not yet been made).	4·4
Other materials	7·87

The estimated provision for the 1992-93 social security publicity budget is £11·51 million. Decisions on media have not yet been made.

Benefits Agency 1991-92

	£ million
Television, radio and newspaper advertising	None planned
Information material (such as leaflets and posters)	4·8

1992-93: bids are currently being formulated and no figures are yet available.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1991-92 and budget for 1992-93.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 5 November 1991]: Functions commonly associated with press and public relations are carried out by the Department's information division and the Benefits Agency information services branch.

For information for the years 1979-91, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 22 May 1991 at column 535.

Discussions on the proposed 1992-93 budgets are not yet complete. The estimated expenditure for 1991-92 is in the tables:

	£ million
Headquarters and agencies other than Benefits Agency
Publicity	12·270
Staff	0·653
Running costs	0·451
Benefits Agency
Publicity	7·829
Staff	1·070
Running costs	0·226

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Indonesia

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what food and health aid is being given to East Timor by Her Majesty's Government in response to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe's standing committee resolution passed in Helsinki on 28 June 1991.

Mrs. Chalker: Her Majesty's Government are currently considering how humanitarian aid might be provided to the people of East Timor.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Priestly Functions

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners, in the last recorded period of 12 months, what total sum was received in respect of each of the following (a) the reading of banns of marriage, (b) wedding services, (c) burial services and (d) any other fees for performance of priestly functions in Church of England churches.

Mr. Alison: It is estimated that fees paid to incumbents and parochial church councils for the year to 31 March 1991 totalled £13 million. Of this total it is estimated that £8·1 million related to statutory church and churchyard parochial fees including those for marriages and funerals, £4·6 million to cemetery and crematorium fees and £0·3 million to surrogate fees. I regret that more detailed information is not held centrally.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Property Purchases

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has to ensure full legal protection for United Kingdom citizens purchasing property elsewhere in the European Community.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Housing policy is a matter for member states, not the Community. A United Kingdom national purchasing property elsewhere in the Community is therefore subject to local legal requirements, in which Her Majesty's Government have no locus to intervene.

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received about United Kingdom residents who have purchased apartments in Los Alisios in Los Caniallos, Tenerife; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Representations on behalf of British nationals who have purchased private property overseas are not recorded by property name.

I have however received a letter dated 17 October 1991 from my hon. Friend, on behalf of a constituent who purchased property at the Los Alisios complex in Los Cristianos, Tenerife. I replied to him on 11 November 1991.

Hong Kong

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs with what countries, other than Vietnam, his Department has discussed the removal of Vietnamese boat people from Hong Kong.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The steering committee set up under the comprehensive plan of action adopted by the 1989 Geneva international conference on Indochinese refugees last met on 30 April 1991. Since then, the British and Hong Kong Governments have discussed the return of screened-out migrants from Hong Kong bilaterally with a number of Governments, and international organisations apart from Vietnam, notably the ASEAN member countries, Japan, Australia, United States, Canada, UNHCR and IOM.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Hong Kong officials have been dismissed for corruption during each of the last three years.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The statistics are as follows:

Year	Dismissal	Compulsory retirement
1 April 1988 to 31 March 1989	11	1
1 April 1989 to 31 March 1990	4	1
1 April 1990 to 31 March 1991	10	0

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if independent observers will be allowed to witness the removal of Vietnamese boat people from Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Independent observers and the media were invited to witness the repatriation of the so-called double-backers from Hong Kong to Vietnam on 8-9 November.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what have been the results to date of discussions by Her Majesty's Government over negotiations with the Argentine Government about their wish to carry out exploration of the seabed around the Falklands Islands to search for oil and minerals; how much revenue this is expected to bring in; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The Argentine Government have recently announced a plan to permit exploration for oil covering a large part of the Argentine mainland and off-shore waters; but they have not proposed to us that they should carry out exploration of the seabed around the Falklands Islands.

Wilton Park

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the level of funding provided by his Department to Wilton Park in each of the past three years; and which other countries provide financial support to the institution.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The net cash funding provided by the FCO was as follows:

1988-89	282,709
1989-90	206,945
1990-91	293,674

No other country provides regular direct financial support for Wilton Park conferences. Governments and institutions in other countries help recruit conference participants and often meet their travel costs and conference fees.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which British hon. Members have participated in Wilton Park conferences in the last two years.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The hon. and right hon. Members who have participated in these conferences are:

1990
Bruce George
Hon. Tim Sainsbury
Rt. Hon. William Waldegrave
Virginia Bottomley
Rt. Hon. David Howell

1991
Joan Lestor
Ted Rowlands
Bruce George

Kashmir

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's position concerning the situation in Kashmir.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Government's position on Kashmir remains as set out in my reply to the Adjournment debate on 25 July at cols. 1359-60.

Indonesia

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to implement an arms embargo in respect of Indonesia in response to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe's standing committee resolution passed in Helsinki on 28 June 1991.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: None. An embargo would be neither appropriate nor effective.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met representatives of the Indonesian Government; and what was the purpose of that meeting.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: On 31 May 1991, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs met the Indonesian Foreign Minister, Mr. Ali Alatas, in the margins of the EC/ASEAN Foreign Ministers meeting in Luxembourg. The purpose of the meeting was to exchange views on matters of regional and international interest.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how long the meeting with Jose Ramos-Horta of the National Council of Maubere Resistance on 7 November lasted; and what items were discussed.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Mr. Ramos-Horta called on officials for about an hour on 7 November when he outlined the current situation in East Timor.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has had regarding the Indonesian occupation of East Timor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We receive frequent representations on the subject of East Timor. We support the efforts of the United Nations Secretary-General to promote a settlement acceptable to all parties.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Indonesian Government regarding attacks by the Indonesian military on East Timorese churches; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We regularly draw the attention of the Indonesian authorities to our concern about reports of human rights abuses in East Timor. We will continue to do so.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what efforts have been made by Her Majesty's Government to secure the implementation of United Nations General Assemby resolution 35/27/1980.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The United Kingdom abstained on resolution 35/27/1980 in the belief that this would best assist the proccess of reconciliation and the search for a diplomatic solution to the East Timor question. The United Kingdom fully supports the United Nations Secretary General's efforts to promote a solution acceptable to both sides and has encouraged Indonesia and Portugal to co-operate to this end.

SCOTLAND

Roads (Spending)

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will outline the forecasts of road traffic growth which he has used to determine the grant received in respect of roads spending by Scottish local authorities.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No account is taken of forecasts of road traffic growth in the grant aided expenditure assessment of road maintenance which is used in the distribution of aggregate external finance to authorities. The assessment (which is agreed with COSLA in the distribution committee of the working party on local government finance) is based primarily on the lane length of non-trunk roads in each authority with a secondary indicator adjustment for estimated traffic volume in prior years.

Rents-to-mortgages Scheme

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the progress of his rents-to-mortgages scheme.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The pilot rent-to-mortgage scheme, open to tenants of Scottish Homes and the new town development corporations in Scotland from October 1989, was extended to tenants of Scottish local authorities from 1 April 1991. Information on sales and applications in process, based on returns to 31 October 1991, is shown in the table. Experience of the pilot scheme to date is encouraging. More than 1,000 tenants have already bought their homes under the scheme or are in the process of doing so. The scheme will continue to be closely monitored.

	Sales	Applications in process

Strathclyde Regional Council

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what financial support his Department has given to Strathclyde regional council in the last five years in respect of (a) capital and (b) revenue expenditure on (i) roads and (ii) public transport, and if he will outline projected support for each of the next three years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Capital allocations for roads and transport are issued as one amount. The total allocations issued to Strathclyde regional council for the last five years and the provisional allocations for the next two years are as follows:

	£ million
1987-88	63·5
1988-89	57·1
1989-90	76·7
1990-91	75·0
1991-92	75·6
[1]1992-93	74·3
[1]1993-94	74·6

[1] Provisional.

No decisions have yet been taken on allocations for 1994-95.

These allocations took account of the overall amounts available nationally and of the detailed expenditure proposals in Strathclyde's transport policies and programmes documents and financial plans.

In addition, capital grant towards expenditure on rail rolling stock contained within those allocations has been paid to Strathclyde as follows:

	£ million
1987-88	0·7
1988-89	1·6
1989-90	17·2
1990-91	8·0
1991-92	2·5

A further £0·6 million is available for 1991-92.

Funding for all aspects of revenue expenditure on both roads and public transport is a matter for the regional council. Central Government support to local authorities through revenue support grant and non-domestic rate income is given on an unhypothecated basis and support for individual services cannot be separately identified.

Raspberry Producers

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of measures introduced by the Government within the last three years to assist Scotland's raspberry producers to offset the effect of Eastern European dumping in EC markets.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Action to prevent low-priced imports of soft fruit from disrupting the Community market is the responsibility of the EC Commission. The United Kingdom Government have taken the lead in the Council of Ministers in calling upon the Commission to exercise its responsibilities in this respect.

As for other sectors of agriculture, soft fruit producers are eligible for aid under general support schemes, not related to the production of a specific commodity. Schemes introduced or revised since 1988 are the farm and conservation grant scheme 1991 (superseding the farm diversification grant scheme 1988 and the EC element of the farm and conservation grant scheme 1989); and a scheme to support investments in marketing and processing which offer lasting economic benefit to producers under Council Regulation (EEC) No. 866/90. In addition, a special scheme was introduced in 1988 to assist raspberry growers to replace plantations of Glen Clova canes with more viable varieties.

The EC Commission is understood to be considering possible structural measures specifically to help the Community soft fruit industry adjust to competition from third countries.

Ferry Services

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of profits made by Caledonian MacBrayne for the Kyle to Kyleakin ferry service in each of the last 15 years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Details of operating deficits and surpluses analysed by area of operation are given in Caledonian MacBrayne's annual report and accounts which are presented annually to Parliament and are available in the Library. For reasons of commercial confidentiality the company does not disclose information about operating deficits and surpluses achieved on specific routes.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what subsidy is paid for the year 1991-92 to Caledonian MacBrayne to operate the Islay ferry service; what specific aspects of this service are in receipt of subsidy; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 11 November 1991]: Under the terms of the undertaking between my right hon. Friend and Caledonian MacBrayne Ltd., deficit subsidy is paid to the company in support of services considered to be necessary to maintain or improve economic or social conditions in the Highlands and Islands. Deficit subsidy is therefore intended to eliminate the overall deficit incurred by the company in operating a network of approved services, and is not related to deficits incurred on specific routes. The company's annual report and accounts, which are presented to Parliament, identify the operating deficit incurred by Caledonian MacBrayne in providing ferry services in different areas, including Islay/Gigha. For reasons of commercial confidentiality, however, the company does not disclose detailed information about profits or losses incurred on individual routes.

RNIB Needs Survey

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration he has given to the report "Blind and Partially Sighted Adults in Britain—The RNIB Needs Survey"; what action he will be taking in relation to its findings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. Friend has not yet received a copy of the report. Once that is to hand, he will consider the implications for blind people in Scotland.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was (a) the number of private beds in NHS hospitals and (b) the number of beds in private hospitals in Scotland for each year since 1 January 1979.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: As at 31 December each year, the number of private beds in NHS hospitals in Scotland was as follows:

	Number
1978	149
1979	114
1980	94
1981	94
1982	105
1983	108
1984	109
1985	110
1986	111
1987	112
1988	113
1989	113
1990	113

Following is the estimated number of beds in private hospitals, excluding nursing homes, as at 31 March each year since 1987:

	Number
1987	334
1988	355
1989	353
1990	376
1991	376

This information, which is based on returns from health boards, was not collected centrally before 1987.

National Health Service Trusts

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central of 6 November, if he will list those moneys apportioned to the allocation provided to health boards for patient care and which was for the purpose of assisting in the preparation and proposals to establish each proposed national health service trust in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is as follows:

Goose Damage, Islay

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all claims for compensation submitted to the Nature Conservancy Council from the Island of Islay for goose damage to land outwith sites of special scientific interest; the sum of each claim; when he expects a decision to be reached; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No claims for compensation have been made. An application for grant was made to the Nature Conservancy Council for Scotland (NCCS) on 11 October 1991 towards the cost of supporting the Greenland populations of barnacle and white fronted geese outwith sites of special scientific interest this winter. The application was made by the secretary of the Islay, Jura, Colonsay and Gigha branch of the National Farmers Union of Scotland on behalf of 60 farmers under section 134 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. In total it amounts to £762,450, including an administrative charge of £99,450. Section 134 empowers NCCS to give financial assistance in respect of expenditure incurred in doing anything which in the opinion of the NCCS is conducive to nature conservation.

The application is being considered by NCCS in the light of their review of the problems for agricultural land outwith the sites of special scientific interest posed by the feeding habits of migratory Greenland geese and of how those problems might best be handled in the shorter and longer term.

Birds of Prey

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many birds of prey were found poisoned (a) in Tayside region and (b) broken down by estate boundary within Tayside region, for 1990-91 and so far in the current year.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 8 November 1991]: The wildlife incident investigation scheme of the Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department received reports of two birds of prey which were found poisoned in Tayside in 1990-91. The site of one of these incidents was identified as part of Dunanean estate. No reports of poisonings have been received in the current year.

Scottish Natural Heritage

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the estimated budget for Scottish Natural Heritage in 1991-93.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 8 November 1991]: My right hon. Friend will shortly announce the resources to be allocated to Scottish Natural Heritage.

Nature Conservancy Council (Compensation Claims)

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many claims are currently pending against the Nature Conservancy Council Scotland under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 for compensation of profit forgone; if he will list the location and landowner concerned in each of these cases; how many involve proposals to afforest sites of special scientific interest; how many cases will be going before the Lands Tribunal; and how much has been budgeted for by Nature Conservancy Council Scotland in 1991-92 to meet such compensation claims.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 8 November 1991]: The information is not held by the Scottish Office Environment Department. I shall ask the Nature Conservancy Council for Scotland to write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total cost to the Nature Conservancy Council, of the recent Lands Tribunal award made to Mr. John Cameron in compensation of profit forgone when interest and legal charges are taken into account.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 8 November 1991]: The total payment to be made to Mr. John Cameron has not yet been determined. I understand from the Nature Conservancy Council for Scotland that Mr. Cameron has yet to submit his claim for legal fees.

Further Education Colleges

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what he estimates to be the costs to the further education colleges under the provisions of the Further and Higher Education (Scotland) Bill of providing for themselves support such as architectural, legal and financial services previously provided by local authorities.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 11 November 1991]: Expenditure by education authorities on administration and support services for further education colleges will be included in the funds transferred to the Secretary of State's budget for funding the colleges. An element for these services will be included in the grant to colleges who will be free to purchase them from the most cost-effective source.

Day-patient Waiting Lists, Lothian

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each specialty, the current day-patient waiting list figures in the Lothian health board area, and the average day-patient waiting times; and indicate for each specialty (a) the number and (b) the percentage awaiting day-patient treatment for (i) over six months, (ii) over 12 months, (iii) over 18 months, (iv) over 24 months and (v) over 36 months.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 11 November 1991]: The information available is contained in the tables. Information on patients waiting over 18 months and over 36 months is not at present collected centrally.

Drinking Water

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those water sources which have yet to be chemically dosed to reduce absorption of lead into drinking water supplies; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 11 November 1991]: There are over 600 water treatment works in Scotland, of which about two-thirds do not have chemical dosing which could affect levels of lead in tap water. Not all supplies require such dosing and those currently without it are mainly small supplies or are from borehole sources. Around 90 per cent. of the population are served by supplies which do not receive this form of treatment.

Only one scheme designed to meet the requirements of the EC Drinking Water Directive as regards lead remains to be completed next year; this is part of a major treatment works reconstruction. The Water Supply (Water Quality) (Scotland) Regulations 1990 set a stricter standard for lead than the directive and all water authorities are now assessing their water supply zones to identify any where this standard may be exceeded. These assessments will determine zones in which further treatment will be considered.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Assisted Places

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any proposals to phase out the assisted places scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: There are no plans to phase out the assisted places scheme. The scheme remains a key part of this Government's policy to provide wider choice in education for parents and we are committed to it.

Adult Education

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what increase or decrease in student numbers he forecasts for non-vocational adult education in the next five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My Department does not make forecasts on the basis requested. However, we anticipate a steady increase over the next five years in the number of full-time equivalent students studying at further education colleges.

Sport

Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on funding for sport.

Mr. Atkins: Local authority gross revenue spending in England and Wales on sport and recreation has risen from £720 million in 1985-86 to £1,028 million in 1989-90, the latest available figure.

Subject to the approval of Parliament, the Sports Council's grant in aid next year will be £48·7 million, over £2 million up on this year.

The newly established Foundation for Sport and the Arts will draw about £20 million a year from the further cut of 2·5 per cent. in pool betting duty included in this year's Finance Act, and about £40 million a year from the pools themselves. Some two-thirds will be used for athletic sports or athletic games. The Football Trust has also benefited from a cut in the pool betting duty by an additional £20 million since 1990.

Private sector sponsors provide some £200 million per annum for sport.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the relocation of the Sports Council to Nottingham.

Mr. Atkins: Relocation is a matter for the Sports Council. I understand that at present it has no plans to relocate its headquarters out of London.

Ms Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to publish his Ministry's review of sport.

Mr. Atkins: When it is completed.

Further and Higher Education

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any new proposals to increase the number of those participating in further and higher education courses.

Mr. Eggar: Participation in further and higher education is at record levels. Our education reforms of the past few years and the new measures announced in the recent White Papers will promote continuing expansion through the 1990s and beyond. This House can play a major part in that expansion by supporting the Further and Higher Education Bill, which was introduced in another place on 4 November.

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how his Department is ensuring that sixth-form colleges, schools and higher education colleges are receiving sufficient funds to cope with the number of students aged over 16 years.

Mr. Eggar: In fixing education's share of each year's local authority grant settlement, the Government take account of a range of new developments and the scope for savings. One of those developments is the projected national trend, based on the latest data available at the time, in the number of students aged over 16 in schools and colleges.

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Grylls: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the operation of the city technology college programme.

Mr. Eggar: The CTC programme is forging ahead. We now have thirteen CTCs open and running with a further two due to open in the next two years. Our expenditure plans provide for a start to be made on extending the benefits of the programme more widely through the education service.

Education Funding (Nottinghamshire)

19. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science by how much funding towards education in Nottinghamshire provided by the Government has increased since 1979.

Mr. Fallon: Net recurrent spending on education in Nottinghamshire increased from some £138 million in 1979-80 to some £338 million in 1989-90, the latest year for which information on actual spending is available. That represents a real terms increase of some 22 per cent. These figures exclude spending on Nottingham Polytechnic, which transferred to the PCFC sector in 1989.

Parental Choice

21. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the progress of the Government's policies for parental choice in central London.

Mr. Fallon: Parents in central London—like parents everywhere else in the country—have had the right since 1980 to choose which school their child should attend—provided places are available. More recently they have benefited from both the introduction of more open enrolment and the option of pursuing grant-maintained status for their children's school. And they will benefit in the same way as other parents from the proposals in our parents charter.

Grant-maintained Schools

23. Mr. Barry Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the average number of applications for places at grant-maintained schools in the current and in the last year.

Mr. Eggar: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, what changes he is planning to make in the funding of grant-maintained schools.

Mr. Eggar: We are currently consulting about proposed changes for 1992-93, including the calculation of the amount of grant which grant-maintained schools receive in recompense for the money which LEAs spend centrally on items such as administration.

School Buildings

Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much was spent on school buildings in 1981 and at the present time; and what the change is in real terms.

Mr. Fallon: Gross capital expenditure on local authority, voluntary, and grant-maintained schools in 1989-90 is some £755 million which compares with expenditure of £391 million in 1980-81—an increase in real terms of some 14 per cent. Over the same period capital expenditure per pupil has risen from £49 to £112—a 34 per cent. rise in real terms. Between 1980-81 and 1989-90 recurrent spending on repairs and maintenance rose by some 25 per cent. per pupil in real terms.

SERC Chairman

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will dismiss the chairman of SERC.

Mr. Alan Howarth: No.

Education Spending and Exam Results

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the relationship between spending by local education authorities and examination results.

Mr. Fallon: The available data show no direct relationship between spending by local education authorities and the examination results their pupils achieve. Appropriate spending levels are bound to be affected to some extent by each authority's circumstances; some authorities obtain good results at much lower cost than others.

NUT (Advertising Campaign)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the advertising campaign by the National Union of Teachers.

Mr. Fallon: None.

Special Needs Education

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what criteria are used to allocate funds for children with disadvantages and special needs in primary schools in Liverpool.

Mr. Fallon: It is for Liverpool local education authority to decide what criteria to use in its local management of schools formula to allocate funds to schools.

Liverpool uses a social disadvantage factor based on the number of pupils entitled to free school meals, and a special needs factor based on a system of monitoring reading standards at ages seven and 11. The tests currently used to assess reading standards are the primary reading test for seven-year-olds, and Young's Cloze procedure for 11-year-olds.

Local Management of Schools

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report in descending order the proportion of each English shire county's education budget which is allocated to schools under the local management of schools scheme.

Mr. Eggar: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) on 14 October at columns 67-73.

Capital Funding

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in tabular form the amount of the capital bids for (a) county and voluntary controlled schools, (b) voluntary aided schools and (c) further education, for each local education authority that has submitted its application for 1992-93.

Mr. Eggar: The information requested is set out in the table.

Notes:

1. The figures should be treated with caution. They represent the initial bids made by local education authorities and take no account of subsequent amendments to those bids.
2. All figures are in thousands.
3. The above information includes bids for FE major building projects which, for procedural reasons, it is not possible to consider. Time constraints preclude their deletion at the time of writing.
4. The information does not include bids for FE major building projects which LEAs have started without Departmental approval.
5. The bids for capital allocations at voluntary aided (VA) and special agreement (SA) schools do not include bids for Minor Improvement Projects. Grants for minor works will be allocated to LEAs by formula.
6. VA and SA schools bids marked "*" include an estimate for committed projects (i.e., based on 1991-92 submissions) since LEA bids for such expenditure have not yet been received.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a list for each local authority comparing the capital allocations for the education service in 1989-90 with the latest available outturn information.

Mr. Eggar: The table shows capital allocations to each local education authority in 1989-90, together with final outturn expenditure on education capital in that year.

Nuclear Structure Facility

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the increase in science spending announced in the autumn statement will allow the continuation of the nuclear structure facility beyond its intended closure date.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The research councils will be considering any changes to their forward programmes when the increases to the science budget announced in the autumn statement have been allocated. Mr right hon. and learned Friend has invited the views of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils on this allocation and he will be making a statement in due course.

I understand that the Science and Engineering Research Council has yet to decide the precise date during 1992-93 when the nuclear structure facility would close.

Teacher Vacancies

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has received the Association of London Authorities' survey on teacher vacancies in London.

Mr. Fallon: Yes, we were particularly pleased to note the improvements reported in teacher vacancies. The association found that London boroughs had succeeded in filling all but a handful of vacancies for the new school year. Our own survey came to much the same conclusion.

Teacher Training

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what were the total numbers of (a) men and (b) women commencing teacher training courses in each year from 1988 to the present year.

Mr. Eggar: The figures requested are as follows:

NATIONAL FINANCE

Manufactures

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the proportion of imported (i) semi-manufactures, (ii) finished intermediate and (iii) finished capital good consumed/used by United Kingdom manufacturers in 1970, 1979, 1984 and 1989.

Mr. Mellor: No estimates are available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing the Japanese and United Kingdom figures for the increase in consumer prices and export unit values for manufactures between 1979 and 1990 together with those of France, Germany, Italy and the USA.

Mr. Mellor The information requested can be obtained from data published in "OECD, Main Economic Indicators" for consumer prices, and in "Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics", its annual supplement and "International Financial Statistics" for export unit values, copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the current visible and invisible import content of United Kingdom manufactures, excluding oil, relative to 1979 and 1970.

Mr. Mellor: No current estimates exist, the latest available analysis is for 1985. The CSO's published input-output tables for that year and the two earlier years[1] show the imported and domestic content of manufactures. These Publications are available in the Library.

[1] "Input-Output Tables for the United Kingdom, 1985" table four, "Input-Output Tables for the United Kingdom, 1979" table K, "Input-Output Tables for the United Kingdom, 1970" table K.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of United Kingdom imports of manufactures are re-exported (i) in the same form and (ii) after further processing in the United Kingdom: and what the corresponding figures were in 1970, 1979 and 1984.

Mr. Mellor: No estimates are available.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing the figures for the volume of gross domestic product and of United Kingdom exports of goods and services as shown in tables 25 and 29 of part 6 of the OECD National Accounts 1960-1989, less oil and gas.

Mr. Mellor: The estimates given in tables 25 and 29 of the OECD: publication cannot be readily adapted to remove oil and gas. Series can, however, be derived from data available here in the UK.

The volume of exports of oil and oil products at 1985 prices is available from 1983 on the Central Statistical Office's database as series BOWX and exports of goods and services at 1985 prices is available as series DJCV. From these series it is possible to calculate an index of goods and services less oil on UK definitions.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing for EC countries, the United States of America and Japan for 1970 to 1973, 1973 to 1979, 1979 to 1989 and 1985 to 1989, the percentage increase in (i) gross domestic product less oil and gas, (ii) manufacturing output, (iii) real incomes as well as the increase in the number of, (iv) employed and (v) unemployed persons, together with the balance of trade in manufactures as a percentage of gross domestic product together with a table showing the increase in gross domestic product and manufacturing output in per capita terms.

Mr. Mellor: Such information as is readily available on comparable bases can be obtained from the following international publications:

(i) gross domestic product less oil and gas

Table R1 in "National Accounts ESA Aggregates 1970-1989 Theme 2 Series C" published by Eurostat gives annual growth rates for gross domestic product at market prices. Data on a comparable basis are not available for gross domestic product excluding oil and gas;

(ii) manufacturing output

Page 16 of the US Department of Labour publication "International comparisons of manufacturing productivity and unit labour cost trends 1990".

(iii) real incomes

Information on compensation of employees which includes all payments in cash and in kind made by employers in remuneration for the work done by their employees is given in Table J in "National Accounts ESA Aggregates 1970-1989 Theme 2 Series C" published by Eurostat;

(iv) employment

Information on occupied population is given in Table O in "National Accounts ESA Aggregates 1970-1989 Theme 2 Series C" published by Eurostat;

(v) unemployed persons

Separate tables are given for each country in "Main Economic Indicators Historical Statistics 1969-1988" published by OECD. Later data are available in the monthly "Main Economic Indicators" also published by OECD;

(vi) balance of trade in manufactures as a percentage of gross domestic product

The balance of trade in manufactures can be calculated from data in "Foreign Trade by Commodities: Series C" published by OECD and gross domestic product can be obtained from Table 1 for each country in "National Accounts ESA Aggregates 1970-1989 Theme 2 Series C" published by Eurostat;

(vii) gross domestic product per capita

Information on gross domestic product at market prices per head of total population can be found in Table B2 in "National Accounts ESA Aggregates 1979-1989 Theme 2 Series C" published by Eurostat;

(viii) manufacturing output per head

Page 15 of the US Department of Labour publication "International comparisons of manufacturing productivity and unit labour cost trends 1990".

Copies of all these publications are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the changes made since October 1989 in the way trade figures have been collected, analysed or presented.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 7 November 1991]: Following are the main changes:

(a) Adjustments to statistics of oil exports. Since October 1989 better methods have been used to measure direct exports of crude oil from offshore fields, including adjustments for any such trade reported late to Customs and Excise.

(b) Improved seasonal adjustments. Since January 1990 seasonal factors for the current month and the preceding month have been estimated afresh each month using all the latest available information. This replaced the previous method of calculating factors at the beginning of each year for all of the following twelve months.

(c) Progressive development of detailed methodology. Various small refinements have been made to the statistics, such as more elaborate adjustments for differences in the length of a month and improved deflators for some high-value commodities.

Farms

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing the increase in incomes of farmers in terms of constant prices in 1979 and in the latest available year compared with the average of 1967 to 1971 together with the increase in the direct and indirect cost of agricultural support to the consumer/taxpayer.

Mr. Mellor: The table shows United Kingdom aggregate farm income, and public expenditure in support of agriculture in the United Kingdom. Agricultural market support through the CAP means that EC consumers pay more for their food than they would do in a free market. The estimated cost to United Kingdom consumer, based on work by the OECD, is given in the table. All figures are in constant 1985 prices.

Year	Farm income (£million)	Public expenditure (£million)	Estimated consumer cost (£million)
[1]1967-71	2,555	1,481	nil
1979	1,956	1,130	3,000
1989	1,242	1,033	4,600
[2]1990	972	1,469	5,400

Notes:

[1] Average.

[2] Forecast.

Figures for public expenditure relate to the financial year beginning in the year shown.

Consumer cost is based on OECD estimates of the cost to EC consumers scaled down to relect the United Kingdom share of consumption.

Aggregate farm income is defined in chapter 6 of Agriculture in the United Kingdom 1990, HMSO, 1991.

Public expenditure in support of agriculture is defined in chapter 9 of Agriculture in the United Kingdom 1990. It includes the cost of market support reimbursed by the EC; and excludes indirect support for agriculture such as free or subsidised advisory services and research and development.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing for the United Kingdom, Germany, France, Italy, the United States of America and Japan for each year since 1970 the percentage, to one place of decimals, of gross domestic product invested in manufacturing industry, together with the amount invested in terms of dollars per person employed in manufacturing at current prices and exchange rates.

Mr. Mellor: The latest readily available information in respect of gross fixed capital formation by the manufacturing industry, of gross domestic product at current prices in national currencies and of the numbers employed in the manufacturing industries can be obtained from tables 3,1 and 15 respectively for most of these countries in "National Accounts Detailed Tables Volume II 1976-1988" published by the OECD. Exchange rates to convert the national currencies into dollars are given in table 3 in the Appendix to "National Accounts Main Aggregates Volume I 1960-1988" also published by OECD.

Copies of these publications are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table for each quarter since 1967 of indices of (a) the wholesale price of materials and fuels purchased by manufacturing industry other than food, drink and tobacco, (b) the wholesale price of home sales of manufacturing industry other than food, drink and tobacco and (c) the unit value of imports of basic materials, as defined in the overseas trade statistics, with 1975 as 100.

Mr. Mellor: I have placed tables showing the first two series in the Library of the House. Unit value indices for recent years are not available on a 1975 base but the indices for imports of basic materials on a 1985 base can be found in table C15 of the "Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics" and its annual supplement, available from the Library of the House, or on the Central Statistical Office database which may be accessed through the Library. No information is available for years prior to 1970.

Economic Policies

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the long-term objective of the Government's economic policies.

Mr. Maples: The Government's central objective is to create the basis for improved living standards and public services by promoting sustainable, non-inflationary economic growth.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will bring up to date the information given in his written answer of 20 February 1990, Official Report, column 696, concerning the amount of mortgage interest payable each year as a percentage of (a) disposable income and (b) consumers' expenditure; and if he will (c) add figures (i) for the percentage of gross domestic product and (ii) the years 1970-78.

Mr. Mellor: The latest estimates are as follows:

Mortgage interest payable as a percentage of

	Personal disposable income (a)	Consumers' expenditure (b)	Gross domestic product (c)
1970	2·6	2·8	2·1
1971	2·7	2·9	2·1

[1]1990	10·6	11·7	8·6

[1] Figures affected by introduction of the community charge in England and Wales.

In the first half of 1991 mortgage interest accounted for 10·0 per cent. of disposable income and for 11·5 per cent. of consumers' expenditure. It is not possible to give the corresponding percentage of GDP because the interest figures are not available in seasonally adjusted form whereas money GDP exists as a seasonally adjusted series only.

Sports Council

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions Her Majesty's Treasury has had with the Sports Council about funding the relocation of the Sports Council and associated jobs to Nottingham; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has not discussed this question with the Sports Council.

EC Budget

Mr. Butler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the reasons why United Kingdom contributions to the EC budget are expected to increase from £0·9 billion in 1991-92 to £2·2 billion in 1992-93.

Mr. Maude: The autumn statement provided a forecast of the UK's net payments to EC institutions of £0·9 billion in 1991-92 and £2·5 billion in 1992-93. The uneven profile results from the timing of adjustments to UK contributions, mainly because contributions are paid on the basis of agreed estimates and adjusted in the light of outturn, and from subsequent correction to the UK's abatement. The net contribution in 1991-92 is unusually low as the result of a refund in 1991 of contributions overpaid in 1990 and higher than usual abatement in 1991, reflecting adjustments paid in 1990 to make good underpayments in the previous year.

VAT

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average penalty imposed in Yorkshire on those who submit value added tax returns late by (a) one week, (b) two weeks, (c) three weeks and (d) four weeks.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Customs do not maintain statistics for individual counties or regions. The penalties imposed for late submission or payment of VAT returns do not vary with the length of the period between due date and receipt by Customs. Nationwide, the average penalty imposed on defaulting traders (including those who may have received more than one penalty) over the current and preceding financial year is:

	Average penalty £
Financial year ending 31 March 1989	266.24
Financial year ending 31 March 1990	375.42
Financial year ending 31 March 1991	429.39
1 April 1991 to 30 September 1991	441.41

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many appeals against penalties imposed for incorrect and late payment of value added tax have been upheld in the current year, to date, by value added tax tribunals in Yorkshire.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Customs do not maintain statistics for individual counties or regions. Nationwide in the current calendar year to 31 October a total of 50 appeals were upheld or partly upheld against penalties for incorrect declaration of value added tax. For the same period, the total number of appeals upheld or partly upheld against penalties for late payment of value added tax is 94.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received calling for the time required to elapse form date of supply for bad debt to obtain value added tax relief to be reduced from 24 months to 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Between March 1990 and March 1991 about 150 representations were received seeking a reduction in the two-year waiting period for bad debt relief,which was part of the comprehensive scheme for bad debt relief enacted in the Finance Act 1990. In response, my right hon. Friend announced in his Budget statement that the waiting period would be halved to one year.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will empower value added tax tribunals to take mitigating circumstances into account when determining penalties on incorrect and late value added tax returns.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Consideration of this matter is currently forming part of the thorough review of value added tax penalties announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget statement. As my right hon. Friend said, the aim is to bring forward proposals for any changes required to the penalty regime in the 1992 Finance Bill.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the value added tax threshold in the United Kingdom and in each of the other EC countries.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The VAT registration threshold in the United Kingdom is £35,000 annual turnover.

Belgium, Spain and Italy have no minimum VAT registration threshold.

For other member states of the EC the thresholds are as follows:

Threshold based on annual turnover

Denmark

EC (National Incomes)

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the national income, 3 per cent. of that figure and the budget deficit of each member state in the EC indicating the differences in accounting treatment where relevant.

Mr. Maples: Following is the information, for the latest year[1] available:

	GDP	3 per cent. of GDP	[2]GGFD
UK (£ billion)	550·6	16·5	3·6

[1] Latest year is 1989 except for UK (1990); Spain (1988); Ireland (1987); Luxembourg and Portugal (1986).

[2] General government financial deficit, positive number indicates government borrowing.

The Dutch presidency text defines the budget deficit as "the net balance to be financed on a cash basis". However, data for this concept are available. Data for general Government financial deficits are not available for most countries, and are therefore generally used to make international comparisons of budget deficits. Most countries, however, focus on other aggregates in their national budgets. The main differences between the net balance to be financed on a cash basis and the GGFD are that the former is measured on a cash basis, the latter on an accruals basis; and the GGFD excludes privatisation proceeds.

Figures for the United Kingdom are based on the national accounts. Figures for other countries are standardised to conform to the United Nations system of national accounts. No figures are available for the general Government financial deficit of Greece. More recent data and forecasts of Government deficits of member states are published by the European Commission in "European Economy", Supplement A, May 1991.

Employees' Benefits (Taxation)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any proposals to modify the restrictive rules in section 80 of the Finance Act 1988 concerning the tax charge on special benefits for employees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude Where employees or directors acquire shares as a result of their employment, and because of their ownership of those shares they subsequently receive a "special benefit", that "special benefit" is currently taxable in some circumstances. For example, such "special benefit" might flow from an entitlement to subscribe to a "rights" issue, or from a right to shareholder priority in a public offer. The Government do not think it is right to charge tax on a benefit that is available to all or substantially all shareholders, where a majority of the shares in relation to which the benefit is actually received are held otherwise than by people who acquired them as employees. We therefore propose that exemption from the charge should apply to any benefit received in these circumstances on or after today. Legislation to this effect, which will include some minor consequential changes, will be introduced in the Finance Bill 1992.

Employees' Expenses and Benefits

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much overtime has been agreed in the Inland Revenue to clear the outstanding P11D forms; and when he expects this work to be up to date.

Mr. Maude: The bulk of P11D forms are received in the first part of the tax year and dealt with in a targeted programme finishing in December. That programme is proceeding to target. No overtime has been centrally allocated to this specific task. However, the Inland Revenue's regional controllers can use part of their budgets for overtime, and some work on P11D forms may have been done during locally arranged overtime.

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many P11D forms on hand on 13 June 1991 had been outstanding for more than three months.

Mr. Maude: None was reported as having been outstanding for more than three months.

Deep Gain Securities

Mr Hind: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he plans to change the tax treatment of deep gain securities.

Mr. Maude: The deep gain legislation provides a tax regime for bonds which are issued at a discount to par but which cannot be taxed according to the deep discount rules. The deep gain rules charge all of an investor's return to income tax. However, it has recently been brought to our attention that many ordinary bonds, carrying a full coupon, and issued at a small discount to par, but not containing the characteristics of true deep gain securities are, in strictness, so classified if they contain standard event of default or event risk clauses.

We have therefore decided to restore the position to what everyone previously believed it to be: bonds already in issue which are deep gain securities solely by virtue of the inclusion of standard event of default or event risk clauses will be treated as not being deep gain securities. We intend to introduce legislation in the next Finance Bill to take these bonds out of the deep gains legislation.

In the meantime, and with my agreement, the Inland Revenue will not treat securities issued on or before 12 November 1991 as deep gain securities where they fall to be so treated only by reason of a redemption which may be made before maturity, and that redemption is —outside the scope of paragraph 1(3A), Schedule 11, Finance Act 1989, or of paragraph 2(13) of that Schedule, as the case may be; and —occasioned by the happening of an event (other than the exercise of a put option) prescribed in the terms of issue of the security as an event on the happening of which the security will or may be redeemed.

This concession may not be applied if the terms of the security as respects the events occasioning such redemptions before maturity are materially amended after 12 November 1991.

For tranche issues, securities issued after 12 November 1991 will be treated as not being deep gain securities if they fall to be so treated only by reason of a redemption which may be made before maturity if they are issued under the same prospectus as a security described above or on terms such as to make them fungible, either immediately or after the first payment of interest in respect of the security, with a security described above.

The Government also intend to set in place a new tax regime for bonds issued after today. The precise terms of the legislation covering these bonds will depend on the outcome of consultations which the Inland Revenue will be undertaking with interested parties. But the Government's intention is that securities issued after today will not fall to be treated as deep gain securities only by reason of a redemption which may be made before maturity in pursuance of a term of issue of the security and —the term provides that the security will or may be redeemed on the happening, before maturity, of an event which is not at the time of issue certain or likely to occur;

—if the security provides for early redemption on the happening of more than one such event, it is not at the time of issue certain or likely that any one or more of them will occur;

—the term is such as to protect the holders of the security against the consequences of the event prescribed; and —a reduction in tax liability is not a main benefit to be expected from the inclusion of the term and in particular, is not an arrangement, or part of an arrangement to facilitate early redemption of the security.

The Government propose that this amendment should not operate to remove any transfer or redemption of a security from the charge on deep gains when —the security would be a deep gain security but for the proposals described above;

—the security is redeemed before maturity on the happening of an event described above; and —the security is held on redemption by a person connected with the issuer, or as the case may be the transfer is by such a person within 12 months before the redemption.

In the meantime, in anticipation of such legislation, and with my agreement, the Inland Revenue will, by concession, not enforce liabilities in respect of transactions in securities which are strictly deep gain securities under current law, but would not be were legislation on these lines in effect.

Public Expenditure

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will publish the figures in table 2.2 in Cm 1520, including the latest estimated outturn for 1990-91, as a percentage of gross domestic product;

(2) if he will publish in (a) cash, (b) 1990-91 prices and (c) as a proportion of gross domestic product, the figures as used in table 2·3 in Cm 1520, including the latest estimated outturn for 1990-91 and with the series extended back as far as is possible;

(3) if he will publish in 1990-91 prices, an update of table 2·3 in Cm 1520, including the latest estimated outturn for 1990-91;

(4) if he will publish an update of table 2·2 in Cm 1520, including the latest estimated outturn for 1990-91.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 5 November 1991]: Information on general Government expenditure by function in the period 1978-79 to 1990-91 in cash, real terms (1990-91 prices) and as a percentage of GDP has been placed in the Library of the House. The figures given are consistent with those published in the autumn statement press notice. Corresponding data for earlier years are not available on a consistent basis.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish an extended version of table 3·5 of the "Autumn Statement Statistical Supplement", including departmental planning totals for each year back to 1978-79, on as consistent a basis as possible and in 1990-91 prices.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 5 November 1991]: Information on the planning total by department in real terms (1990-91 prices), in the period 1984-85 to 1994-95 is given in the following table. The figures given are consistent with those published in the autumn statement. Corresponding data for earlier years are not available on a consistent basis.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will publish an update of table 2.5 in Cm 1520, including the latest estimated outturn for 1990-91, with a back series to 1978-79;

(2) if he will publish the figures in table 2.5 in Cm 1520, including the latest estimated outturn for 1990-91, with a back series to 1978-79 (a) in cash prices, (b) in 1990-91 prices and (c) as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 5 November 1991]: I am arranging for copies of tables setting out information on general Government expenditure by detailed function in the period 1986-87 to 1990-91 in cash, real terms (1990-91 prices) and as a percentage of GDP to be placed in the Library of the House. The figures are consistent with those published in the autumn statement press notice. Corresponding data for earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Public Investment

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the level of public investment as a proportion of gross national product for (a) all EC countries, (b) Japan and (c) the United States of America in the period 1970 to 1991.

Mr Maples [holding answer 11 November 1991]: Data for gross domestic product and public investment for the period 1977 to 1989 are published by the OECD in "National Accounts 1977-89".

Civilian Employees

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when an announcement will be made on the issue of additional payment for civilians in Ministry of Defence employment in Northern Ireland.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 11 November 1991]: The matter is under discussion with the Ministry of Defence.

HEALTH

Ealing Health District

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients were treated in (a) Ealing health district and (b) Ealing hospital since the inception of each; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested for Ealing health authority is given in the table. The information for Ealing hospital is not held centrally. My hon. Friend may wish to write to Lady Eccles of Moulton, the chairman of Ealing health authority, for details.

NHS Statistics

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of (a) heart transplant, (b) kidney replacement, (c) hip replacement and (d) eye cataract operations carried out in the national health service in (i) 1979 and (ii) the most recent year for which the figures are available; and if he will estimate the figures for 1991-92.

Mr. Dorrell: The table gives the number of operations for 1979 and for the latest year available. The rate of heart and kidney transplant operations is dependent on the availability of suitable organ donors. Future numbers cannot therefore be reliably estimated. Information on the projected number of hip replacement and cataract operations is not held centrally.

Kidney transplant[1]	842	1,870

Hospitals

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total investment in hospitals in each of the past three years; how many entirely new hospitals are now under construction; and how many hospitals were closed down in each of the past three years.

Mr. Dorrell: Health authority capital expenditure in the last three years has been as follows:

	£million
1988-89	1,082
1989-90	1,306
1990-91	1,514

There are 106 building schemes each costing over £1 million under construction. These include extensions and adaptations to existing hospitals as well as new schemes. There is no central record of the number of building schemes which are entirely new hospitals.

Figures for hospital closures are no longer routinely collected centrally as changes in the use of buildings are not a good measure of services to patients provided by the NHS.

Dental Checks

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has concerning the extent to which children at school are currently having a regular dental check through the school dental service; and if he will publish in tabular form the percentage of children who had a check-up in the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available in respect of each local authority in England and Wales.

Mr. Dorrell: District health authorities have responsibility for the screening of the teeth of children in state funded schools at least three times in each child's school life. The percentage of school children inspected in each district health authority in England and Wales during the year ended 31 March 1990 is shown in the table.

Amputees

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps are being taken to ensure that at all artificial limb fitting centres there is adequate provision for professional counselling of amputees.

Mr. Dorrell: We know that some centres do employ professional staff specifically for counselling of limbless disabled people. It is not, however, a subject on which we have given central guidance and is a matter for individual health authorities.

Tobacco Advertising

Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what assessment he has made of the evidence from New Zealand on the effects of tobacco consumption of the ban on tobacco advertising imposed in December 1990.

Mr. Dorrell: Changes in New Zealand's attitude to smoking led to a decline in tobacco consumption before the imposition of the ban and this decline has continued. At the same time, economic factors such as a fall in incomes have had an impact on consumption. The available data refer to a short time period, during which the "transitory shock" of the publicity surrounding the ban would have been operating. We have asked officials to keep us up to date on the evidence as it becomes available.

South London Hospital for Women

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans his Department has for the future use of the closed South London hospital for women.

Mr. Dorrell: The management of the national health service estate is normally delegated to the appropriate regional health authority which can best assess requirements so far as individual properties are concerned.

Northern Devon Hospital Trust

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many complaints he has received about the Northern Devon hospital trust since it was established.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not held centrally. Such operational matters are the responsibility of the NHS trust board. The hon. Member may wish to contact Sir Michael Knight, the chairman of the Northern Devon Healthcare NHS Trust, for details.

Organ Transplants

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospitals take part in providing organ removal facilities for the transplant programme; and if he will list the number of organs provided by hospitals in the various regions, either on a hospital-by-hospital basis or regionally during the past 12 months.

Mr. Dorrell: Information on human organ removal facilities is not collected centrally. The table gives the numbers of centres providing organs and the numbers of organs retrieved by English regions in 1990, the latest year for which information is available.

Region	Number of centres providing organs	Number of organs provided[1]

Cardiologists

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cardiologists per million population there are in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the United States of America and (c) Germany.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: There are 1.17 cardiologists per million population in the United Kingdom. Similar information in respect of the United States and Germany is not collected centrally.

Qa Business Services

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the West Midlands regional health authority will re-establish a computer bureau and re-employ ex-Qa Business Services staff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: This is a matter for the West Midlands regional health authority. However, I understand that AT and T ISTEL has acquired some of the assets of Qa Business Services and will ensure the continuity of information technology services to the group of West Midlands health authorities.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions have taken place between the West Midlands regional health authority, the inter-regional collaboration co-ordinators, Praxis, and the computer firm ICL regarding the transfer of support contracts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr Dorrell: The West Midlands regional health authority has been working closely with the administrative receivers of Qa Business Services to ensure the continuity of computer services contracts with NHS authorities; the responsibility for a successful transfer of contracts and hence a successful sale of Qa Business Services is a matter for the administrative receiver. I understand that AT and T ISTEL has acquired some of the business assets which will ensure the continuity of information technology services.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what lessons his Department has drawn for the NHS staff and services, of the recent collapse of Qa Business Services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: Management buy-outs are one of the range of options for improving the effectiveness and efficiency of local services which have been successfully implemented in many parts of the NHS. In the case of the administrative receivership of Qa Business Services, the Department is keeping in close touch with West Midlands regional health authority and will ensure that any wider lessons are shared throughout the NHS.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will call for a report from the chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority as to the effects on the regional national health service of the collapse of Qa Business Services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: Health services in the west midlands have not been adversely affected by Qa Business Services going into administrative receivership.

West Midlands RHA

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the financial terms involved in the management buy-out of the management services division of the West Midlands regional health authority; what was the surplus generated by the management services division for the national health service in the last financial year it was within the regional health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The financial and other contractual terms of the management buy-out of the management services division of the West Midlands regional health authority are matters of commercial confidentiality.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guarantees were given to the former employees of the management services division of the West Midlands regional health authority as to their continuity of employment for redundancy and other purposes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: One of the conditions of the management buy-out of the management services division of the West Midlands regional health authority was that regional health authority employees transferring to the new consultancy would transfer with continuous service and on terms and conditions no less favourable than those in their contracts of employment with the regional health authority.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library a copy of the transfer of undertaking regulations which governed the 1989 privatisation of the former management services division of the West Midlands regional health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 (SI No. 1794) is available in the Library. The management buy-out of the management services division of the West Midlands regional health authority was regarded as a transfer within the terms of those regulations.

GP Fundholders

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the numbers and the size of budgets of the GP fundholders in London.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not held centrally.

Legionnaire's Disease

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how long elapsed before the Liverpool patients diagnosed as having legionnaire's disease were notified of the nature of their illness; and what guidelines and advice his Department issues to hospitals about patients' rights in these matters.

Mr. Dorrell: The timing and nature of the information that patients receive about their medical condition involves the exercise of professional judgment by the individual clinician responsible for those patients' care. The Department does not issue guidance in these matters.

Cot Deaths

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when his Department was informed about the New Zealand research and the factors associated with cot deaths; what steps he then took to assess that research; and what other action was taken.

Mr. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 5 November 1991]: The Department was first informed about the findings of New Zealand research through letters published in The Lancet in July this year. This correspondence indicated that a change in certain of the factors associated with cot death had been accompanied by a reduction in the incidence of cot death. Over the next few months, further information was sought. Four reports, including one from this country not yet published, showed that a reduction in the prone sleeping position of infants had been accompanied by a fall in the incidence of cot death.

I announced on 21 October at column 423 the setting up of an expert group to report to the chief medical officer its findings and recommendations about this latest available evidence. The group's advice was published on 31 October.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 13 November 1991

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Mr. Paul Eric Walker

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Attorney-General whether Paul Eric Walker can now be treated as a new applicant for the purposes of legal aid.

The Attorney-General: Paul Eric Walker is in possession of a valid current legal aid certificate. There is no need for him to apply for a new certificate.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Attorney-General when Paul Eric Walker first applied for legal aid to the Northern area legal aid office; and if he will make a statement about the reasons for the delay in granting it.

The Attorney-General: Paul Eric Walker first applied for legal aid on 9 May 1990 and his certificate was granted on 22 August 1991. The delay in granting the certificate arose because the Legal Aid Assessment Office had difficulty in establishing Mr. Walker's correct address and a number of changes to his financial circumstances led to further delays while his means were recalculated. Between August and October 1991 Mr. Walker was asked to show cause why his certificate should not be discharged in the light of his most recent failure to co-operate with the means assessment process. The matter was finally resolved in Mr. Walker's favour on 31 October 1991.

TRANSPORT

MV Richard Montgomery

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the last inspection of the vessel Richard Montgomery was carried out on the River Thames; and if he will make a statement on the conclusions arrived at.

Mr. McLoughlin: A very thorough survey was completed early in September this year and a detailed report has been submitted to the Department by the contractor. I hope to be in a position to make a statement very shortly.

TRANSPORT

Lorries

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many inspections in relation to loading and roadworthiness of lorries were undertaken in the last year for which figures were available; how many infringements of regulations were detected; how many prosecutions and convictions secured; and if he will tabulate the results by county and metropolitan district area.

Mr. Chope: Almost 113,000 HGV roadworthiness inspections were carried out at the roadside during 1990-91. These resulted in just under 8,000 vehicles being immediately prohibited from further use, and just over 9,000 being required to have essential repairs undertaken within a maximum of 10 days. In addition, vehicle examiners made almost 98,000 visits to operators during the year to inspect either particular vehicles or maintenance facilities. A total of 114,000 HGVs were checkweighed during the same period. This activity resulted in the issue of just over 8,000 prohibitions. There were about 10,000 prosecutions, and 9,000 convictions.

It is not possible to provide this information by county and district.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to increase the penalties for infringement of loading and roadworthiness regulations in relation to lorries.

Mr. Chope: The Criminal Justice Act 1991 increased level 5 on the standard scale of fines, which is the maximum punishment for overloading and the more serious roadworthiness offences, from £2,000 to £5,000. This will be implemented in October 1992. In addition, infringements can lead to action being taken against operators' and drivers' licences.

Toll Roads

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ensure that the proposed toll road from Birmingham to Manchester satisfies the environmental impact assessment requirement of EC directive 85/337.

Mr. Chope: EC directive 85/337 applies to major road projects whether or not they are privately financed. Any proposed toll road from Birmingham to Manchester would require an environmental impact assessment before a decision was made to proceed.

Heathrow Airport (Signposting)

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve directional signing, with particular reference to reaching motorways, on the roads around Heathrow airport.

Mr. Chope: It is planned to revise the directional signing on the primary routes around Heathrow airport in 1994 as part of a general revision of the signing. Consultation on both the primary route network and its signing took place in 1989. Copies of the consultation documents were placed in the Library.

A685

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will look again at the congestion on the A685 road through Kirkby Stephen and provide an estimate of how soon a bypass will be put on the forward programme.

Mr. Chope: The A685 is not a trunk road. The needs of the route are therefore a matter for consideration by the local highways authority, Cumbria county council.

Heathrow Express

Sir Barney Hayhoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with British Rail about progress on the Heathrow express rail link; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I have had a number of discussions with BR on this matter. The Government are keen to see the project go ahead, but it is for BR to determine its priorities within the resources available.

BR Tracks

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures are being taken to make British Rail tracks suitable to accommodate continental Berne standard rolling stock.

Mr. Freeman: British Rail will be able to carry the great majority of containers—up to 9 ft high—and standard European swap bodies between the channel tunnel and its regional freight terminals using low platform wagons, without substantially changing the existing structure gauge. Converting existing lines to continental structure gauge would be extremely costly and disruptive. Apart from the need to alter tunnels and bridges, station platforms would have to be realigned and passenger rolling stock adapted to the new platform dimensions. BR has no plans to do this and does not believe the costs would be commercially justified. However, it is envisaged that the new high speed rail link would be built to continental gauge.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Correspondence

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the average length of time it takes to reply to a letter from an hon. Member.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The length of time it takes to reply to a letter from an hon. Member varies according to the subject. It is our policy to reply to letters from hon. Members as soon as practically possible. We meet our aim of replying within 15 working days in 80 per cent. of cases.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many staff are employed at the migration and visa correspondence unit.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Ten.

Immigration Interviews

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list (a) the numbers of people in each queue who are waiting for interviews for entry clearance to Britain and (b) the average waiting time in Bombay, Delhi, Dhaka, Islamabad, Karachi, Calcutta, Nairobi and Dar-es-Salaam.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As at 30 September the number of people waiting for interviews for entry clearance to Britain are:

	Queue 1	Queue 2	Queue 3	Queue 4	Total
Bombay	0	238	494	197	929
New Delhi	0	331	333	113	777
Dhaka	347	1,247	157	516	2,267
Islamabad	15	1,211	198	449	1,873
Karachi	16	120	36	8	180

There are no queues in Calcutta, Nairobi or Dar-es-Salaam.

The estimated waiting times, in months, are:

	Queue 1	Queue 2	Queue 3	Queue 4
Bombay	0	4	9	12
New Delhi	0	3	7	10
Dhaka	3	5	6	12
Islamabad	3	3	6	9
Karachi	2	3	3	6

Settlement queues are organised as follows:

Queue 1—Persons with a claim to the right of abode, dependant relatives over 70 years, special compassionate cases.

Queue 2—All spouses, and all children under 18 years.

Queue 3—Finance(e)s and others applying for the first time for settlement.

Queue 4—Re-applicants.

During periods of seasonal high demand applicants for visit visas in Islamabad requiring a full interview can expect to wait up to five days. Elsewhere they are dealt with on day of application.

Bank of Credit and Commerce International

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent visit by the Minister of State to Abu Dhabi; and whether he discussed BCCI.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I visited Abu Dhabi from 28 to 29 October. I met Shaikh Zayed, the President of the UAE, and other senior Ministers, who made it clear that bilateral relations remain close and cordial, and should be kept separate from the BCCI affair.

Iraq (Nuclear Activity)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his assessment of the efficacy of the international inspection and surveillance of Iraqi nuclear activity in the period before the Gulf war.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The IAEA conducted regular inspections of Iraq's declared nuclear facilities before the Gulf war. Its reports did not indicate any significant diversions of nuclear materials under safeguards.

Notwithstanding this, we now know that Iraq circumvented IAEA safeguards in seeking to develop a nuclear weapons capability. This is a cause for concern. The IAEA is considering how to strengthen the system, a process to which the United Kingdom, with European Community partners, is contributing.

East Timor

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps are being taken (a) by the Government (b) by the Government within the Council of Ministers and (c) by the Government within the United Nations to make progress towards a just peace in East Timor.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Her Majesty's Government have had bilateral contacts with Indonesia and Portugal to encourage them to work towards a negotiated solution of the East Timor question. The issue is discussed regularly in European political cooperation. We support the United Nations Secretary-General's efforts to encourage Indonesia and Portugal to resolve their differences.

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps are being taken by the Government to put pressure on the Indonesian Government about its human rights record in East Timor.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We regularly draw the attention of the Indonesian authorities to our concern about reports of human rights abuses in East Timor. We will continue to do so.

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to ban supply of military weapons to the Indonesian Government while that Government continue to occupy East Timor.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer the hon. Lady to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) on 12 November, at column 481.

Iraq

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are his current proposals to negate the Iraqi capacity to detonate initiators, launch nuclear capable missiles and assemble super-guns.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We shall continue actively to support the work of the UN Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency in dismantling Iraq's weapons of mass destruction capability under the terms of UN Security Council resolutions 687 and 707, and in carrying out their plans to monitor and verify Iraq's long-term compliance with those resolutions, under the authority of Security Council resolution 715.

Media Funding

Mrs. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will obtain for his departmental library a copy of the documents released to the Congress of People's Deputies by the Russian Justice Minister concerning funding of the Morning Star and Pergamon Press by the Soviet Communist party.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are aware of the documents in question. We have asked our embassy in Moscow to obtain the excerpts relating to the reported funding of the Morning Star and Pergamon Press by the Soviet Communist party.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Tax-exempt Special Savings Accounts

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the operation of TESSAs.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend has received a small number of representations about the operation of TESSAs.

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to modify the rules relating to TESSAs.

Mr. Maude: There are no plans to modify the rules relating to TESSAs.

Vocational Training (Tax Relief)

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the ordinary and advanced diplomas proposed in the White Paper, "Education and Training for the 21st Century", would fall within the terms of tax relief for vocational training introduced in the Finance Act 1991.

Mr. Maude: The Government are considering carefully the interaction between the proposals in the White Paper "Education and Training for the 21st Century" and the new tax relief for vocational training.

Inflation and Minimum Lending Rate

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the underlying rate of inflation and minimum lending rate for each of the last 150 months, setting out in each case the difference showing whether it is positive or negative, also marking each month when the economy was in recession with the letter R.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 12 November 1991]: There is no single measure of underlying inflation. For the purposes of this answer, it is defined as the RPI less mortgage interest payments. Since 1981 a minimum lending rate has been in operation for only two days. Instead three-month inter-bank rates have been used. There is no agreed definition of recession. For the purposes of this answer, it is defined as occurring when GDP falls for two or more consecutive quarters. GDP figures are available only quarterly, so it is not possible to identify when the economy is in recession month by month. Rs have been placed beside those months which make up recessionary quarters. The information is in the following table:

(a) Column (iii) only shows difference between columns (i) and (ii), not the "real" interest rate as usually calculated. For this see OR 12 June 1991, cols. 549-554w.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the real interest rates in the United Kingdom and Germany for each of the last 60 months using as real rates the difference between MLR and the underlying rate of inflation.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 12 November 1991]: Official interest rates, such as the MLR or the German discount rate, are not comparable across countries. International comparisons therefore generally use market interest rates; three-month inter-bank rates have been used in the table.

There is no generally agreed definition of "underlying inflation". For Germany the table uses consumer price inflation excluding rent. For the United Kingdom the retail prices index excluding mortgage interest payments has been used.

There is no single measure of real interest rates. They are most often calculated by deflating the interest rate by an appropriate measure of inflation, rather than from a simple difference between two rates. The table uses the method suggested in my hon. Friend's question.

THE ARTS

Devon

Mr. Speller: To ask the Minister for the Arts what assistance is to be given to the county of Devon in the next 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton [holding answer 12 November 1991]: The detailed allocation of the Government's grant for the support of the arts is a matter for the Arts Council of Great Britain and, where appropriate, the regional arts boards through which the Arts Council provides support for regional arts development.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Animals (Scientific Procedures)

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of project licences granted under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 for 1990 in Great Britain and Northern Ireland, respectively.

Mrs. Rumbold: Our records show that 613 project licences were issued in Great Britain in 1990. I understand from the Department of Health and Social Services for Northern Ireland, which is responsible for administering the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 in Northern Ireland, that 31 project licences were issued there in 1990.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the numbers of scientific procedures on living animals reported in 1990 authorised by project licences in the following severity categories, (a) mild, (b) moderate, (c) substantial and (d) unclassified in Great Britain and Northern Ireland, respectively.

Mrs. Rumbold: Statistical returns of procedures submitted for the purposes of preparing the annual statistical publications are not classified by severity category. Although an applicant for a project licence is required to assess the overall severity of the proposed project, the project licence may authorise a range of procedures with differing severity limits. The assessments of the severity of individual procedures and the assessment of the overall severity of the project as a whole are prospective. The purpose of this assessment is to allow the likely adverse effects on the animals to be used to be weighed against the benefits likely to accrue from the research, as required by section 5(4) of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many of the total institutions in the United Kingdom which use non-human primates have so far conformed with the minimum standards of the code of practice on the housing and care of animals used in scientific procedures introduced in February 1989; and within what time frame the remainder will be required to conform;

(2) how many United Kingdom institutions currently conform to maximum standards outlined in the special considerations of the code of practice relating to cage furniture, opportunities for social interaction, foraging, maximum vertical flight height and training the animals to co-operate for routine procedures.

Mrs. Rumbold: The special considerations of the Home Office code of practice to which the hon. Member refers relate to non-human primates. Since the Home Office code of practice was published, there has been a marked improvement in the standard of facilities for non-human primates in designated establishments. There has also been an encouraging increase in awareness within establishments of the desirability of providing environmental enrichment and appropriate upgrading in accordance with programmes agreed with the inspectorate.

Statistics on the housing of non-human primates are not routinely collected centrally, although the Home Office inspectorate carried out a special survey of large non-human primate holding facilities in 1988. A further review of establishments using these larger primates is planned for next year and one of its aims will be to examine progress made in improving facilities since the 1988 review.

Juveniles (Detention)

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the educational training and recreational facilities made available to those children detained in relation to section 53 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933.

Mrs. Rumbold: Juveniles sentenced to detention under section 53 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 may be held either in the prison system, normally in a young offender institution, or in the child care system as the Secretary of State directs. In young offender institutions those under school leaving age receive a minimum of 15 hours education a week. Educational programmes include academic subjects, life and social skills, leisure activities and work skills. Older juveniles are expected to participate in these educational programmes although they are not compulsory: alternative constructive activities are provided for those who decline education.

Arrangements are also made for participation in physical education for at least one hour each weekday on average, with the opportunity to attend additional physical education, sports and recreational activities in the evening and at the weekend.

Detainees held in the child care system also receive a full programme of education and in some exceptional circumstances approval might be given for attendance at a local school. Many child care establishments have good recreational facilities. In addition, approval may be given for suitable offenders to participate in educational and recreational activities within the community under appropriate supervision.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department at what stage of detention of a child detained under the terms of section 53 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933, he or she is eligible for home visits; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Any juvenile offender detained under this power in a young offender institution may be allowed a home visit as part of preparation for release when a date has been approved for him or her to be released on licence. Home visits may also be allowed before release on licence has been approved, under the home leave scheme, at a time depending upon the security classification of the establishment in which the juvenile offender is detained. For example, in open young offender institutions juvenile offenders serving determinate sentences may take their first home leave when they have reached the one third point of their sentences, and juvenile offenders detained for life are eligible for home leave when they have completed nine months in open conditions. On the other hand, in the most secure young offender institutions, juvenile offenders are not allowed home leave until nine months before they are due to be released. In addition, home visits may be allowed on compassionate grounds at any stage of detention if this is warranted by the circumstances.

Juvenile offenders detained in community homes and youth treatment centres do not become eligible for home visits at any fixed point in their sentences. Such visits are normally allowed as part of each detainee's treatment programme and preparation for release and the time at which this should commence is considered on its merits in each case.

Illegal Parking

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the costs of towing away illegally parked vehicles in greater London; and what was the total amount of moneys received in redemption charges since the task was put out to contract.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the removal of illegally parked vehicles was put out to contract initially in three areas of the Metropolitan police district in February 1988. There are now 11 areas covering 11 boroughs or parts of those boroughs. The total cost of the contracted-out services up to the end of 1990-91 was £24·5 million. The redemption charges received in the same period amounted to £19·5 million.

Criminal Injuries Compensation Board

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list (a) the names, periods of office and remuneration of the chairman and members of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board (b) the number of officials employed by the board and (c) the number and proportion of these officials who are located in Scotland.

Mr. John Patten: The names and dates of appointment of the chairman and members of the board are as follows:

[1]Scottish Member

The readily available information on remuneration, contained in the board's annual report for the year ended 31 March 1990 (Cm. 1365), is as follows.

The emoluments of Lord Carlisle QC were £50,342 and of the highest paid board member £66,488.

Other members' emoluments, excluding VAT, were within the following ranges:

	1989-90 £ Number	1988-89 £ Number
Not exceeding 5,000	4	3
5,001-10,000	2	1

At the end of October 1991 the board had 386 staff; 274 —70·7 per cent.—in Glasgow and 113 in London.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list (a) the number of applications for compensation submitted to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board from (i) England and Wales and (ii) Scotland in each of the past five years, (b) the average amount of time taken by the board to deal with an application, (c) the total amount of compensation paid in each of the past five years and (d) the average sum paid to victims of rape and sexual assault; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The number of applications received by the board from England and Wales, and Scotland, in the past five years, with the compensation paid, are given in the table.

	Number of applications
	England and Wales	Scotland	Total	Compensation paid (£)
1986-87	35,957	6,344	42,301	48,241,764
1987-88	35,940	7,114	43,054	52,042,581

1989-90	45,700	7,955	53,655	72,721,563
1990-91[1]	43,432	7,388	50,820	109,330,303

[1] Provisional figures.

The board does not produce statistics on the average time for processing applications, but percentages of cases completed within certain periods of registration are shown in the board's annual reports, copies of which are in the Library.

The board does not keep a central record of the amount of compensation awarded in cases of rape and sexual assault.

Bail

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to introduce a new offence of committing a crime while on bail; and if he will make a statement on Northumbria police's recent report on the subject.

Mr. John Patten: Home Office researchers have been reviewing recent studies by Northumbria police, and others, of offending on bail. In the light of the results of the review, we shall consider urgently what further action could reduce offending on bail.

Independent Television Levy

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has completed his review of the ITV levy rates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: On 1 January 1990 a mixed levy on profits and advertising revenue was introduced, with the intention of recovering in the 1990-92 ITV contract extension period broadly the same yield as would have arisen under the 66·7 per cent. levy on domestic profits which operated until 1986, other things being equal.

Although advertising revenue is likely to rise in real terms in 1992, to date it has been considerably lower than was expected when the new rates were set. This means that over the three years the levy is likely to raise more than we intended. I therefore propose to adjust the levy rates for the final year of the levy's existence in its current form. The free slice on net advertising revenue—NAR—will be raised from £15 million to £25 million and the rate of NAR levy reduced from 10 to 2·5 per cent. The levy on profits will remain unchanged.

These changes will take effect once the necessary regulations have been approved by both Houses of Parliament.

Psychiatric Patients (Homicide)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many psychiatric patients discharged from Home Office institutions have committed homicide in each of the last five years.

Mrs. Rumbold: I regret that this information is not available.

Burglary

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration he will give to funding crime prevention measures, including improved street lighting, to help reverse the increased level of burglary in Stoke-on-Trent, North constituency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Grants for specific crime prevention projects are made under the Home Office safer cities programme and the Department of the Environment's estate action and urban programme schemes. These are targeted largely at inner city areas where crime rates are generally higher than elsewhere. Staffordshire police are taking action to tackle the incidence of burglary in Stoke-on-Trent. Measures such as the development of neighbourhood watch schemes and encouraging householders to take steps, often at little or no cost, to secure their property can be simple but effective. Recent research for the Home Office has shown, however, that while good street lighting can help to reduce the fear of crime, it has little effect on crime itself.

Fire Services (Chiswick)

Sir Barney Hayhoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will ensure that there is no reduction in the provison of fire services covering the Chiswick area as a result of reorganisation of the London fire service.

Mr. John Patten: It is for the London fire and civil defence authority to consider the deployment of its resources in the light of the recent review of fire cover in the capital. Should the authority subsequently propose to close any fire stations, or to reduce the number of operational firefighters or appliances, my right hon. Friend's approval would be required under section 19 of the Fire Services Act 1947. My right hon. Friend would not grant this unless we were satisfied that the authority would maintain the nationally recommended minimum standards of fire cover.

Begging and Sleeping Rough

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were (a) prosecuted for begging, (b) convicted of begging, (c) prosecuted for sleeping rough and (d) convicted of sleeping rough in each police district in England and Wales in the year ending 31 December 1990.

Mr. John Patten: Information is not yet available for 1990. The table shows the number of prosecutions and convictions for begging and sleeping out offences by police force area in 1989.

Vagrancy Act 1824

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received and from whom in respect of the Vagrancy Act 1824 and its operation.

Mr. John Patten: In the past 12 months we have received 11 representations from right hon. and hon. Members and 16 from members of the public about the Vagrancy Act 1824. We have also responded to 12 parliamentary questions and noted one early-day motion on the subject. These figures include representations from those who support the present legislation or want to see more powers as well as those who oppose it.

United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service about the increases in resources for its work.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Discussions have been continuing between the Home Office and representatives of UKIAS on the resources needed to enable the organisation to respond to an increased workload. An initial payment of £200,000 has been made to UKIAS to enhance the refugee unit and further amounts will be made available for this purpose as they become necessary.

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost to the taxpayer of legal aid provided through the legal aid service and through the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service to asylum seekers for the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand that legal aid for all immigration cases was £2·65 million for 1990-91. No separate figure is available for asylum-related costs. For the year ending March 1991, the Home Office provided UKIAS with £72,690, as part of the annual grant in aid, towards the cost of its refugee unit.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many crimes were (a) recorded and (b) reported but unrecorded relating to (i) vandalism, (ii) theft from vehicles, (iii) burglary, (iv) wounding, (v) theft of vehicles, (vi) theft from persons, (vii) robbery and (viii) theft from homes, in each police authority area in Wales for every year between 1979 to 1990.

Mr. John Patten: Information available to the Home Office is for recorded crimes—notifiable offences—only and tables are published for police force areas for Wales in table 32 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" for the year 1979: for 1980 to 1989 in "Criminal Statistics England and Wales Supplementary Volume 3", table 3.1. Copies of these publications are in the Library, as are tables for 1990. Information about crime reported to the police but not recorded by them is not collected centrally. There is no specific offence of vandalism, but criminal damage is usually regarded as covering this type of offence.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of total crimes was accounted for by (a) burglary, (b) robbery, (c) criminal damage, (d) fraud and forgery, (e) sexual offences, (f) violence against the person, (g) theft and (h) other offences, in each police authority area in Wales for every year between 1979 to 1990.

Mr. John Patten: Information for the years 1988-90 is contained in the table. Information for earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Immigration (Carriers' Liability)

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will instruct the immigration service not to impose the £2,000 penalty on carriers in circumstances of passengers' non-possession of valid United Kingdom entry documents, in the case of transit passengers required to be permitted to proceed to an onward destination, pursuant to the current instructions under the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Charges are not imposed under the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987 in respect of passengers who fulfil the published criteria of the visa waiver for transit purposes.

Bus Lanes

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what have been the number of prosecutions of motorists for illegal driving in bus lanes during restricted hours in Greater London in each of the last three years.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not separately identified in the motoring offences statistics collected centrally. However, I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that 16,525 fixed penalties notices were issued by the Metropolitan police during 1990 for the offence of contravening a bus lane, a category which excludes parking offences.

Football Offences Act

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give a breakdown of the dates and venues of the matches from which arose each of the offences under sections 2 to 4 of the Football Offences Act outlined in his answer to the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde of 17 October 1991, Official Report, column 188.

Royal Parks

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration has been given to the security implications of the contracting out of the management of the royal parks for those public buildings and royal palaces under the protection of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Heseltine: I have been asked to reply.

The security implications for the royal palaces, public buildings and MoD property of contracting out the garden and landscape maintenance work in the royal parks are considered in the same way as they are whenever a contractor's staff undertakes work in such buildings or their gardens.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Accommodation Strategy

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if any conclusions have yet been reached following his Department's review of its accommodation strategy.

Mr. Leigh: The review is not yet completed.

Taiwan

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the value of British export sales to Taiwan in each of the past 10 years and the equivalent figures for France and Germany.

Mr. Redwood: The information is available from an OECD publication called "Monthly Statistics of Foreign Trade" held in the House of Commons Library.

Enterprise Initiative

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what evaluation there has been so far of the usefulness of his Department's enterprise initiative to (a) consultancy companies and (b) entrepreneurs in receipt of assisted consultancy advice; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh: Since it was introduced in January 1988 the enterprise initiative consultancy scheme has made a major contribution towards overcoming the reluctance of small and medium-sized firms to use outside expertise to improve their competitiveness: more than 90,000 firms have sought assistance under the scheme, the majority of which have never before used consultants.

The need for monitoring and evaluation has been built into the enterprise initiative consultancy scheme from its inception. On going in-house monitoring is supplemented by independent evaluation. This is centered on interview surveys with two samples of assisted firms, carried out by independent consultants, Segal Quince Wicksteed Ltd. The two panels of firms are interviewed shortly after project completion and then again one to two years later. Reports of the first three stages of the four-stage survey programme have been completed and published as follows:

(a) Evaluation of the Consultancy Initiatives by Segal Quince Wicksteed, published in 1989 by HMSO, ISBN 0 11 514677 6.

(b) Second Stage, published by HMSO in 1991, ISBN 0 11 515269 5.

(c) Third Stage, published by HMSO in 1991, ISBN 011 515270 9.

The results of the fourth stage will be published in the new year.

Evaluation has demonstrated the benefit to firms of an assisted consultancy project. It has found that 70 per cent. of assisted firms began to reap clear commercial benefits within a year of their assisted consultancy project and expected to recover their full project costs within three years. Firms had experienced improvements in the relationship between operating costs and turnover; and had experienced wider benefits in terms of improvements to management capability and an increased confidence in running the business.

One of the major aims of the enterprise initiative consultancy scheme is to encourage the use of consultants among small and medium-sized firms. Evaluation has found that 51 per cent. of assisted firms were more likely to use full-price consultancy in future. The benefits to consultancy companies of the scheme are the opportunity to work on projects encouraged and supported by the scheme; and, in the longer term, the general opening up of the small and medium-sized firm market to consultancy.

Indonesia

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will now make it his policy to provide information on export credits made available to Indonesia.

Mr. Lilley: The full range of Export Credits Guarantee Department facilities is available to support short and medium-term transactions with Indonesia subject to the ECGD's normal underwriting judgment being satisfied.

Efficiency Reviews

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he intends to ask the Monopolies and Mergers Commission to undertake an efficiency review of a publicly owned body under section 11 of the Competition Act 1980.

Mr. Redwood: As part of its regular programme of efficiency studies of publicly owned bodies, the commission has been asked to look into the service provided by the Commonwealth Development Corporation. The formal reference was made today. It asks the MMC to look at whether, in carrying out its functions under the relevant legislation, the CDC could improve efficiency, reduce costs and improve the quality of service provided.

The commission will report in five months.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on the level at which British arms manufacturers are currently supplying equipment to the warring factions in Yugoslavia.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 11 November 1991]: None. The Twelve members of the European Community agreed an embargo on the supply of arms to Yugoslavia on 5 July 1991. Her Majesty's Government fully supported this initiative and the DTI, in anticipation, revoked all export licences for weapons and military equipment to Yugoslavia on 3 July 1991. These measures were reinforced by the adoption of United Nations Security Council resolution 713 on 25 September which placed a general and complete embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Yugoslavia.

Iraq Arms Embargo

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list any chemicals with potential military uses which were exported to Iraq in contravention of the arms embargo.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 11 November 1991]: There is no evidence that any chemicals under statutory control have been exported to Iraq in contravention of the statement concerning the supply of lethal defence equipment made by the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 29 October 1985.

Development Areas

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultations are required by the European Commission prior to the United Kingdom Government exercising its right to create new development areas within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 12 November 1991]: The European Commission's approval is required for assisted area designations made under section 1 of the Industrial Development Act 1982. Consultations would take place as and when changes were proposed, and from time to time under the Commission's own rolling programme to check member states' support programmes.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will now consider conferring development area status on travel-to-work areas within the Borders region in south-east Scotland.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 12 November 1991]: No. The Government have repeatedly made it clear that they will not make piecemeal changes to, nor conduct a full review of, the assisted areas map during the present Parliament.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the powers the Government have under the Assisted Areas Order 1984 to designate new areas under the regional development provisions.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 12 November 1991]: The power to designate development or intermediate area status to areas is contained in section 1(1) and (3) of the Industrial Development Act 1982. The Assisted Areas Order 1984 was made in exercise of these powers.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will now review the criteria by which development area status is conferred on new areas within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 12 November 1991]: In designating assisted areas, the Secretary of State is required under the terms of section 1(3) of the Industrial Development Act 1982 to "—have regard to all the circumstances actual and expected, including the state of employment and unemployment, population changes, migration and the objectives of regional policies".

The particular parameters to be used in constructing the map will be determined when a review is done.

ENVIRONMENT

Royal Parks

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations were made before the decision to contract out the royal parks was taken.

Mr. Heseltine: It is the Government's policy to buy in services after competitive tender and I see no need for consultation on each occasion that we do so. We are consulting very widely on the future role and use of the royal parks.

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) on what basis the decision to close the royal parks apprentice training centre was taken; and how much money will be saved by the closure;

(2) what will be the future arrangements for apprentice training and who will fix the pay for apprentices, following contracting out of the management of the royal parks; and what arrangements will be made for apprentices to gain experience in a range of parks following contracting out.

Mr. Heseltine: When the gardening and landscape maintenance work is contracted out next March the royal parks will no longer employ any horticultural apprentices and there will be no need for the training centre at Eltham. The Department will, however, require companies awarded contracts in the parks to take part in a new royal parks apprenticeship scheme. The academic part of the training will be provided at Southwark college. Successful tenderers will offer employment to existing apprentices and make arrangements for them to complete their training. They will also be required to take on new apprentices each year to continue training at its present level. Where necessary, arrangements will be made for apprentices to move between parks to get a wide range of experience. It will be for the firms concerned to fix the pay for apprentices, but all firms tendering for contracts are being asked to supply information about their proposed rates of pay and that will be taken into account in awarding contracts.

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which outside consultants have been involved in the drawing up of specifications for the management of each of the royal parks.

Mr. Heseltine: No specifications are being drawn up for the management of the royal parks, which will remain the responsibility of my Department. The firm of Gillespies has been involved in drawing up the specifications for the day-to-day garden and landscape maintenance work in the royal parks.

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what savings he expects to achieve from the contracting out of the management of the royal parks; and what are the redundancy costs involved.

Mr. Heseltine: The contracting-out of the garden and landscape maintenance work in the royal parks is about maintaining and raising standards and spreading those standards to other parts of the country, while ensuring better value for money. The costs of the redundancies and early retirement have been estimated at around £3 million. This is an acceptable, one-off cost to bear for the benefits of moving this work into the private sector.

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what concern with standards of horticulture has led to the appointment of an advisory committee on standards in the royal parks.

Mr. Heseltine: I am determined to ensure that the standards of horticulture in the royal parks are high. Robin Herbert, president of the Royal Horticultural Society, and his panel will provide a source of independent advice to this process.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the running of the royal parks.

Mr. Yeo: We are determined that in future the existing high standards of quality in the royal parks should be maintained and where possible improved. We have recently undertaken two initiatives aimed at achieving this. A review group, under the chairmanship of Dame Jennifer Jenkins, has been set up to look at the role and the use of the parks. The group is concentrating in the first place on Hyde park and Kensington gardens and will be bringing forward proposals for improving their overall quality. The review group's report is due early next year. In addition, tenders are being invited to carry out the garden and landscape maintenance work in the royal parks from March 1992. Management of the royal parks will remain the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The contracts will be let by the Department to specifications which lay down high standards and will be closely monitored by the park managers.

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received in favour and against the contracting out of the management of the royal parks.

Mr. Heseltine: I have received a number of representations both for and against the exercise.

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what horticultural qualifications and experience will be required for the managers of the royal parks when their management is contracted out.

Mr. Heseltine: The management of the royal parks is not being contracted out. The parks will continue to be managed by suitably qualified and experienced people employed by the Department.

Bathing Waters

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those EC countries which have designated inland bathing waters under EC directive 76/160.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the EC Commission report "Quality of Bathing Water 1989-1990", copies of which are available in the Library.

Red Data Book Birds

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the red data book birds in the United Kingdom, with details of their current populations.

Mr. Baldry: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is taking to preserve, protect and provide habitat for, British red data book birds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: Under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 some 8 per cent. of Britain's wildlife habitat is protected as sites of special scientific interest—some 5,600 sites. Many of these are important nesting, roosting and feeding sites for species listed in the red data books. The Countryside Commission's countryside stewardship initiative and the programme of environmentally sensitive areas implemented by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, also encourage the conservation of features of our countryside that are important to wildlife, including these birds. I have asked for further advice specific to the needs of these species. I will write to the hon. Member when this is available.

Red Kite

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has taken place in 1991 towards re-establishing the red kite as a breeding species in England and Scotland.

Mr. Baldry: A reintroduction programme now co-ordinated by the Joint Nature Conservation Committee and the RSPB began in 1989. It has continued in 1991 with the release of further young birds in suitable areas of England and Scotland. These are intended to form the basis of successful breeding population in future years. To date, 78 red kites have been released, of which 62 are known to have survived.

Sleeping Rough

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give his Department's estimates of the number of people sleeping rough for each of the months October 1990 to October 1991, inclusive, and provide a breakdown of the figures for each local authority area.

Mr. Yeo: The most reliable information available to my Department is contained in "1991 Census: Supplementary Monitor on People Sleeping Rough" published by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys on 9 July 1991; a copy was placed in the Library.

Water Abstraction

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the statutory instruments relevant to the abstraction of water.

Mr. Baldry: The annual "Index to Government Orders" gives details of all the public general statutory instruments which are in force including those relevant to water abstraction. The annual volumes of statutory instruments contain, at the end of the last volume for each year, a classified list of local statutory instruments.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to what changes the conditions governing the abstraction of water have been subject since 1 January 1990.

Mr. Baldry: The abstraction of water is regulated both by statutory provisions and by the terms of the licence for each abstraction granted by the National Rivers Authority or, for the authority itself, by the Department. The only changes in the statutory provisions have been in the temporary drought orders made under section 131 of the Water Act 1989. Changes in licence conditions are specific to each licence.

River Quality

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the National Rivers Authority's report on river quality in respect of its comparison of river quality in 1985 and 1990.

Mr. Baldry: There have been references in the press to a preliminary draft of this report, but I believe any comment should await the report as approved and published by the authority later in the year.

Council Tax

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will, in establishing the banding of property values for the purposes of collecting the council tax, introduce a mechanism that will protect the clergy who live in large tied property whilst in receipt of limited stipends.

Mr. Key: My Department is presently discussing with representatives of the churches the position of the clergy under the council tax.

Mortgages

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance has been offered to local authorities who wish to purchase the homes of mortgagees facing repossession as a means to enable the mortgagees to remain in their homes as tenants.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 11 November 1991]: Long-standing rules have enabled local authorities to acquire property from a defaulting borrower where they are themselves the lender and, if they choose, leave the former owner in place as a tenant. Authorities also acquire property with a view to disposal including disposal of a shared ownership lease. Details of these rules are currently set out in schedule 3 to the Housing Revenue Account Subsidy Determination 1990. They may also provide resources to housing associations to enable them to purchase homes to enable the previous owner to remain on shared ownership terms or as a tenant.

Wind Farms

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance has been issued to farmers wishing to have wind farms on their land if they are in (a) environmentally sensitive areas, (b) national parks, (c) areas of outstanding natural beauty and (d) outwith any designated area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 11 November 1991]: Preliminary guidance about renewable energy installations, including wind farms, was given in a written answer by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning on 28 March at column 543. Officials in my Department, the Department of Energy and the Welsh Office are preparing a draft planning policy guidance note—PPG —about renewable energy which we hope to issue for public consultation later this month. The draft PPG will include the Government's proposed planning policies for renewable energy installations in designated and other areas.

Coca-Cola Development, Northampton

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the critical conditions highlighted by the European Commissioner for Environment concerning the Coca-Cola development in Northampton.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 12 November 1991]: The European Commission's letter of 17 October alleges infraction of directive 85/337/EEC in respect of a number of development projects including the proposed Coca-Cola factory at Brackmills, Northampton. The Commission alleges that the developer's environmental statement which was considered by the local planning authority in granting planning permission failed to cover various relevant significant environmental effects. My Department has asked the authority for its comments for the purpose of providing a full response to the detailed points raised by the Commission. In the meantime, I understand that the developer has submitted a new planning application and accompanying environmental statement in respect of a revised proposal.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide a summary of the ballots on grant-maintained school status, tabulated according to (a) the proportion of eligible parents voting and (b) the proportion of votes cast for and against grant-maintained status.

Mr. Eggar: The information requested by the hon. Member is as follows:

Science and Engineering Research Council

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has received the annual report of the Science and Engineering Research Council for 1990-91; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The annual report of the Science and Engineering Research Council—SERC—for 1990-91 has been submitted to me under the requirements of the Science and Technology Act 1965, and a copy is being placed before the House today.

The report describes a challenging year for the council when important decisions were taken about future research priorities. The report describes important developments in science and engineering. These include, among many others.

a. The completion of the MERLIN network of radio-telescopes. In November 1990 I had the pleasure of opening the new 32 metre radio-telescope at Cambridge—the central element of the project. With the linking together of the seven telescopes in the network, the UK now has a facility equivalent to a telescope 230 kilometres in diameter. Observations from the MERLIN system will allow British astronomers to maintain their position in the forefront of their field.

b. The exciting discovery by a team at Cambridge of light-emitting polymers. This is an excellent example of collaboration between physicists and chemists in tackling problems in the important field of materials science. Light-emitting polymers have now been produced of a similar efficiency to conventional light-emitting diodes and the development of such materials to cover the whole of the optical spectrum is now in progress.

c. The Clean Technology programme. This is a joint venture by the SERC and the AFRC which promotes long-range opportunities for research into prospective new clean technologies. Examples of work in progress include investigation of alternatives to bulk chemicals and the concentration and disposal of dilute waste.

d. The identification of a third form of carbon structure in addition to diamond and graphite. These closed cage structures have become known as "fullerenes" after Buckminster Fuller, the architect of the geodesic dome. As well as opening up whole new fields of carbon chemistry and materials science their discovery also promises new insights into the mechanisms of star and planet formation. A group at Sussex university has played a leading role in identifying these structures.

e. In the field of engineering, the development of novel image sensing technology. Work at Edinburgh university has made possible for the first time the combination of analogue image sensors and digital processing circuitry on a single silicon chip. This will enable the production of high resolution image sensors at a substantially lower cost, size and power consumption than previously possible. This important development offers the possibility of new products such as "micro" video cameras, with potential further applications in computer optics, videophones and robotics.

I congratulate the Science and Engineering Research Council on these and other achievements during the year. I expect the council to continue the task of reviewing its forward programme to match changing scientific priorities.

Student Grants

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science by what amount student grants will be reduced, pursuant upon the introduction of the council tax, based on today's rate of payments made to compensate for the 20 per cent. community charge payments, assuming no increase in the cost of living.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Students' total resources from grant and loans will continue to be reviewed annually in the light of broad overall cost changes, including those in local taxation, affecting students. We have recently announced an increase in the average student support of 4½ per cent. for the academic year 1992-93, thereby at least maintaining its value in real terms. It remains our policy to freeze the basic maintenance grant rates in cash and to apply any increase in resources to the loan facility only.

WALES

Local Government Structure

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give (a) the consultants appointed by his Department to evaluate responses to the consultation paper on the structure of local government in Wales, (b) the fee agreed in each case, (c) the criteria used in selecting the consultants and (d) state whether consultants were appointed for the process of drawing up the consultation paper.

Mr. David Hunt: The consultation paper on the structure of local government was produced by my Department; consultants were not engaged. Responses to the paper are being evaluated by my Department in consultation with the Council of Welsh Districts and the Assembly of Welsh Counties and in due course will be the subject of discussion by the Welsh Consultative Council on Local Government. Touche Ross has been appointed following open competition to provide technical advice to enable officials to make an assessment of the financial implications of any reorganisation. The fee agreed is subject to commercial confidentiality.

Patients Charter

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the cost of printing and distributing the patients charter in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The cost of printing and distributing the patients charter for Wales to every household in Wales is £203,030.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many households in Wales are expected to receive the patients charter in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The patients charter for Wales will be sent to all households in Wales. Approximately 1,192,000 copies will be distributed.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the patients charter in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The patients charter for Wales was launched by my hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and myself on 28 October.

The patients charter for Wales is part of the Government's citizens charter initiative aimed at improving the standards of public services. The patients charter aims to raise the standard of the NHS in Wales. It describes the rights of patients and the standards and guarantees which we expect health authorities to achieve.

It reiterates the Government's belief that there must be no change to the fundamental principles on which the NHS was founded and on which it has continued ever since, namely that services should be available to every citizen on the basis of clinical need, regardless of ability to pay, and that the service should mainly be paid for out of general taxation.

The patients charter builds on the aim of making the NHS in Wales a people-centred service. It complements the strategic intent and direction of the NHS in Wales and the all-Wales quality strategy.

The patients charter introduces a number of new measures.

From 1 April 1992 there will be a waiting times guarantee. Patients will be guaranteed admission for treatment by a specific date no later than two years from the day when they are placed on a waiting list. The great majority of patients will be admitted before their guaranteed date. Exceptionally for some treatments it may be necessary to set a date more than two years away. Health authorities or GPs will be responsible for ensuring that the guaranteed times are met, if necessary by offering treatment in an alternative hospital.

Charter standards have been set in several key areas of health care. These are waiting times for an emergency ambulance; waiting times in accident and emergency departments; cancellation of operations; named nurses, midwives and health visitors responsible for patients' care; arrangements for discharge from hospital; waiting times for out-patients.

These standards build on existing good practice. We are asking health authorities to set their own standards in these areas in the first instance, with the aim of meeting all the charter standards as soon as possible.

Local charters will be drawn up jointly by district health authorities and family health services authorities to tell people about the services available in their locality. Health authorities will publish waiting times for out-patient, day care and in-patient treatment by hospital, speciality and individual consultant.

Health authorities will publish standards of service agreed with hospitals and others who provide care. Health authorities will publish an annual report of achievement against local standards, and what action has been taken where necessary to improve performance. The Welsh Office will monitor authorities' performance against these standards.

Hospitals and other organisations which provide health care services will display a patients charter which will explain the main aspects of the service and the standards patients should receive. Details of an information service will be made available shortly.

The Department will be monitoring the performance of all those concerned with health care in these areas.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many copies of the patients charter in Wales have been printed; and if he will give the name and address of the printer.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: A total of 1,253,000 copies of the patients charter for Wales are being printed. An initial quantity of 3,000 copies was produced by Colibri Press Ltd. of Amhurst terrace, Hackney, London. The production of the remainder was undertaken by Flair Printers of South Portway close, Round Spinney, Northampton. Contracts for printing and distribution were arranged for the Department by the Central Office of Information, in accordance with print procurement procedures.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales to whom the patients charter in Wales has been distributed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The patients charter for Wales has been distributed to health authorities, health professional groups, consumer groups, Members of Parliament and individual members of the public who have requested a copy. The charter will shortly be distributed to all households in Wales. Copies of the charter will also be made available from hospitals, surgeries and other information points.

The charter describes the rights, standards and guarantees which patients can expect from the NHS in Wales. It is important that every household is informed about these matters.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the cost of the public launch of the patients charter in Wales.

Mr Nicholas Bennett: The cost of the launch of the patients charter for Wales was £1,352.

HMI Wales

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when Her Majesty's inspectorate Wales' last annual report was published; and what is the expected publication date of the next annual report.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The last annual report of Her Majesty's inspectorate Wales was published in March 1991. It is anticipated that the next annual report will be published in January 1992.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the future of Her Majesty's inspectorate Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The Education (Schools) Bill introduced on 6 November will establish an independent office of Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools in Wales to oversee arrangements for a new system of regular school inspections and to advise my right hon. Friend about the quality of education provided by schools and the educational standards achieved. Other aspects of the role of Her Majesty's inspectorate in Wales are being considered in the light of the review which has been undertaken and my right hon. Friend will make his proposals known as soon as possible.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the current size of Her Majesty's inspectorate Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Fifty-nine.

St. Michael's Church, Manafon

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the response of Cadw to the request for grant aid towards the maintenance and repair of the historic church of St. Michael, Manafon.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend makes grants towards the costs of repairing churches and other buildings judged by the Historic Buildings Council for Wales—our independent adviser—to be of outstanding architectural or historic interest.

The council's assessment of St. Michael's church, Manafon, after considering further information provided by the church authorities, is that the building is not outstanding and, therefore, regrettably does not qualify for grant aid under the terms of the Historic Buildings and Ancient Monuments Act 1953.

Wind Farms

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his Department's policy towards proposals for the construction of wind farms in rural Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: The Government wish to exploit the development of renewable energy resources wherever they are environmentally and economically acceptable. The policy of encouraging renewables is being carried forward in two principal ways: first, through a Government-funded research, development and demonstration programme; and, secondly, by removing institutional barriers to the renewables, for example by introducing the Non-Fossil Fuel Obligation Renewables Order. We intend to issue a draft planning policy guidance note on renewable energy, including wind farms, for public consultation later this month.

Lamb Sales

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the gross value of fat lamb sales by farmers at live markets and direct to abattoirs, respectively, in Wales in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The estimated gross values of fat lambs sold in Wales at live markets and direct to abattoirs in each year since 1979 are shown in the table:

	Sales at live sales (£,000)	Sales to abattoirs (£,000)
1979	62,705	13,951
1980	73,595	16,375
1981	96,890	21,557
1982	102,575	22,822
1983	105,725	27,766
1984	125,286	37,423
1985	129,143	41,455
1986	137,294	43,833
1987	145,793	48,597
1988	157,608	47,344
1989	159,630	47,951

Development Board for Rural Wales

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the gross budget of the Development Board for Rural Wales in each year from 1975; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The table shows the DBRW's gross expenditure for each year since its inception in 1977.

DBRW gross expenditure[3]

Year	£ million
1977-78	6·5
1978-79	9·7
1979-80	12·2
1980-81	10·3
1981-82	12·6
1982-83	14·4
1983-84	14·2
1984-85	16·4
1985-86	17·9
1986-87	[4]15·4
1987-88	15·3
1988-89	18·3
1989-90	19·5
1990-91	19·6
1991-92	[1]20·9
1992-93	[2]23·6

[1] Estimated.
[2] Planned.
[3] Including National Loans Fund servicing.
[4] Loan servicing requirements reduced by Welsh Office.

The increase of £2·2 million planned for the DBRW's budget in 1992-93 will enable the board to build on its special rural action programme, introduced to stimulate enterprise in the more remote rural areas of mid-Wales, as well as allowing the board to increase its social development work and take forward several joint initiatives with local authorities.

The planned gross expenditure for the board in 1992-93 represents an increase of almost 13 per cent. over estimated gross expenditure for 1991-92.

Welsh Office Expenditure

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will indicate, following the Chancellor's autumn statement on the allocation of Welsh Office expenditure for 1992-93, how much of the block has been allocated to (a) health, (b) education, (c) housing, (d) the environment and (e) tourism; and what were the comparable allocations to these headings for 1991-92.

Mr. David Hunt: I have already announced that I have secured an extra £80 million per year for mandatory home renovation grants. This means that, within the £5,810 million available for Welsh Office programmes in 1992-93, total provision for these grants will be £143 million—sufficient to bring over 11,500 dwellings up to the required fitness standard.

I shall be making further announcements about the allocation of resources to the remainder of my block programmes in due course, and full details will be published in next year's departmental report. The original allocations of provision for 1991-92 were set out in this year's report, Cm 1516.

Agriculture

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to visit the President of the European Commission to discuss the situation of the Welsh farmers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: It is my intention to visit Brussels in the near future for discussions with the Agriculture Commissioner among others.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what guidelines he has issued to the chairmen of the Welsh health authorities concerning the logos to be used on NHS ambulances in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: None.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairman of the South Glamorgan health authority concerning the expenditure of £40,000 on so far unused uniforms for the South Glamorgan ambulance service.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: None. This is a matter for the health authority.

Council Tax

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the estimated cost to local authorities in Wales of preparing for the administration of the council tax and the level of Welsh Office support for this expenditure.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: A study undertaken by the management consultants CSL Group estimated the cost to local authorities in Wales at £9·2 million. The Government have accepted the report's conclusions and on 5 November my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales announced that revenue costs would be supported by a specific grant of 75 per cent. and capital costs through supplementary credit approvals.

Livestock Feed

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many tonnes of grain have been fed to Welsh livestock during the last 12 months; at what cost; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Information is not available separately on grain fed to Welsh livestock. The total cost of the feed bill as a whole over the past 12 months is estimated to be over £198 million.

ENERGY

Electricity Production

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what studies have been undertaken by his Department into the effect of increasing dependency on gas-fired electricity production; and what are the implications for gas reserves.

Mr. Moynihan: My Department is monitoring the development of the new power generation market for gas. Power generation from gas contributes towards fuel diversity in electricity production and carries environmental benefits. The current evidence suggests the United Kingdom has sufficient known reserves of gas and the potential for new discoveries to supply all the demands of the United Kingdom market, including power generation, well into the next century.

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he hopes to announce his decision about the dates of closure or continued operation of the nuclear power stations at (a) Bradwell, Essex, (b) Sizewell A, Suffolk, (c) Dungeness A, Kent, and (d) Hinkley Point, Somerset.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: This is a matter for the company. The decision will be a commercial one, provided that the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate are satisfied that continued operation of the plant is safe.

Chapel Cross Power Station

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the proposal to construct a new atomic power station at Chapel Cross.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No such proposal has been made at this stage. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) on 15 October 1991 at columns 137-38.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his statement of 5 November, Official Report, columns 329-31, which new projects from the first approved tranche of renewable energy contracts have so far proceeded to commencement of construction; and what arrangement he has made to recycle entitlement from projects approved but not proceeded with, to those not approved but still active.

Mr. Moynihan: Of the 42 new projects which secured contracts under the 1990 renewables non-fossil fuel obligation (NFFO), some 12 have already been commissioned. The other 30 are planned to commission by the end of 1994 at the latest. The Government are committed to make further renewables orders during the 1990s to provide up to 600 MW of capacity, in addition to that forthcoming from the 1990 NFFO. The 1991 Renewables Order which I announced on 5 November made a substantial contribution to this commitment.

Nuclear Installations Inspectorate

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish in full the assessment by the nuclear installations inspectorate of the safety of the gas outlet welds at Trawsfynydd reactor number one and all similar reactors at Bradwell, Sizewell and Dungeness.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The publication of such reports is a matter for the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) of which the nuclear installations inspectorate (NII) is a part. However, I understand that in due course the HSE intends to publish the NII's response to operators' assessments of a number of generic issues relating to Magnox reactors which will include that of the integrity of steel pressure vessel welds. The HSE also intend to publish the NII's response to Nuclear Electric plc's long-term safety reviews (LTSR) of Trawsfynydd, Sizewell A and Dungeness A reactors. The response to the LTSR of Bradwell was published in 1987.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Indonesia

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all aid payments made available to Indonesia between 1975 to 1991 and the projects financed by this aid.

Mrs. Chalker: The gross bilateral aid expenditure on technical co-operation, debt relief, disaster relief and project aid was as follows:

£ thousand

	Total of which Project aid
1975	6,777	4,796
1976	4,651	2,407
1977	5,646	2,691
1978	6,541	2,718
1979	13,144	7,334
1980	11,190	4,963
1981	15,350	9,729
1982	17,219	11,442
1983	12,358	6,260
1984	28,292	22,192
1985	33,649	26,753
1986	8,898	2,482
1987	12,223	4,550
1988	17,334	6,139
1989	20,772	10,883
1990	22,714	9,464

The "project aid" column covers expenditure on the following Overseas Development Administration and Commonwealth Development Corporation capital aid projects.

Project level information is not available prior to 1980. Projects listed under 1980 include projects started in the 1970s on which expenditure was still continuing at that date.

Figures for 1991 are not available.

Technology Transfer Fund

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what progress has been made so far with the allocation of expenditure to each of the former eastern bloc countries under the technology transfer fund; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is the total expenditure so far allocated on individual projects out of the technology transfer fund set up to assist the development of eastern bloc countries; and in which of the categories within the fund the projects fit;

(3) if he will give details of the staffing, training and qualifications of the unit set up to administer the technology transfer fund with the former eastern bloc countries.

Mrs. Chalker: I assume that by "technology transfer fund" the hon. Gentleman means the know-how fund, Britain's programme of bilateral technical assistance to the countries of central and eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. The fund was first established for Poland in 1989 and subsequently, extended to Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, Romania, the Baltic states and the Soviet Union. We have made public commitments to spend £50 million in Poland, £25 million in Hungary and £50 million in the Soviet Union, but we have not set financial ceilings for any other country.

Know-how fund expenditure by country in the last financial year, and commitments made to date for 1991-92 are as follows:

	Spent 1990-91 £ million	Committed 1991-92 £ million
Poland	10·9	12·1
Hungary	1·6	5·9
Czechoslovakia	2·0	4·3
Ex-GDR	0·5	n/a
Bulgaria	n/a	1·3
Romania	n/a	1·3
Soviet Union	n/a	8·8

The funds have been used to finance some 390 projects, the overwhelming majority of which fall within a small number of priority sectors of key importance to the economic reform programme. These are principally: banking and financial services; management development and training; public administration, and employment and small business support. For the Soviet Union the four designated priority sectors are banking and financial services, small business creation, food distribution and energy. In addition to this, there are two schemes established to encourage British investments in the region (the pre-investment feasibility studies, and training for investment personnel schemes). To date £2·3 million has been allocated under these schemes.

The joint assistance unit, which was established to administer the know-how fund, is staffed by a total of 32 officials from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Overseas Development Administration, and the Department of Trade and Industry. Collectively they have a wide range of experience in administrative, aid and trade-related matters. A number of members of the unit have lived and worked in eastern Europe; six of them speak Russian, one Polish, one Czech and one Slovak. The unit has access to a wide range of professional advisers, both in-house, and contracted to it by the Overseas Development Administration. An advisory board has also been established which comprises senior figures from industry, the trade unions, finance and journalism, as well as Members of Parliament and academics with a particular interest in eastern Europe.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine Tuberculosis

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the number of badgers culled each year since 1970 and the proportion culled each year which were found to be infected with bovine tuberculosis.

Mr. Maclean: From 1971 to 1982, a total of 6,075 badgers were culled, of which 803—13·22 per cent.—were found to be infected with bovine tuberculosis. Annual figures are not available for those years.

The annual figures for badgers culled and the percentage of those proven to be infected with bovine tuberculosis since 1983 are as follows:

	Number	Per cent
1983	1,239	12·43
1984	1,337	16·89
1985	1,115	13·36
1986	782	15·86
1987	711	12·94
1988	778	27·25
1989	727	16·78
1990	811	19·24

This compares with some 20,000 badgers killed each year in road accidents and a total adult badger population of approximately 250,000.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the estimated percentages of cattle in Great Britain infected with bovine tuberculosis in each year since 1965.

Mr. Maclean: The estimated percentage of the cattle population which reacted positively to the intradermal tuberculin test was as follows:

Year	per cent.
1965	0·029
1966	0·027
1967	0·025

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether dairy and non-dairy cattle imported from Ireland are routinely tested for tuberculosis.

Mr. Maclean: Yes. Council directive 64/432/EEC established the testing requirements for cattle traded within the Community.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the cost of offering environmentally sensitive area grants to farmers in each of the national parks in England and Wales using similar take-up percentages as exist in those areas which are of a similar nature and region.

Mr. Curry: Figures are not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will make a statement on his proposals to increase expenditure on the environmentally sensitive areas scheme over the three years to 1994-95 giving estimates of the increased amount of land which will be included and the number of farms; and if he will make it his policy to ensure that farms in the Lake District national park will be eligible for inclusion.

Mr. Curry: We have plans to increase expenditure on environmentally sensitive areas in England by £75 million over the next three years. It is too soon to provide estimates of the resulting increase in coverage in terms of land and farms but announcements will be made shortly concerning improvements in existing areas and the designation of new ones. The Lake District is one of many new areas that have been suggested and full account will be taken of the information submitted on each.

Sheep Quotas

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if it is his policy to press for the introduction of sheep quotas within the common agricultural policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Sheep quotas would create major administrative problems both on introduction and subsequently. They would inhibit improvements in the efficiency of the industry and would stifle the development of more market-oriented production. A reduction in the level of price support remains by far the best approach to reform of the CAP sheepmeat sector.

Lambs

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the gross value of fat lamb sales by farmers at live markets and direct to abattoirs, respectively, in England in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The table is drawn from information produced from the administration of the sheep variable premium scheme and therefore includes only fat lambs certified under the scheme. This information is available only on a Great Britain basis and only for the period since 1981.

Import and Export Payments

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the amounts in pounds sterling received in the United Kingdom in import levies in each of the last five years by product, giving the amounts imported in each case; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The informaton is given in the table. A breakdown of the amounts by product could be produced only at disproportionate cost. Details of products imported into the United Kingdom are contained in the annual report published by the Central Statistical Ofice entitled "Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom".

Grant Aid

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether his Ministry pays out grant aid for the establishment of poultry businesses or slaughterhouses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: My Department administers EC grants under regulation 866/90 which, subject to Commission approval, will be available for the processing of meat, including poultry meat, but not the establishment of slaughterhouses. Grant aid is not available to assist the establishment of new poultry businesses.

Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowances

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will consult interested parties on making the environmental benefits afforded by hill livestock compensatory allowances more specific.

Mr. Gummer: My right hon. Friends and I have today issued a consultation document, seeking the views of interested parties on a package of measures designed to enhance environmental aspects of support for hill farming. Copies have been placed in the Library. We will study the views put to us carefully before drawing final conclusions.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensioners

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many individuals aged between 65 and 80 years are (a) not in receipt of a full pension and (b) losing more than £5 a week because they are not on his Department's files.

Mr. Jack: In a report by the Comptroller and Auditor General on national insurance contributions—HOC 665—it was estimated that some 130,000 people between the ages of 60 to 65 and 80 years for whom the Department did not have a valid address might have an entitlement to state pension exceeding £5.

The Department's analysis of a sample of the individuals has shown that most of these people's entitlements are small and stem from contributions paid many years ago. Some 5 per cent. have subsequently claimed their pension. Of the remaining 95 per cent., very few are thought to be still alive, living in the United Kingdom, or likely to benefit from making a claim. Around 50 per cent. appear to have emigrated at least 20 years ago or to have died and another 40 per cent. were women who may well be receiving a pension on their husband's contributions of an amount equal to or higher than that payable on their own contributions.

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners were in receipt of (a) pension income other than the basic retirement pension and (b) other income from savings in (i) 1979 and (ii) the most recent year for which figures are available; and if he will estimate the figure for 1992.

Miss Widdecombe: In 1979 a total of 3 million individuals over state pension age were receiving income from an occupational pension; the corresponding figure for 1988 was 4·5 million. For 1979 it is estimated that 4 million single pensioners and pensioner couples were receiving income from savings and investments; the corresponding figure for 1988 is 5·1 million. In no case is it possible to give an estimate for 1992.

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average amount of the second pension received by newly retired pensioners in (a) 1979, (b) the most recent year for which figures are available and (c) giving an estimate of the figure for 1992.

Miss Widdecombe: In 1979, the average amount of income derived from occupational pensions by those pensioners and pensioner couples who had occupational pensions was £41·40; the corresponding figure for 1988 was £64·20. It is not possible to give an estimate for 1992.
Note: Figures given in 1988 prices.
Source: Family Expenditure Survey; newly-retired pensioners are defined as single women aged 60-64, single men aged 65-69 and couples in which the man is aged 65-69.

Departmental Consultants

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the consultants currently undertaking work in his Department, the title of each project, its cost and its estimated finishing date.

Mr. Jack: The consultants currently undertaking work in this Department and agencies, the project and the estimated finishing date are as shown. We have not supplied information on the cost of individual projects as to do so could be a breach of commercial confidentiality.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if it has now been decided whether the Child Support Agency will require a mainframe computer system.

Mr. Jack: A study of the information technology requirements of the Child Support Agency is currently under way and no final decisions have been taken.

Social Fund

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications in the last year were made for assistance with the social fund; how many and what percentage were turned down; of those turned down, how many applied for review by the social fund officer; how many were accepted; how many and what percentage were rejected; of those rejected, how many were reviewed by an HEO (SF); how many were accepted; how many and what percentage were rejected; of those rejected, how many were sent for review by a social fund inspector; how many were accepted; how many and what percentage rejected; and what were the equivalent figures for the previous three years.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is provided in the tables. The information in table II has been provided by the social fund commissioner and is as published in her annual reports to the Secretary of State. Information for 1987-88 is not available since the social fund did not commence operation until April 1988.

(a) Number of applications[3] for SFI review	2,954	7,858	9,775

(c) Number of decisions revised[5]	1,205 48 per cent.	4,278 69 per cent.	7,689 82 per cent.
(d) Number of decisions confirmed	1,294 52 per cent.	1,960 31 per cent.	1,694 18 per cent.

[1] The difference between the sum of "decisions revised" plus "decisions confirmed" and the number of applications received, is attributable partly to applications being withdrawn by the applicant and partly to applications which have been made, but have not been decided in the statistical period.

[2] All applications for an SFO review that are not revised have been automatically counted as an application for HEO(SF) review, as it is not possible to identify whether review applications are withdrawn at this stage.

[3] The difference between the number of applications and the total number of decisions is attributable to a combination of different factors; applications which have been made but not decided in the statistical period; applications not being within the jurisdiction of the Office of the Social Fund Inspector; and applications not being within the time, form or manner laid down by regulations.

[4] The method of counting decisions changed in April 1990-91. Whilst each review application received counted as one case, the number of decisions reviewed by SFIs were analysed by type (award, refusals, etc.). It is possible therefore, that a case can result in more than one decision.

[5] Includes decisions made by the SFI to substitute his own decision or to refer the application back to the HEO(SF) for redetermination.

"Diminishing Options"

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has received a copy of the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux report "Diminishing Options".

Miss Widdecombe: Yes. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wrote to the assistant director of the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux on 21 October.

Students (Benefits)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will review arrangements for benefit payments to students on sandwich courses who are unable to obtain work experience and receive no grant.

Miss Widdecombe: Full-time students should generally look to the education maintenance system for financial support. In common with other full-time students, those attending sandwich courses are excluded from housing benefit, income support and unemployment benefit for the duration of their course. This includes any periods designated for work experience, whether or not a placement is obtained. The social security system was never intended to finance those who are undertaking a course of full-time study, including those courses which combine practical expertise with classroom instruction.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will reinstate housing benefit for students; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: No. Financial support for full-time students is properly the responsibility of the educational maintenance system, although certain vulnerable students remain eligible for housing benefit.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will urgently review benefit payments for students who are carers and have special family responsibilities and are currently unable to claim benefits.

Miss Widdecombe: Full-time students should generally look to the education maintenance system for financial support. Students who are attending courses only part-time continue to be eligible for income support, housing benefit and invalid care allowance. We have no plans to change these arrangements.

Children

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow, of 7 November, Official Report, columns 243-46, if he will ensure that copies of his consultative document, "The Proposed Contents of the Child Support Regulations to be made under the Child Support Act 1991", are sent to the Association of Directors of Social Work and the Royal Scottish Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

Mr. Jack: A copy of the consultation document has been sent to both organisations.

HEALTH

Cot Deaths

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the Chief Medical Officer established the group of experts to examine evidence relating to cot deaths; and what evidence it is asking them to examine.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 21 October at column 423.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what the increase in cot deaths between 1986 and 1989 has been attributed to; and what government-funded studies there have been into the sudden increase;

(2) what assessment he has made of the reasons for the apparent reduction in cot death rates in the last two years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: An increase in the number of deaths attributed to sudden infant death—SID—occurred between 1986 and 1988. The rate of sudden infant death per 1,000 live births came down from the 1988 level of 2·35 to 1·81 in 1990.

The reasons for fluctuations and trends in the incidence of SID nationally are not clear. SID is more common in the winter months and the rate may vary according to the severity of the winter; but the relationship is not fully understood. There is now growing evidence that changes in child rearing practice have been accompanied by changes in mortality attributed to SID. These include: a reduction in the prone sleeping position for the infants; attention to the risk of overheating; and increased support to those infants thought to be at highest risk, for example, those children suffering from respiratory disease. In addition, it is believed that there is a trend in the pattern of certification of death towards certifying as sudden infant deaths, deaths that might previously have been certified as due to respiratory disease. The rates for respiratory disease fell over this period when SID was increasing.

For information relating to government-funded studies into cot death research, I refer the hon. Member to the reply my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science gave him on 7 November at column 206.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretaryt of State for Health how much money the Government have given to the Foundation for the Study of Infant Deaths since it was set up.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Since 1983-84, the foundation has received a total of £97,500 in grants under section 64 of the National Health Service and Public Health Act, 1968. The foundation also currently receives a grant of £25,000 per annum payable over the two financial years, 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects the inquiry he has set up into stillbirths and deaths in infancy to report; when it will issue a preliminary report on the recommended cot sleeping position for babies; and what steps he will take to communicate that recommendation to health service professionals.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: On 21 October, I announced the setting up of an expert group to report to the chief medical officer following its examination and assessment of available evidence on reducing the risk of cot death. After studying the group's recommendations, the chief medical officer made its advice public in a press release issued on 31 October. He also announced that he and the chief nursing officer would be writing specifically to health professionals about the expert group's advice.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the members of the group for the speed and clarity of their advice.

The confidential inquiry into stillbirths and deaths in infancy, which I announced on 2 July, is a longer-term and more wide-ranging initiative which will organise detailed investigations into foetal losses, stillbirths and infant deaths.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funding was made available to the Avon study into infant deaths.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I understand that the most recent study in Avon was funded with the assistance of the Foundation for the Study of Infant Deaths. The Department was not approached directly to provide funding for this particular study, though financial assistance is provided for the foundation's administrative costs.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the Medical Research Council was commissioned to review existing cot death research; and to what end.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department commissioned the Medical Research Council in June 1989 to undertake a major review of the literature relating to sudden infant death syndrome—SIDS—and to advise on what further research was needed. This has been received and is under consideration.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much extra was spent on research into cot deaths as a result of the recommendation of the Select Committee on Social Services (HC 54 Session 1988-89) that further research into the causes of sudden infant death syndrome should be conducted as a matter of urgency.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Government expenditure on research into sudden infant death syndrome and respiratory distress syndrome in 1989-90 and 1990-91 amounted to £1,095,000, a 30 per cent. increase over the previous two-year period.

NHS

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the national health service budget is spent on (a) consultants, (b) doctors, (c) nurses and (d) others; how much this represents in cash terms; what were the comparable figures in April 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: Information derived from annual accounts of health authorities and their predecessor authorities, as submitted to the Department and related to hospital and community health services—HCHS—only, is shown in the table.

Expenditure on family health services has been excluded from the table as such expenditure consists principally of payments to general practitioners and other professionals contracted to the NHS to provide those services.

Annual accounts of regional and district health authorities in England and those of the special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals 1989-90 (predecessor authorities 1978-89).

Notes:

1. HCHS covers all services managed by the health authorities concerned including hospital, community health, patient transport (i.e. ambulance), blood transfusion and other services. Capital expenditure and all expenditure incurred by Family Health Services Authorities (FHSAs) and certain supporting special health authorities and other bodies is excluded; however 1978-79 figures include small elements for administrative costs of the FHSA predecessor Family Practitioner Committees which were at that time included with the annual accounts of health authorities and were not separately identified.
2. The figures are gross salaries and wages costs and include employers' national insurance and superannuation contributions.
3. "All other staff" includes professional, technical, scientific, ancillary, maintenance, ambulance and administrative and clerical staff. The correspondingly small total costs incurred by the health authorities on employing all non-NHS (agency etc) staff are also included—£297·5 million (cash) in 1989-90 and £40·6 million (cash) in 1978-89.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether his advice that young babies should be laid on their back includes premature babies.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In individual cases, such as premature babies, this must be a matter for the clinical judgment of the doctor concerned with the baby's care.

Optical Charge Vouchers

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the increase in the value of vouchers for glasses in each band from A to F since 1987, in (i) cash terms and (ii) real value, calculated using the GDP deflator.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The voucher scheme was introduced to improve patient choice in where and which spectacles they purchased, and to increase competition in the optical market. Voucher values are set with reference to nationwide average manufacturers' prices: the majority of opticians supply spectacles within voucher values. The increases in voucher values since 1987, in both cash and real terms, are given in the table.

Asthma

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospital visits per year are a result of asthma; and what action Her Majesty's Government are taking to reduce this number.

Mr. Dorrell: During 1989-90, the latest year for which information is available centrally, the estimated number of in-patient cases with a principal diagnosis of asthma treated in NHS hospitals in England was 95,000. Better control of asthma may result in fewer hospital admissions. Peak flow meters, which help in improving control by monitoring the changes in the asthmatic patient's airways and giving advance warning of an impending attack, have been available on GP prescription since 1 October 1990. The introduction of self-management protocols agreed between patient and doctor should also help to reduce the number of hospital admissions.

Female Circumcision

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what specific guidelines have been issued by the Department of Health on the matter of female circumcision being practised on young girls;

(2) if he will fund a publicity campaign to warn of the dangers of female circumcision of children.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Interdepartmental guidance on new arrangements for inter-agency working to protect children from abuse under the Children Act 1989 was issued on 14 October. This document, "Working Together", a copy of which is available in the Library, reminds authorities of the effect of the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985, and gives guidance that where there is reason to believe a child is likely to suffer significant harm as a result of female circumcision local authorities should consider the exercise of investigative powers under section 47 of the Children Act 1989. In addition, the Department is currently funding the production of a training video and accompanying guidance booklet for professionals on female genital mutilation. The Department provides grant aid to the main voluntary organisation working in this area to assist it in its very valuable work of education, publicity and counselling.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the Government's proposals to tackle ME.

Mr. Dorrell: Both the Government and the NHS recognise myalgic encephalomyelitis as a debilitating and distressing condition. Unfortunately its causes are not yet fully understood, nor is there a generally agreed method of treatment. Consensus on a case definition is under discussion and some epidemiological studies are under way. The Department of Health and the Medical Research Council remain willing to consider funding well-founded research proposals on ME, as on other medical conditions.

Psychiatric Patients (Homicide)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many psychiatric patients discharged from health service institutions have committed homicide in each of the last five years.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not available centrally.

Mentally Disordered Offenders

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the joint Department of Health and Home Office review of health and social services for mentally disordered offenders.

Mr. Dorrell: I announced the establishment of the joint review in my reply on 19 December 1990 to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) at columns 244-45. A steering committee was appointed under the chairmanship of Dr. John Reed, senior principal medical officer, Department of Health. It met first on 31 January 1991 and I am pleased to report that it has made substantial progress.

We are today publishing four consultation documents submitted by the steering committee. Copies are available in the Library. These are the reports of three advisory groups that have been examining services provided in the community, in hospitals and in prisons, and an overview by the steering committee itself. We are issuing them to a wide range of interested bodies with an invitation to comment by 31 January 1992.

Between them, the advisory groups have made 87 recommendations aimed at improving the delivery and co-ordination of care and treatment for mentally disordered offenders. They provide advice on the level and range of health and social services provision that may be needed, as well as the mechanisms required to identify and assess the needs of those who should be diverted from the criminal justice system to more suitable settings. A number of recommendations for the mental health care of prisoners are consistent with proposals in the White Paper on the prison service, "Custody, Care and Justice", Cm. 1647, and the current consultation paper on contracting for prison health services.

The steering committee has set up three further advisory groups which are now beginning work. These are concerned with finance, staffing and training, and research issues. They are due to report in the spring of next year. Work is also being undertaken on performance measurement and quality control, and services for patients with special needs.

The present reports reinforce the Government's policy that mentally disordered offenders who need care and treatment should receive it from the health and personal social services rather than being dealt with in the criminal justice system. They propose also a set of guiding principles for future service provision which we endorse. These are that patients should be cared for with regard to the quality of care and proper attention to the needs of individuals; as far as possible, in the community, rather than in institutional settings; under conditions of no greater security than is justified by the degree of danger they present to themselves or others; in such a way as to maximise their rehabilitation and chances of sustaining an independent life; as near as possible to their own homes or families, if they have them.

I have already indicated that we do not want necessary action to be delayed merely because the review is in progress. We are considering the present recommendations to identify those which could be implemented at an early date. The steering committee has proposed an initial action plan whose main elements are the improvement of inter-agency arrangements for joint working at both planning and operational level; local assessments of service need, including assessments in each NHS region before the end of the review of needs for local and medium secure hospital provision; the continued protection of existing NHS services for mentally disordered offenders, including those for people with certain special needs, pending consideration by the review of arrangements for purchasing services; to build on the positive response of agencies in the health, social and criminal justice services to Home Office circular 66/90 and to the review itself, and to review good practice guidance in the light of the advisory group reports.

We endorse the direction set by these proposals and will be taking action to follow them up so far as it lies within our direct responsibility. Final decisions will need to take account of the further work initiated by the steering committee and of responses to the present consultation exercise.

My right hon. and hon. Friends and I are committed to maintaining the close co-operation which has developed between our Departments through the review. We are very grateful to Dr. Reed and his colleagues, and others who have contributed to the advisory groups, for their work so far.

Existing NHS services for mentally disordered offenders are subject to NHS management executive letter (90) 190 which directs health authorities to maintain at least the present level of service until December 1991. This guidance is being extended until March 1993 in order to ensure that future planning of these services takes place against a reasonably stable background.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Electricity Generation

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will seek powers to impose a non-fossil fuel obligation for electricity generation.

Mr. Hanley: Provisions to enable the promotion of the generation of electricity from renewable sources were included in the proposal for a draft Electricity (NI) Order published on 19 April. My right hon. Friend hopes to lay such an order before the House shortly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Members' Pay and Allowances

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many individuals currently in receipt of employee payments from the office costs allowance are married or otherwise related to current hon. Members.

Mr. MacGregor: There is no requirement for hon. Members to inform the Fees Office of any family relationship with them or other hon. Members when authorising payments of salaries to their staff from the office costs allowance. I regret therefore that the information requested is not available.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many Members employ (a) one, (b) two, (c) three, (d) four and (e) five or more employees from their office costs allowance.

Mr. MacGregor: Excluding one-off payments, 171 Members employed one member of staff; 270 employed two; 141 employed three; 42 employed four and 13 employed five or more as at the end of October.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many employees are paid out of the office costs allowance; and how many Members have given their employees a contract of employment as requested by the Fees Office and the House.

Mr. MacGregor: Excluding one-off payments there were, at 31 October 1991, 1,332 persons employed by hon. Members and paid from the office costs allowance. This represents 1,370 separate employments. On the same date 601 hon. Members had contracts of employment with members of their staff.

Mr. Stevens: To ask the Lord President of the Council if there is to be any increase in 1991 in the maximum sum that may be claimed by an hon. Member in respect of additional expenses necessarily incurred in staying overnight away from his main home for the purpose of performing his parliamentary duties.

Mr. MacGregor: The civil service daily rate of subsistence for class 1 regular visitor (inner London) remains at £74·90 per day from 1 August 1991. Therefore, in accordance with the resolutions of the House of 20 December 1971 and 22 July 1975, the maximum sum that may be reimbursed will remain at £10,786 for the year ending 31 March 1992.

SCOTLAND

Scottish Government

20. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has for reforming the government machinery dealing with Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Reform of the government machinery in Scotland is continuous. We have transferred to the Scottish Office responsibility for nature conservation matters and for training under Scottish Enterprise, Highlands and Islands Enterprise and local enterprise companies. We propose that responsibility for Scottish universities will also be transferred.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

21. Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he proposes to create environmentally sensitive areas in Caithness and Sutherland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Government believe that environmentally sensitive areas offer significant benefits to farming and conservation. My right hon. Friend intends to designate further areas in Scotland and has sought advice from his statutory advisers. He will announce the new areas in due course.

European Community

22. Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has to improve representation of Scotland's interests within the European Community.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Scotland's interests are well served by existing arrangements for governmental representation within the European Community. The Scottish Office makes full use of these in its handling of Community business.

In addition, my right hon. Friend supports Scottish Enterprise's plans to establish Scotland Europa, which will serve the European interests of a range of non-governmental Scottish organisations.

Patients Charter

23. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the implications of the patients charter for patients who presently benefit from in-patient specialised units.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The patients charter provides commitments on raising the standard of service for all who make use of the NHS in Scotland. In particular, all in-patients will benefit from the guarantees to be provided as from April 1992 on waiting times for admission to hospital.

Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the aims and objects of the patients charter.

Mr. Lang: The aim of our patients charter is to set out simply and clearly what everyone who uses the NHS in Scotland can expect from it; and to give a series of commitments designed to improve the standards of service.

Cardiac Patients (Lothian)

24. Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when patients who were assessed as in need of cardiac surgery in February in Lothian health board area can expect to receive notification for their operation.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: About 60 per cent. of the patients assessed in February will have been admitted immediately as emergencies. Of those placed on the waiting list about 80 per cent will already have been admitted and the remainder will be notified as soon as a firm date for admission can be given.

Salmon

25. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the salmon farming industry.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: On 8 November, in response to a request from the United Kingdom, the European Commission announced a minimum import price for certain presentations of Atlantic salmon, designed to prevent any further fall in the market price. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has welcomed the Commission's action as a helpful step in stabilising the market while attention is given to the industry's complaints of dumping by Norwegian companies.

Proportional Representation

26. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce proportional representation for all elections in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so.

Constituencies

27. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans his Department has for ensuring the size of Scottish constituencies conform to a United Kingdom average.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has no present intention to propose changes in the rules set out in schedule 2 of the Parliamentary Constituencies Act 1986, to which the Boundary Commission for Scotland is required to give effect by section 3(1) of that Act.

Health Visitors, Glasgow

28. Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to discuss with the Greater Glasgow health board the proposed cuts in the number of home visits made by health visitors.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have no plans to do so. The board proposes to extend the benefits of the health visitor service to those who need it most by improving its efficiency and re-directing its efforts to the most vulnerable groups. This will result in an increase from 317,000 visits last year to an expected 540,000 contacts in 1992.

Higher Education

29. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the number of students in higher education.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The numbers of students in full-time higher education have increased by over 40 per cent. to nearly 97,000 since the Government took office.

Tourism

30. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many overseas visitors to Scotland are expected in 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Scottish tourist board believes that visitor numbers in 1991 will be within the range of 1·45 to 1·5 million.

Hill Farming

31. Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with the National Farmers Union about hill farming; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: My noble Friend the Minister for Agriculture in Scotland and other Agriculture Ministers met the four national farming unions on 23 October to review the economic situation in the hills and uplands. We will announce the results of the review as soon as possible.

NHS Trusts

32. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on trust status for the hospital service in Edinburgh.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: NHS trust status with its emphasis on the delegation of responsibility to locally run trust boards provides considerable potential for improved patient care within the national health service and with services continuing to be free at the point of delivery as at present. All hospitals and units in Scotland have been invited to consider their potential for trust status. So far one hospital in Edinburgh, the Princess Margaret Rose, plus the Lothian college of nursing and midwives have expressed an interest. Others, I am confident, will follow.

Local Authority Services

33. Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next plans to meet representatives of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to discuss funding of essential services.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend's next scheduled meeting with the convention about local government finance matters is on 29 November.

Agriculture

34. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to ensure the future prosperity of the Scottish agricultural industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The output of Scottish agriculture in 1990 rose to £1·6 billion and aggregate farm income was estimated to rise to £172 million, above the average for the 1980s. We continue to monitor the situation closely, especially for hill farming. We are resisting firmly the discriminatory elements of the EC Commission's proposals to reform the common agricultural policy, and shall maintain special support to farmers and crofters in the highlands and islands under the rural enterprise programme.

Public Health (Borders)

35. Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what response he will make to the second annual report of the chief administrative medical officer and director of public health concerning the health of the people of the Borders; and whether he intends to increase the resources available to enable the Borders health board to implement its recommendations.

Mr. Lang: Responsibility for the delivery of health care services in the area lies with Borders health board and it is for the board to determine its own priorities within the resources it receives. In reaching its decisions, the board will no doubt take into account, among other factors, the reports it receives annually from the chief administrative medical officer/director of public health about the health of the population in the area and the implications for services.

Fish Conservation

36. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he proposes to meet leaders of the Scottish fishing industry to discuss fisheries conservation measures.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My noble Friend the Scottish Fisheries Minister will be meeting the Scottish Fishermen's Federation on 18 November.

Highland Scottish Omnibuses

37. Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much the Scottish Office was paid for the sale of Highland Scottish Omnibuses.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: As has previously been indicated to this House, information on the sale prices obtained for each of the bus companies sold under the Scottish Bus Group disposal programme will be made available to Parliament as soon as possible.

The legislation provides that sums received by the Secretary of State for the Scottish Transport Group by way of sale proceeds shall be paid into the Consolidated Fund.

Trunk Roads (Salting)

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will detail what guidelines are issued to regional councils concerning the salting of trunk roads; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Currently there are no formal guidelines issued. The salting of trunk roads in Scotland is carried out in accordance with the procedures laid down by individual regional councils. These give the rates of spread for varying weather conditions and locations. The decision on whether salting should be carried out is taken on the information supplied by Met Office forecasts and ice detection equipment. The Scottish Office roads directorate intends to issue shortly a code of practice on winter maintenance which will include the regularising of regional practices with regard to the level of service of salting required on trunk roads.

Education

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he received a copy of the report of the Channel Four Commission on Education; and what response he has made to the views expressed about Scottish education.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have not received a copy.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether his Department supplied the Channel Four Commission on Education with statistical information or comments on the performance of Scottish education.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: It was for education authorities to decide for themselves whether they did so. My Department was not asked for information or comments.

Courts (Amenities)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list his powers with regard to ensuring that district courts have basic standards of amenities for accused, witnesses, solicitors and staff.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Under section 8 of the District Courts (Scotland) Act 1975 it is the responsibility of local authorities to provide suitable and sufficient premises and facilities for the purposes of the district court.

School Nurses

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many school nurses were employed in Scotland in (a) 1975, (b) 1980, (c) 1985 and (d) 1990.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is as follows:

School nurses employed by the NHS in Scotland as at 30 September

Year	Whole time equivalent
1975	137·0
1980	158·3
1985	227·1

Sentencing Appeals

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many appeals against sentence to the High Court of Justiciary there have been following conviction on indictment in each of the last 10 years for which information is available; and of these how many have been successful;

(2) how many appeals against sentence to the High Court of Justiciary there have been following conviction on summary complaint in each of the last 10 years for which information is available; and of these how many have been successful;

(3) how many appeals against conviction to the High Court of Justiciary there have been following conviction on indictment in each of the last 10 years for which information is available; and of these how many have been successful;

(4) how many appeals against conviction to the High Court of Justiciary there have been following conviction on summary complaint in each of the last 10 years for which information is available; and of these how many have been successful.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is given in the table.

Children

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if, in relation to the justice charter for Scotland, he has any plans to introduce legislation concerning the tendering of video-recorded interviews of children as admissible evidence in court cases involving sexual abuse or physical abuse of children; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: A proposal to enable the evidence of children to be taken on commission and for the commission proceedings to be video recorded was contained in the Scottish Law Commission's report on the evidence of children and other potentially vulnerable witnesses and is at present under consideration.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement concerning the educational, training and recreational facilities made available to those children detained in relation to section 205 or section 206 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Children detained under section 205 or 206 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 in residential child care establishments receive the same standard of educational, training and recreational facilities as the other children in them. Such establishments have educational and recreational facilities within their premises, but they also have access to external facilities to help them meet the needs of individual children, subject to any additional safeguards which are necessary for their own safety, or the safety of others.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland at what stage of detention of a child, detained under the terms of section 205 or section 206 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975, he or she is eligible for home visits; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Children who are detained without limit of time under section 205 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975, following a conviction for murder, are not allowed home visits while detained in the child care system. There are regular opportunities for family and friends to visit the child in the appropriate residential establishments.

As regards home visits for children sentenced to be detained under section 206 of the 1975 Act, each case is considered on its merits, having particular regard to the nature of offence and length of sentence. In most cases, home visits become a regular part of the child's programme.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state (a) the number of children detained in relation to section 205 or section 206 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 in each of the past 15 years, (b) the average length of detention/imprisonment undertaken by such offenders, (c) how many have been released under licence and (d) in how many cases licences were revoked; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Details of the number of children sentenced and recalled under section 206 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 during each of the 15 years to 31 December 1990 are given in the table. Records of the number of children released each year and the average period of detention are not maintained.

Corresponding records for children convicted of murder and sentenced under section 205 of the 1975 Act are not separately maintained.

Child Care Inquiry, Fife

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the Fife child care inquiry.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The chairman of the inquiry into child care policy in Fife has finished hearing evidence from the parties concerned and is now preparing his report, which we are keenly awaiting.

Orthopaedic Surgery

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of patients waiting for operations or procedures in respect of orthopaedic surgery as at 31 December and 30 June in each year since 1988 in respect of (a) Lothian health board and (b) Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 11 November 1991]: The information available is set out in the table:

Number of patients waiting for orthopaedic surgery

	Lothian Health Board		Scotland
	In-patients	Day cases	In-patients	Day cases
31 December 1989	1,153	123	8,269	1,150
30 June 1990	1,178	139	7,994	1,255
31 December 1990	1,178	107	8,674	1,398
30 June 1991	1,201	135	8,742	1,427

Note: This information was not collected at 30 June and 31 December in each year prior to 31 December 1989.

"The Justice Charter for Scotland"

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost of producing and distributing the Scottish Office publication "The justice charter for Scotland".

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 12 November 1991]: The estimated cost of producing and distributing the justice charter for Scotland is £14,000.

EMPLOYMENT

EC Labour Statistics

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the percentage increase in unemployment in each of the EC countries over the last 12 months.

Mr. Jackson: The table gives the percentage point change over the latest 12 months in the internationally comparable unemployment rates for EC countries, as produced by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. Where such rates are not available, harmonised rates produced by the Statistical Office of the European Communities are given.

Percentage point change in unemployment rates over the latest 12 months in EC countries
Standardised unemployment rates seasonally adjusted

	Percentage point change	Latest month
United Kingdom	3·2	September
Ireland	2·4	September
Denmark[1]	0·9	September
France	0·7	August
Belgium	0·5	September
Luxembourg[1]	0·4	September
Italy	0·3	April
Spain	−0·4	May
Portugal	−0·5	May
Netherlands	−0·9	July

[1] OECD standardised rates are not available for Denmark and Luxembourg. Similar harmonised rates compiled by the Statistical Office of the European Communities (SOEC) are shown for these countries.

Notes:
1. There are currently no comparable rates available for Greece.
2. There are no reliable figures available as yet for the unified Germany.

Heathrow Airport (Signposting)

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will provide extra funds to the tourist boards to promote improved signposting in the vicinity of Heathrow airport.

Mr. Forth: No. The Department does not provide funds either directly or through the English tourist board to cover the costs of directional or tourist road signs. Directional signs are a matter for the Department of Transport or for the appropriate local highway authority. The costs of erecting white-on-brown tourist road signs must be met by the attraction or venue concerned.

Ports (Cargo Handling)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many port businesses employing workers involved in cargo-handling activities which have commenced business since July 1989 have had their operations inspected by the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Forth: Information on cargo handling businesses is not recorded separately from other support services to sea transport by the Health and Safety Executive and would require a manual search of records. This could be carried out only at disproportionate cost. HSE inspectors do regularly carry out preventive inspections of port operations, including cargo handling and other transient activities. This is in addition to investigating accidents and dangerous occurrences and complaints which are reported to them.

TECs and LECs

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received from trade associations about the overhead costs incurred in administering Government funds via training and enterprise councils and local enterprise companies; if he has any plans to change the current funding arrangements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The arrangements for administering training programmes funded by TECs is a matter for agreement between each TEC and the training provider concerned. Funding arrangements for TECs are being reviewed as part of the review of the TEC operating agreement for next year and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State hopes to be in a position to agree any changes with TECs shortly.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he has taken to reduce (a) the bureaucracy surrounding the operation of training and enterprise councils and (b) the costs borne by national training organisations through having to operate the current funding arrangements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has reduced administrative burdens on TECs to a minimum, consistent with the need for proper control of public funds, including the oversight exercised by Parliament. The TECs and national providers unit established within the Department facilitates arrangements between national training providers and individual TECs. TECs have substantial freedom to adapt training and enterprise support to the needs of their local area.

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if it remains his intention to withhold training funding from national training organisations until national vocational qualifications are awarded; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The funding of training organisations for training leading to national vocational qualifications under employment training and youth training is a matter for negotiation between training and enterprise councils and the organisations concerned.

Training Credit Schemes

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he is taking to ensure a degree of standardisation in the administration of local training credit schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The training credits pilots now running in 11 areas throughout Great Britain were selected to test a range of approaches in a number of different environments. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has commissioned a rigorous evaluation of these pilot schemes. The evaluation results will be disseminated to TECs and local enterprise companies to inform the future development of training credit schemes, including any areas where the evaluation suggests that a degree of standardisation may be appropriate.

Ports (Accidents)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many serious accidents involving injury or death of employees have occurred in each major port (a) each year since July 1989 and (b) in each of the previous five years; and how many of these accidents have involved dangerous goods, as defined in the international maritime goods code.

Mr. Forth: This information is not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The total numbers of injuries to employees in ports notified to the Health and Safety Executive during this period are given in the table. Statistics for 1990-91 are not yet available.

Injuries to employees in the sea transport and port and inland water transport industries in Great Britain 1984 to 1989-90

Date of accidents	Number of reported injuries (a)			Number of accidents involving dangerous goods
	Fatal	Major	Over three days (b)	Total	Fatal	Injuries
1984	9	113	N/A	N/A	—	N/A
1985	12	120	N/A	N/A	—	N/A
1986-87(c)	6	144	694	844	—	7
1987-88(c)	13	136	672	821	—	9
1988-89(c)	9	123	655	787	—	2
1989-90(c)	11	94	514	619	—	1

(a) As reported to the Health and Safety Executive's factory and agricultural inspectorates under the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1980 (NADOR) for the years 1984 and 1985, and the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985 (RIDDOR) for subsequent years.
(b) Injuries causing incapacity for work for more that three consecutive days.
(c) Year beginning 1 April.

Nuclear Installations Inspectorate

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether the arrangements for the early retirement of the chief inspector of the nuclear installations inspectorate includes a non-disclosure agreement.

Mr. Forth: The Health and Safety Executive chief inspector of nuclear installations retired on reaching the normal age of retirement. In common with all civil servants, he signed the Official Secrets Act on commencement of his employment and will continue to be bound by it after retirement. This covers the divulging of any information gained as a result of his appointment.

DEFENCE

Unused Defence Establishments

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in tabular form a list of Army, Royal Navy and Royal Air Force establishments in the United Kingdom which are not at present in use but which are capable of being used at up to three months' notice; and if he will specify the number of beds available in each case.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Army Vehicles

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the categories of vehicle among the 400 Army vehicles in London district covered by the contract maintenance scheme; and to which specific units they are allocated.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information is as follows:

Categories of vehicles covered by the London district contract maintenance scheme and their distribution

Vehicle type	Site 1	Site 2	Site 3	Site 4	Total
Car saloon grade A	35	—	1	—	36

Truck van 10 tonne (box body)	8	—	—	—	8
Transit ambulance	—	9	—	—	9
Total	252	62	78	30	422

The vehicles are used throughout London district and the sites from which they operate are:

1. 20 Squadron RCT, Regents Park.
2. 56 Squadron RCT, Woolwich.
3. D Troop, 20 Squadron RCT, Hounslow.
4. Postal and Courier Depot, RE, Mill Hill.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence under what circumstances officers in each of the three services are issued with cars without the services of a driver.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Officers are issued with self-drive cars when this is the most cost-effective means of providing transport to enable them to fulfil their duties.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the lowest rank in each of the three services which confers entitlement to the exclusive use of a staff car.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Entitlement to a staff car is determined by an officer's appointment rather than by his rank. Officers in command of major units are allocated cars, but other personnel whose duties justify exclusive use of a car may also be entitled.

Scottish Division

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the occasions during the last five years when personnel from Scottish Division infantry divisions have been deployed to make up the strength of battalions from other divisions serving in Northern Ireland; and whether any such deployments are planned at present.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Using soldiers from one division to reinforce another is not an unusual occurrence. Over the last five years Scottish battalions have reinforced non-Scottish battalions serving in Northern Ireland on the following occasions:

— 7 soldiers between April and October 1988.
— 30 soldiers between September 1988 and March 1989.
— 10 soldiers between November 1988 and July 1989.
— 4 soldiers between September 1989 and January 1990.

For operational reasons we do not give details of future deployments.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average length of service of trained soldiers in the Scottish Division and in the rest of the infantry, apart from the Gurkhas, respectively.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is set out in the table.

Average Length of Service of Trained Soldiers

Financial Year	Length of Service (in Years) Scottish Division	Rest of Infantry[1]
1988-89	6·9	7·0
1989-90	7·0	7·2
1990-91	7·3	7·4

[1] Rest of Infantry includes Guards and Parachute Regiment but excludes Scottish Division.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the rate of losses of recruits during initial training over the last five years at the Scottish Division depot and in the rest of the Army, respectively.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Wastage rates for the Scottish division depot are not kept separately; the table below shows wastage rates for the whole Scottish Division, compared with those for the rest of the Army.

Wastage of adults and young soldiers within first six months of service

Financial year of intake	Scottish division	Rest of army
	Rate per cent.	Rate per cent.

Sandhurst

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average number of warrant officer and staff sergeant instructors at Sandhurst for each infantry division for each of the last five years.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is set out in the table.

Average number of Warrant Officer and Staff Sergeant Instructors at Sandhurst for each Infantry Division for each of the last five years

Division	1987	1988	1989	1990	1991

Regimental Links

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the artillery and armoured regiments which have recognised links with geographical areas of the United Kingdom, giving the area concerned; and if he will make a statement on the effect of his plans for the Army on each of these regiments.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Current regional links and recruiting areas for Royal Armoured Corps and Royal Artillery regiments are listed in the table below, together with any effects of restructuring on those regiments. We will ensure that the new Army structure covers those regional areas currently covered by units to be disbanded or amalgamated. Timings should be broadly as shown, although there may have to be some adjustment to later dates as detailed plans take shape.

Regiment/Unit	Regional links/Recruiting areas	Changes following restructuring

Infantry Battalions

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish a table showing the tasks for infantry battalions and the units earmarked to fulfil those tasks up to 1997, indicating the number of battalions required for each task and the number of battalions available to be deployed.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Details of infantry tasks and the battalions available to undertake these tasks are provided in the Command Paper "Britain's Army for the 90s". Future arms plot and emergency tour plot details are classified and cannot therefore be provided but, in most cases, tasks are not allotted to specific units as far ahead as 1997.

Ballistic Missiles

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the threat to NATO territory from ballistic missiles deployed by countries other than the Soviet Union and China.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Excluding the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China, the following nations have a ballistic missile capability with the range to hit NATO territory: Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Libya, Poland, Saudi Arabia and Syria. The possession of such a capability does not necessarily imply that any particular country constitutes a threat to NATO.

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he intends to conduct (a) with the United States Government and (b) with the Soviet Union Government about ballistic missile defences.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has no plans to discuss ballistic missile defences with the Government of the Soviet Union. We remain in close touch with the United States on this subject.

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many anti-ballistic missile systems the Soviet Union currently deploys; and where these are situated;

(2) what is his assessment of the range of existing Soviet ABM systems;

(3) what is the maximum number of ABM launchers the Soviet Union is permitted to deploy under the terms of the ABM treaty;

(4) what is his assessment of the current status of the Soviet Union's modernisation programme of its ABM system;

(5) what is his assessment of the improved military capability of the Soviet Union's ABM defences since these were first deployed;

(6) what is his assessment as to the numbers and location of deployments of future Soviet ABM systems.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Under the 1972 United States-Soviet ABM treaty and subsequent protocols, the Soviet Union is limited to a maximum of 100 ABM launchers located within a radius of 150 km around either the national capital or one area containing silo fields. The current, upgraded, Soviet ABM system became operational in 1989. Components of the system, deployed around Moscow, include the short-range Gazelle interceptor and the Gorgon long-range interceptor for engagements beyond the atmosphere. The upgraded system is believed to comprise the full 100 launchers permitted compared with the 64 launchers of the original system. Future Soviet ABM deployments are similarly expected to conform to the 1972 treaty and its protocols or any future renegotiations of the agreement.

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy towards the continuing adherence to the ABM treaty by the Soviet Union.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Soviet Union is party to the ABM treaty and has undertaken to abide by its international obligations, including those to arms control. We strongly support this.

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy towards President Bush's proposal to conduct joint discussions about the development of ballistic missile defences with the Soviet Union.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We remain committed to the six points agreed with President Reagan in the mid-1980s which included our support for negotiated deployment of strategic defences. The latest developments are consistent with this.

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy towards the development and deployment of (a) anti-tactical ballistic missile systems and (b) strategic ABM systems by NATO.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United Kingdom's approach to ballistic missile defences remains based on the agreements reached between the then Prime Minister and President Reagan at Camp David in December 1984 and November 1986. These are set out in paragraph 208 of the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1988.

Free-fall Bombs and Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many United Kingdom free-fall bombs (a) are currently stockpiled or deployed, (b) will be withdrawn from service in accordance with the announced cuts and (c) will remain in service;

(2) what means he intends to make available to international inspectors in order to verify the announced reduction in the number of United Kingdom nuclear weapons;

(3) what information he intends to make available to the House to verify the announced reduction in United Kingdom nuclear weapons.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. Friend announced to the House on 14 October at column 58 a substantial reduction in the numbers of our WE177 free-fall bombs. However, in keeping with the practice of successive Governments, we do not make public detailed information on our stockpile size. The question of verification does not arise.

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to open the United Kingdom's strategic nuclear weapons to international inspection for the purpose of verifying the numbers of warheads and launchers deployed, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United Kingdom's nuclear weapons are not subject to any international treaty and there is therefore no requirement to make them open for inspection.

Tactical Air-to-Surface Missiles

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what systems are currently being developed in the United States which could perform the role of (a) a NATO tactical air-to-surface missile and (b) a United Kingdom TASM; and if he will list them.

Mr. Alan Clark: There are two systems known to be at the development stage in the United States which might have technical characteristics suitable for either a NATO or United Kingdom TASM. These are the short-range attack missile (tactical) (SRAM-T) and the supersonic low-level air target (SLAT).

Soviet Navy

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his Department's policy towards negotiating reductions in Soviet naval power through arms control.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Her Majesty's Government are always willing to consider any proposal aimed at increasing mutual trust, openness and confidence, and enhancing security and stability. In general terms, we consider that negotiations relating specifically to maritime forces would at present be premature, but the possibility of some naval transparency measures is under consideration.

Main Battle Tanks

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of how many main battle tanks the United Kingdom will deploy by 1995.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Once the "Options for Change" reductions have been completed, it is planned to deploy eight regiments of 50 main battle tanks each within the Field Army.

Ulster Defence Regiment

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he intends to introduce legislation to give effect to the merger of the Ulster Defence Regiment and the Royal Irish Rangers.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Existing legislation will be amended as necessary in due course.

Iraq

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what revision he has made of his assessment of the likely date when Iraq was likely to be able to detonate a nuclear bomb following proof that Iraq has detonated nuclear initiators.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We are unable to comment on the sixth United Nations nuclear inspection of Iraq until the IAEA releases the full documentation for analysis in the United Kingdom.

Asbestos

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many claims for compensation because of exposure to asbestos while in the services have been received and rejected because of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Fifty-five.

Frigates and Destroyers

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the average age of the frigates and destroyers in the Royal Navy for 1990, 1985 and 1980.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The average age of the destroyer and frigate force on 1 April of each year was as follows: 1980, 11 years and 9 months; 1985, 13 years and three months; 1990, 12 years.

Royal Parks

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to the security aspects for barracks and other MOD property of the proposed contracting out of the management of the royal parks.

Mr. Heseltine: I have been asked to reply.

The security implications for the royal palaces, public buildings and MOD property of contracting out the garden and landscape maintenance work in the royal parks are considered in the same way as they are whenever a contractor's staff undertakes work in such buildings or their gardens.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 14 November 1991

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Mr. and Mrs. Beurton

Mr. Riddick To ask the Attorney-General what action he intends to take to stop the self-confessed spy Ursula Beurton from profiting from the sale of her book; and if he will refer the case of Mr. and Mrs. Beurton to the Director of Public Prosecutions to decide what case there is to answer in light of Mrs. Beurton's admission in the book that she and her husband were Soviet intelligence officers.

The Attorney-General: The case of Mr. and Mrs. Beurton has been drawn to the attention of the acting Director of Public Prosecutions. Taking into account all the circumstances, in particular their ages, the lapse of some 50 years since any Official Secrets Act offences may have been committed and the context in which they were then operating, the acting Director has decided that it would not be in the public interest to take any action against them in respect of these offences. There does not at present appear to be any basis for civil proceedings in respect of the publication of the book.

Legal Aid Board

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list the names, salaries and former and present occupations of each member of the Legal Aid Board; and how often the board has met.

The Attorney-General: The names and occupations, or former occupations, of the present members of the Legal Aid Board are:

John Pitts (Chairman)—Former Chairman and Chief Executive of the Tioxide Group. Chairman of the Shildon and Sedgefield Development Agency.

Martin Acland—JP, General Commissioner of Income Tax and Former Executive Director of Mercantile Credit Co.

Diana Beale—Advice Worker and member of the National Association of Citizen Advice Bureaux.

Allan Blake—Associate Dean of Leeds Business School. Formerly Head of Department of Law at Leeds Polytechnic.

Lyn Devonald—Solicitor.

Kenneth Farrow—Barrister and Recorder.

Geoffrey Hibbert—JP, former Personnel Director, Shell International Petroleum Co.

David Sinker—JP, Chartered Accountant and Director. Formerly advisor to the National Board of Prices and Incomes.

John Smith—JP, former Personnel Director and Assistant Managing Director, Associated British Ports. Member of Industrial Tribunals.

Peter Soar—Solicitor. Former Chairman of Cambridge Duty Solicitors Scheme.

The chairman of the board is paid £22,930 per annum. All other members are paid £7,109 per annum. With effect from 1 December the salaries will increase to £23,355 and £7,785 per annum respectively. There have been 29 full meetings of the board since 1 April 1989.

Bank of Credit and Commerce International

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Attorney-General how many members of staff are at the disposal of the Serious Fraud Office in dealing with the BCCI issue.

The Attorney-General: The director of the SFO is satisfied that the staff resources available to her are sufficient for this purpose, and that there is sufficient flexibility to enable the fluctuating requirements of current cases to be satisfactorily met. It is the policy of the Serious Fraud Office not to disclose the deployment of operational staff involved in particular criminal investigations.

SOCIAL SECURITY

National Insurance

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he is taking arising from the report on national insurance contributions which his permanent secretary agreed with the National Audit Office.

Mr. Jack: The Department's official response and indications of any action required will form part of the evidence to be given by the Permanent Secretary on 20 November 1991 to the Public Accounts Committee. The formation of the Contributions Agency in April 1991 has already enabled the Department to improve the effectiveness of its management of contributions business by, among other things:

(a) setting financial and business targets and providing an information system to monitor costs and progress

(b) reorganising its operations to centralise contribution correction work which does not involve face-to-face contact with employers or contributors, achieving substantial efficiency savings and tighter control of queries;

(c) developing a dedicated inspectorate with more, better-informed and better-trained staff able to tackle non-compliance, and provide guidance to employers, the self-employed and contributors to prevent errors; and

(d) publicising its contributions business in employer and contributor charters and through conferences and surveys monitoring the agency's performance.

The Department already has in hand a substantial programme of action, which includes the specific issues raised by the NAO report.

Retirement Ages

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards equalising the retirement ages of men and women.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to the statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made in the House on 26 June at columns 997-1006.

Cold Weather Credits

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received from the Campaign for Cold Weather Credits; if he has costed its proposals; and what action he now proposes.

Mr. Scott: We have received a letter dated 17 October 1991 from the Campaign for Cold Weather Credits. Its proposals have not been costed in detail, but it quotes an estimated cost of £500 million per year. We have recently introduced improvements to the cold weather payments scheme for the coming winter by introducing automatic payment based on forecasting as well as actual periods of very cold weather, and by abolishing the capital rule. We will continue to keep this scheme under review.

Social Fund

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will explain the procedure whereby he notifies changes to the social fund directions and the stage in the procedure at which the changes take effect.

Mr. Scott: Changes to the social fund directions are normally made through an amendment to the Social Fund Manual. When an amendment is made to the manual, the date from which it takes effect is indicated by the date on the amendment. This date has in the past been the month and year, but will in future be a specified day.

Five Countries Meeting

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total estimated cost of the five countries meeting on 3 to 8 November being hosted by his Department; who are the delegates and how they were appointed; and if he will publish the minutes of the meetings.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 5 November 1991]: The total estimated cost is somewhat less than £40,000. Delegates are chosen by their own countries and a full list is as follows. As discussions are informal no proceedings will be published.

Delegates

United Kingdom—Department of Social Security
Sir Michael Partridge, KCB, Permanent Secretary
Mr. Nick Montagu, Deputy Secretary, Resource Management and Planning Group
Mr. Alec Wylie, Chief Executive, Social Security Agency, Northern Ireland

Australia—Department of Social Security
Mr. Derek Volker, AO, The Secretary
Mr. Jim Humphreys, National Manager, Operations
Dr. Owen Donald, First Assistant Secretary, Social Policy Division

Canada—Department of National Health and Welfare
Mrs. Margaret Catley-Carlson, Deputy Minister
Mr. John Soar, Assistant Deputy Minister, Income Security Programs Branch
Mr. Ray Laframboise, Assistant Deputy Minister, Corporate Management Branch

New Zealand—Department of Social Welfare
Mr. Robin J. Wilson, Deputy Director-General
Mr. Alan Nixon, Assistant Director-General, Programmes and Services

United States of America—Social Security Administration
Mr. Louis D. Enoff, Principal Deputy Commissioner
Ms. Janice Warden, Deputy Commissioner for Operations
Mr. Renato A. DiPentima, Deputy Commissioner for Systems
[Mrs. Geraldine Novak, Director, International Activities Staff
Mrs. Gertrude Wiggins, International Activities Staff]

Mortgage Assistance

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the comparable figures to those contained in his answer of 22 October, Official Report, columns 577-78, for 1987, 1988 and 1989; and if he will give unemployed claimants receiving mortgage assistance as a proportion of unemployed claimants.

Miss Widdecombe [pursuant to her reply, 7 November 1991, c. 87-88]: The following information was incorrect:

Supplementary benefit 1987

	Number	Per cent.
Unemployed	207,000
As proportion of all claimants receiving help with mortgages		28
As proportion of all unemployed claimants		10
Lone Parents	74,000
As proportion of all claimants receiving help with mortgages		10

The correct information is as follows:

Supplementary benefit 1987

	Number	Per cent.
Unemployed claimants receiving help with mortgages	160,000
As proportion of all claimants receiving help with mortgages		48
As proportion of all unemployed claimants		9
Lone parents receiving help with mortgages	58,000
As proportion of all claimants receiving help with mortgages		17

ENERGY

Standing Charges

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will now introduce legislation abolishing standing charges on gas and electricity consumption; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: No. Standing charges are intended to reflect those fixed costs of supply which do not vary according to the actual consumption.

Royal Portbury Dock

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what assessment he has made of the effects on coal mining employment in each coalfield in the United Kingdom of the development of a coal-importing terminal proposed for the Royal Portbury dock;

(2) what assessment he has made of the effect of the proposed Royal Portbury dock coal importing terminal on the south Wales coalfield in respect of (a) deep mines and (b) licensed mines.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No such assessments have been made.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what consultations he has had regarding a rail link for the proposed Royal Portbury dock coal importation terminal.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: None.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sea Bass

209. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice and powers have been given to officials who will enforce the bass conservation measures.

Mr. Curry: Bass conservation measures are currently enforced by British sea fisheries officers (BSFOs) with powers arising from the Sea Fisheries Act 1968, the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1967 and in relation to fishing boats the Bass (Specified Areas) (Prohibition of Fishing) Order 1990. Advice is given in the context of compulsory training programmes for BSFOs.

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on what dates he listed the sea bass fishing nursery areas; and how many warrants have been issued since those dates to officials to patrol and enforce the conservation measures.

Mr. Curry: The Bass (Specified Area) (Prohibition of Fishing) Order 1990 came into force on 27 June 1990. No new warrants have been issued in respect of this legislation because existing warrants held by officers of the sea fisheries inspectorate acting as British sea fisheries officers (BSFOs) cover all fisheries legislation. Instruments of appointment held by sea fisheries committees' officers trained and appointed as BSFOs include the enforcement of the bass legislation.

Compensatory Allowances

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will give details of how he intends to allot the extra £16·5 million in compensatory allowances payable on hill sheep and cattle in the 1992-93 scheme year.

Mr. Curry: The additional £16·5 million expenditure on hill livestock compensatory allowances for 1992-93 shown in the autumn statement represents the extra money necessary to meet the average 14 per cent. increase in headage rates announced on 11 February 1991. The terms of the 1992 scheme will be announced as soon as decisions have been reached in the light of the autumn review.

Sheep Scab

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases of sheep scab there were in the United Kingdom during the last 12 months; what were the corresponding figures for 1971 and 1981; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: In the last 12 months 160 cases of sheep scab were reported in the United Kingdom, compared with 69 in 1981 and none in 1971.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Occupational Pensions

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many applications for approval of occupational pension schemes were received by the Inland Revenue; and how many were approved in each year since 1988-89; and what was the cost per scheme of approving (a) insured schemes, (b) large self-administered schemes and (c) small self-administered schemes in 1990-91.

Mr. Maude: The number of applications received and approvals given since 1988-89 are as follows:

	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91	[1]1991-92
Number of applications	57,328	50,251	32,347	19,281
Number of final approvals	20,780	30,082	14,178	12,144

[1]To 31 October.

The difference between the numbers of applications and approvals each year is largely a reflection of the need for schemes to amend their rules to comply with recent legislation before they can be approved.

It is not possible to provide a precise cost for approving schemes. Many pension schemes are not capable of approval in the same year that an application is received. Estimated costs for each type of scheme, based on a recent sample of approvals work, are:

	Cost per scheme £
(a) Insured schemes	19
(b) Large self-administered schemes	173
(c) Small self-administered schemes	205

EC Budget

Mr. Ridley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he expects the United Kingdom's gross contribution to the European Community budget to be in 1991-92 and in 1992-93, respectively.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The United Kingdom's gross contribution, after abatement, (but excluding receipts) to the European Community budget is forecast to be £3,827 million in 1991-92 and £5,397 million in 1992-93. The contribution in 1991-92 is lower than it would otherwise have been as a result of a refund of earlier years' contributions and higher than usual abatement.

Economic and Finance Council

Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting of the European Community's Economic and Finance Council on 11 November and of the meetings of the intergovernmental conference on economic and monetary union on 11 and 12 November.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Economic and Finance Council of the European Community met in Brussels on 11 November and the intergovernmental conference on economic and monetary union met afterwards on 11 and 12 November. I represented the United Kingdom at both meetings.

The Council discussed the Italian Government's programme for economic convergence, the first such discussion of a member state's programme under the Council's new framework for multilateral surveillance. The Council focused on the need for improved budgetary discipline.

The Council agreed to bring forward the remaining tranches of the Community's balance of payments loans to Romania and Bulgaria subject to confirmation from the IMF that their programmes for the two countries would remain on track. The Community will also continue to encourage the members of the G24 outside the Community to increase their assistance to the two countries.

The Council also discussed two proposals for aid to the Soviet Union. It was agreed that the existing 500 million ecu food credit should be disbursed as soon as possible. I urged that the Commission's new proposals for a further 1·25 billion ecu loan should be considered swiftly. It was agreed that the Commission should send a task force to Moscow to consider the operational details of the loan and that ministers should aim for agreement on the first tranche of such a loan on 25 November. I stressed the importance of including provision for feed grains in that first tranche. It was also agreed that both loans would allow a substantial element of the food to be bought from Eastern Europe.

A Commission proposal to revise the financial perspective of the EC budget was also discussed but without agreement and the proposal was remitted to the Budget Council for further consideration.

The Council reached agreement in principle on the VAT technical system directive and the administrative co-operation regulation. These provide for the operation of the intra-Community VAT system in the single market, and enhanced administrative co-operation between the fiscal authorities of member states in support of that system. These measures are vital steps toward the abolition of fiscal frontiers in the Community and the creation of the single market. Agreement brings a welcome end to uncertainty, allowing business and others with an interest, to plan with confidence for the completion of the single market.

I again argued strongly that while tax free and duty-free shopping could not be retained indefinitely in the single market a transitional period longer than that proposed by the Presidency was needed. Member states agreed that intra-Community duty-free shopping should continue for almost eight years: until 1 July 1999. This will be reflected in the VAT technical and excise movements and control directives. Agreement on this transitional period allows businesses a reasonable period of time in which to make the necessary changes to their marketing and investment strategies.

Full legal agreement on these two texts was not possible in the absence of texts in all Community languages, and given the need for certain technical clarifications. I made clear that the United Kingdom's agreement was subject to parliamentary scrutiny, which I look forward to completing shortly through a debate on this and the earlier agreement reached at the 24 June ECOFIN. Consideration of the draft excise movements and control directive was deferred until the next Council meeting.

In the afternon of the same day and in the morning of 12 November Economics and Finance Ministers reconvened at a meeting of the intergovernmental conference on economic and monetary union. Three main issues were discussed: economic and social cohesion, the role of the European Parliament, and the institutional provisions for stage two.

I stressed that economic and social cohesion in the Community was best achieved through sound macroeconomic policies and progress on the single market. Many member states agreed that proposals for financial arrangements to promote cohesion could be discussed only in next year's review of the future financing of the Community, not in the intergovernmental conference.

There was a brief discussion of the role of the European Parliament in economic and monetary union. I expressed the view that its involvement should be limited. Economic policy would remain largely a national responsibility under EMU, and hence accountability should properly be to national Parliaments. There might, however, be a role for the European Parliament in scrutinising the activities of the Commission and European Central bank. The role of the Parliament was discussed further at an inter-institutional meeting with MEPs in the afternoon of 12 November.

On the institutional provisions for stage two, there was broad agreement on the principle of establishing a European monetary institute and for developing the ECU.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

School Examinations and Assessment Council

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will place in the Library copies of the responses from local education authorities and the School Examination and Assessment Council made in relation to standard assessment tasks taken by seven-year-olds last term.

Mr. Eggar: The School Examinations and Assessment Council will publish reports of the evaluations which it commissioned from the National Foundation for Educational Research and from Leeds university in due course. It is for LEAs themselves to decide whether to publish their own evaluations.

School Rolls

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will list the number of infant schools with (a) fewer than 50 pupils, (b) 50 to 100 pupils and (c) more than 100 pupils, respectively;

(2) if he will list the number of primary schools with (a) fewer than 50 pupils, (b) 50 to 100 pupils, (c) 100 to 150 pupils, (d) 150 to 200 pupils and (e) more than 200 pupils, respectively.

Mr. Eggar: Provisional information for January 1991 on the number of maintained infant and primary schools in England, by size of school, is given in the table. The primary school figures include infant schools and middle-deemed-primary schools.

	England
Infant schools
Up to 50 full-time pupils	53
51 to 100	237
more than 100	2,368
Total	2,658
Primary schools
Up to 50 full-time pupils	1,294

	England
51 to 100	2344
100 to 150	2,667
151 to 200	3,948
more than 200	8,792
Total	19,045

HMI (French Visit)

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish the report from Her Majesty's inspectors following their visit to France.

Mr. Eggar: Yes, in due course.

School Classes

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of primary school children are taught in classes which cover more than one year group.

Mr. Eggar: The primary school staffing survey carried out in 1987 showed that 28 per cent. of primary school children in England were being taught in mixed age classes. Mixed age classes were defined in the survey as those where more than 30 per cent. of pupils are in age ranges other than the largest for the class.

Primary Education

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the written material submitted to his Department which he is considering regarding primary education.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend is considering a wide range of evidence about performance and standards in primary education. Evidence is regularly available to him from HM inspectorate, and from other sources, much of which is published.

GCSE

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the consultations entered into with (a) parents, (b) teachers and (c) local education authorities prior to his announcement of a reduction in the percentage of coursework in GCSE.

Mr. Eggar: Decisions by my right hon. and learned Friend on the restraint and control of coursework in the GCSE examination take account of consultations with, and advice from, the School Examinations and Assessment Council established under the Education Reform Act 1988 as the Government's principal advisory body in the field of public examinations. The council includes several members with teaching or local authority experience.

Student Grants

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of applications by students for mandatory grants for the current academic year were (a) processed and (b) paid by 1 November.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) on 6 November 1991, at column 134.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Company Administrators

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to introduce regulations to require the administrators of a company to make a full disclosure of their relationship with the company they are administering.

Mr. Redwood: I have no such plans.

Accounting Standards Board

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to introduce legislation to exclude partners from the auditing firms criticised by his Department's inspectors from the working of the Accounting Standards Board.

Mr. Redwood: No.

Departmental Accommodation

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his Department intends to reoccupy 1 Victoria street following refurbishment; and whether his Department will give up any of its other central London accommodation.

Mr. Leigh: My Department intends to move back into 1 Victoria street, following refurbishment, and the intention is to relinquish at least two other central London offices.

Auditing Practices Board

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether his representative on the Auditing Practices Board has received any documents prepared by a working party headed by any partner from the auditing firms criticised by his Department's inspectors.

Mr. Redwood: Yes.

Enterprise Initiative

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for each year in which the quality initiative section of the enterprise initiative has been operational (a) what sum of Government money has been spent, (b) how many separate grants have been provided, (c) what is the average amount provided by the Government for each grant, (d) how many enterprises have applied for and received certification by third party certification authorities confirming compliance with the requirements of BS 5750 and (e) how many grants have been provided to trade associations for the purpose of preparing guidelines and model quality manuals for the use of their members in developing their own manuals.

Mr. Lilley: The information requested is provided by financial year and covers the quality element of the enterprise initiative consultancy scheme.

	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91
Project spend (£ million)	2·8	10·0	13·3
Completed projects	903	3,263	3,782
Average project spend (£)	3,101	3,065	3,517

A recent survey carried out by scheme contractors has indicated that 95 per cent. of firms taking the quality consultancy scheme have applied for, intend to apply for, or have achieved certification under BS5750. To date, under the quality consultancy scheme, one trade association has applied for strategic advice on the preparation of quality procedures common to member businesses.

China

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what checks are made on the importation of products manufactured in the People's Republic of China in order to ensure that they have not been produced in prison labour camps; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Such trade is governed by the Foreign Prison Made Goods Act 1897, as amended in 1988. For enforcement of the Act, the Government have to rely in the main on the private sector or others to supply sufficient information to Customs and Excise.

Enterprise Initiative

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the regional takeup of each of the enterprise initiative schemes; and if he will place copies of such tables of regional takeup in the Library.

Mr. Lilley: Information on regional takeup of the consultancy help available under the enterprise initiative is published in the Industrial Development Act annual report. A copy of the report for the year ending 31 March has been placed in the Library of the house—House of Commons paper number 593. The relevant information is contained in tables 1 to 4 of appendix 25.

Electronics Industry

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effect of the recession upon production and employment in the United Kingdom electronics industry.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 13 November 1991]: There is no official assessment of the effect of the recession on particular industries. However, the electronics industry has made great strides during the last decade in terms of improved growth and productivity and is now very much better placed to take advantage of the upturn in the economy as it occurs.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Lancashire Constabulary

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of police officers in the Lancashire constabulary in 1979 and at the last date available.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In December 1979 there were 3,089 police officers on the strength of the Lancashire constabulary. By the end of August 1991 this had increased by 121 to 3,210 police officers.

Television Franchises

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received from members of the public concerning the process for awarding of the television franchises.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Since the Broadcasting Act 1990 came into force on 1 January 1991, the Home Office has received 25 representations from members of the public; 20 of them have been received since September and were prompted by the Independent Television Commission's announcement of the channel 3 licence awards on 16 October.

Absent Voting

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to ensure that form RPF 7B concerning applications for absent voting on grounds of blindness or physical disability are available in large print, in Braille and on tape.

Mrs. Rumbold We are not aware of any demand for form RPF 7B to be made available in Braille or tape format. If there is such a demand, then we would be prepared to consider meeting it where practicable. We are currently considering the possibility of producing the form in a large print version.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of police stations that are holding prisoners on remand; and how many are being held at each station.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: On Tuesdaty 12 November, prisoners were held in police cells in the following force areas:

	Number
Avon and Somerset	46
Bedfordshire	32
Cambridgeshire	21
Cheshire	44
Cleveland	22
Cumbria	12
Derbyshire	50
Devon and Cornwall	23

Thames Valley	31
Warwickshire	8
West Mercia	35
West Midlands	43
West Yorkshire	99
Wiltshire	31
Total	1,719

Details of the individual police stations in which these prisoners are detained are not collected centrally.

Policing, Docklands

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for increasing the number of police officers based and working in the London docklands.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: This is a matter for the commissioner. But we are satisfied that the Metropolitan police will have adequate manpower, and that the commissioner's plans for their deployment take adequate account of the docklands development.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what consultations he had regarding his Minister of State's visit to Glanely high school, Michaelston road, Ely, Cardiff, on Wednesday 6 November;

(2) what discussions he had with the chairman of the education committee of the South Glamorgan county council and his director of education concerning his Minister of State's visit to Glanely high school, Michaelston road, Ely, Cardiff, on 6 November either (a) before his visit and (b) after the visit;

(3) what was the purpose of the visit by his Minister of State to a school and parish priest's office in Ely, Cardiff, on Wednesday 6 November; how many officials accompanied him and from which sections of his Department; at what total cost; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what consultations he undertook regarding the constituency boundaries of the Cardiff West constituency, prior to his Minister of State's visit to the Glanely high school and other locations in Ely, Cardiff, on 6 November.

Mr. John Patten I will write to the hon. Member.

Dangerous Dogs Act

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will extend the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 to cover rottweiler and doberman pinscher breeds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Section 3 of the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991, which creates criminal offences relating to dogs that are dangerously out of control in a public place, already applies to all breeds of dog including the doberman pinscher and the rottweiler.

Section 1 of the Act, which imposes stringent requirements relating to certain breeds of dog and their owners, applies to types of dog bred for fighting or having the characteristics of a type bred for that purpose. As neither the rottweiler nor the doberman pinscher is a type of dog bred for fighting, section 1 cannot be applied to them.

I have no plans at present to use the reserve powers of section 2 of the Act which enables me to impose restrictions on any breed of dog which I consider presents a serious danger to the public. I shall continue to keep under review the need to use these powers in the light of experience of the operation of existing measures to deal with dangerous dogs.

Homelessness

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been prosecuted for (a) begging and (b) sleeping rought and how many people have been convicted of (i) begging and (ii) sleeping rough in the Metropolitan police areaa during the period from January to October 1991.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) on 13 November at columns 536-38.

Youth Remand Centre (Reconstruction)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposal he has for the reconstruction of Her Majesty's youth remand centre at Pucklechurch or in another convenient location.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I announced on 24 July at columns 598-600 the outcome of a review of the prison estate. This included proposals to close Pucklechurch remand centre in 1993-94, to convert part of Gloucester prison to a remand centre for male young offenders in 1992-93 and to reopen in 1993-94 Eastwood Park, following its closure as a young offender institution in 1992-93, as a female establishment.

We are considering representations on these and other review proposals. I hope to make a further announcement soon.

Hotels (Fire Safety)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to publish new guidance on fire safety in hotels.

Mr. John Patten: Two guides on fire safety in hotels have been published today. The first, a new guide, is entitled "Fire Safety Management in Hotels and Boarding Houses". It is a simple, commonsense and practical guide comprising good housekeeping measures with a check list which managers can use to make sure that their hotels are as safe as possible from fire. The guide has been produced jointly with the Fire Protection Association and the Scottish Office. It is a blueprint for the 1990s and will help to make British hotels and boarding houses the safest in Europe.

The second guide is a technical document entitled "Guide to Fire Precautions in Premises Used as Hotels and Boarding Houses which require a Fire Certificate". It has been produced by the Home Office and the Scottish Office and is mainly aimed at fire authorities although it will also be relevant to all professionals in the field of fire precautions. The guide updates guidance produced in 1972 and incorporates the EC recommendation on fire safety in existing hotels.

Copies of both guides have been placed in the Library.

ENVIRONMENT

Royal Parks

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 applies to apprentices currently employed in the royal parks; and how many apprentices working in the royal parks received redundancy notices.

Mr. Heseltine: I am advised that the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 does not apply to the apprentices currently employed in the royal parks. Redundancy notices have been issued to the 27 apprentices, but before contracts are signed I shall require contractors to enter into a deed to maintain apprentice training in the royal parks.

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the cost and purpose of the work commissioned from land use consultants into the management of the royal parks; and if he will place a copy of their report in the Library.

Mr. Heseltine: Land use consultants have been commissioned by my Department to prepare various reports over the last 10 years on several of the royal parks covering their historical significance, strategy plans for their long term conservation and management, and assessments of staffing needs at the time. Records of the cost of the original historical surveys are no longer available. The cost of the other studies has been £154,000. The reports will form an important framework for the future management of the royal parks by the ground maintenance contractors. I am arranging for copies of the strategy and manpower reports for Regent's park, Hyde park and Kensington gardens, and for the staffing report for St. James's and Green park, to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many registered disabled workers are currently under redundancy notice in the royal parks; and what plans he has to ensure their continued employment by future contractors.

Mr. Heseltine: There are nine staff in the royal parks who are registered disabled and who have received notice of redundancy. All staff who have been made redundant, including those who are disabled, will be granted a job interview with the preferred tenderers, and must be informed of the tenderers' decisions before the contracts are signed. Tenderers will also be required to submit details of their company policy and practice regarding the employment of disabled persons. The Department will therefore be able to take these decisions into account in awarding contracts.

Rifle Club

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the Property Services Agency will complete their work in the Palace of Westminster Rifle Club.

Mr. Yeo: The major part of the electrical work affecting the rifle range has been completed. There will be further minor work next year but disruption will be kept to a minimum and the work is expected to be complete by the summer.

North Sea

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he will take to encourage North sea states to produce a directory of the North sea coastal margin in order to protect North sea ecosystems; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The United Kingdom delegation to the North sea task force will be presenting a draft of our North Sea Coastal directory to the seventh meeting of the task force to be held in Antwerp from 19 to 22 November. This directory has been compiled for my Department by the Nature Conservancy Council, and subsequently the Joint Nature Conservation Committee, in order to bring together informaton on the conservation interest of the coastal zone. It will be a valauble contribution to the next quality status report on the North sea. We very much hope that other North sea states will support similar studies for their areas. Copies of the draft are being sent to interested organisations in the United Kingdom.

Planning Applications

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received during 1991 over the use by planning applicants of untruthful or misleading statements in their applications; what remedies he proposes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: The number of such representations could be established only at disproportionate cost. It is for local planning authorities to satisfy themselves that information given in planning applications is accurate. Under the Town and Country Planning (Applications) Regulations 1988, applicants can be required to furnish evidence to verify any statement made in a planning application.

Boundary Commission

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce his decision on the Local Government Boundary Commission's report No. 608 and recommendations regarding the boundary between Suffolk and Cambridgeshire.

Mr. Portillo: The Commission's final report was sent to my right hon. Friend on 9 September 1991. I regret that its notices informing the public that no decision could be taken for at least six weeks, and it was now open to them to make any representations directly to him, were defective. They have now been re-published, thus extending that period to the end of the year. There will be no avoidable delay in reaching a decision as soon as possible.

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will indicate how many regulations he intends to issue after 31 January 1992, with regard to extending compulsory competitive tendering to more local authority services; what individual services such regulations will apply to; and when he intends to issue the regulations.

Mr. Portillo: The number, content and timing of the necessary orders will depend on the outcome of our consideration of responses to the consultation paper "Competing for Quality—Competition in the Provision of Local Services", published on 5 November 1991, and on parliamentary approval of the provisions in the Local Government Bill.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations and comments he has received, either direct to his Department or through the PA Consulting Group (a) in favour of and (b) against extending compulsory competitive tendering to professional and technical services and if he will publish them.

Mr. Portillo: The publication of "Competing for Quality—Competition in the Provision of Local Services" has launched the process of consultation on our proposals to extend compulsory competitive tendering to professional and other services provided by local authorities. Comments have been invited by 31 January 1992. We shall place copies of non-confidential responses in the Libraries of the House of Commons and of the Department of the Environment.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the cost to his Department of awarding the contract to investigate the viability of extending compulsory competitive tendering to local authority professional and technical services, to PA Consulting Group; at what price other companies submitted bids; and if he will publish the evaluation procedure his Department used in awarding the contract and a summary of the specification.

Mr. Portillo: The cost to the Department was £55,000. The consultants were asked to examine the technical feasibility of extending the legislative requirements for competitive tendering to professional services. It is not our policy to comment on bids or evaluation procedure for individual consultancy contracts.

Local Authorities (Trading Accounts)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he plans to introduce primary legislation to establish internal trading accounts within local authorities.

Mr. Portillo: At the earliest opportunity after the election.

Business Rate

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give, for each London borough, the total uniform business rate collected and the net amount of uniform business rate which is redistributed outside London under the pooling arrangements.

Mr. Portillo: The following is the most useful, information that I can give. In 1991-92 authorities in London, including the City of London, will receive £1,780 million from the non-domestic rates pool and contribute, provisionally, £3,121 million. The table gives the estimated receipts of the 1991-92 non-domestic rates up to 30 September for those London authorities who have made a return to the Department.

Estimated receipts of 1991-92 non-domestic rates 1 April to 30 September 1991

City of London	361,286
Greenwich	16,316
Hackney	36,901
Hammersmith and Fulham	28,628
Islington	46,812
Lewisham	12,030
Tower Hamlets	36,687
Wandsworth	19,263
Barking and Dagenham	17,932
Bexley	14,006
Bromley	21,538
Ealing	37,921
Enfield	25,546
Harrow	14,454
Havering	18,069
Hillingdon	53,478
Hounslow	50,406
Merton	17,248
Newham	23,276
Richmond-upon-Thames	15,140
Waltham Forest	12,268

Red Squirrels

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what research his Department has carried out in the last 10 years into the presence of red squirrels in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The most important national work on red squirrel populations is carried out by the Natural Environment Research Council (NERC) and the Forestry Commission. The Institute of Terrestrial Ecology of NERC collects records of the presence of red squirrels and intends to publish the results in an atlas of mammal distribution in the United Kingdom. The Forestry Commission carries out surveys and maps the presence of red and grey squirrels on its land at regular intervals.

Protected Species

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each of the last 10 years the number of licences issued to take species protected under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, indicating the species involved in each case.

Mr. Baldry: Details of licences issued to take protected bird species are given in the United Kingdom's annual derogation reports to the European Commission under the terms of the EC directive (79/409) on the conservation of wild birds. Copies of each report for the years 1981 to 1990 are placed in the Library of the House.

In the case of non-bird species, 14 licences have been issued in this period to take unlimited numbers of the edible dormouse.

Thamesmead Town Centre

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce his decision on the planning application for the development of the Thamesmead town centre.

Mr. Yeo: The inspector's report is under active consideration and it is hoped to issue a decision shortly.

Wind Energy

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish planning guidelines for local authorities dealing with wind energy planning applications; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Preliminary guidance about this was given in a written answer by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning on 28 March at col. 543. It advised local planning authorities to pay attention to the desirability of energy sources which do not emit harmful gases and to the need to protect the local environment from damage and loss of amenity.

Officials in my Department, the Department of Energy and the Welsh Office are preparing a draft planning policy guidance note about renewable energy which we hope to issue for public consultation later this month.

Council House Sales

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to amend part VI of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 to release capital receipts from the sale of council houses for investment in the provision of new housing.

Mr. Yeo: The Local Government and Housing Act 1989 (part IV, not VI) requires local authorities to set aside part of their capital receipts to meet outstanding loan debt and other liabilities, and this remains a sensible and prudent requirement. It has also enabled a greater proportion of capital receipts to be recycled in the form of new credit approvals to those local authorities where housing needs are greatest. Local authorities are free to spend the remainder of receipts on new capital investment. The balance between debt redemption and new investment is set in regulations and is kept under review.

Wildlife Sanctuaries

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will make it his policy to establish a register of wildlife sanctuaries, hospitals and rescue services, with a requirement that before registration such bodies have suitably qualified members of staff or qualified veterinary consultants who must visit the sanctuaries at least fortnightly;

(2) if he will introduce legislation to ensure that wildlife sanctuaries, hospitals and rescue services are subject to regular spot checks by local authority environmental health inspectors or other appropriately qualified inspectors.

Mr. Baldry: The Government recognise the excellent practical work already undertaken on a voluntary basis by the growing number of wildlife sanctuaries, hospitals and rescue centres. Existing legislation already protects captive animals against ill-treatment. The Government are not persuaded of the case for further statutory measures either for registration or inspection. In this field, it would be preferable for the bodies themselves to develop and agree voluntary codes of practice and thereby avoid incurring unnecessary costs and bureaucracy.

Homelessness

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what grants his Department proposes to give to those organisations in the United Kingdom which will provide shelter and comfort to homeless people over the Christmas period; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: My Department has made £96 million available over three years under the rough sleepers initiative in central London. This has provided 500 places in hostels, with another 400 to come; 500 bedspaces in flats and houses leased from private owners and 250 places—out of an anticipated 1,850—in permanent housing.

We are also providing grants under section 73 of the Housing Act 1985 to over 80 voluntary organisations in England for practical projects to prevent and relieve homelessness.

My officials are also in discussion with Single Homelessness in London about the provision of shelters for homeless people in central London this winter.

Responsibility for housing in Scotland and Wales lies with my right hon. Friends, the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales respectively.

Housing Renovation Grants

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will amend publicity issued by his Department in respect of housing renovation grants to make it clear that the mandatory rights of owners to receive grants are subject to the availability of resources in the local authority; and if he will make statement.

Sir George Young: No. Under part VIII of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 a local authority must approve a grant application for works to make a property fit for human habitation or for works to comply with a statutory notice. There is no provision under the Act to make such grants subject to resource availability.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what decision he has made in respect of the application by Blackburn borough council for supplementary credit approval for mandatory renovation grants.

Sir George Young: Blackburn's application is currently being considered along with the bids received from other local housing authorities. Decisions on these will be announced shortly.

Defective Housing

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action his Department proposes to take under the Housing Defects Act 1984 to assist in the resolution of problems arising from the collapse of balconies at blocks of flats and maisonettes at Rowner, Gosport, originally owned by the Ministry of Defence but now leased to the borough of Gosport or owned by private purchasers.

Mr. Yeo: I am considering whether the housing defects legislation is relevant to this case in the light of the report to the borough of Gosport by the Building Research Establishment. I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Bathing Water

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many designated bathing waters there are in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France and (c) Italy, respectively.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the EC Commission report "Quality of Bathing Water 1989-1990", copies of which are available in the Library.

Tecnazene

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultation he has had with the National Rivers Authority to take steps to prevent the contamination of water courses by the fungicide Tecnazene.

Mr. Baldry: [holding answer 11 November 1991]: With the cooperation of the National Rivers Authority my Department has carried out a survey of Tecnazene and its metabolites in rivers and effluents from potato washing and processing. The Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food has suggested a provisional water quality standard of 1 microgram per litre for tecnazene. The results of the survey, and the NRA's data, have been submitted to the Advisory Committee on Pesticides which is currently reviewing the registration of this fungicide.

RNIB Needs Survey

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the report "Blind and Partially Sighted Adults in Britain—The RNIB Needs Survey"; what action he will be taking in relation to its findings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 12 November 1991]: I welcome the publication of this report, which gives us for the first time comprehensive and authoritative information about visually handicapped people in Britain. It will be of value to my Department when advice is given on the planning of programmes and the delivery of services in which attention is given to the special needs of visually handicapped people.

Local Authority Investments

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each month from January 1991 and subsequently outstanding local authority investments by amount outstanding and the net change between periods using the categorisation that appears in the CSO's financial statistics, and differentiating between those banks which have eligible status and those which do not.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 12 November 1991]: The most recent quarterly figures for local authority investments were published in table 4.8 of "Financial Statistics", October 1991 edition. Figures for the third quarter will be available in the November edition.

Whereas the quarterly information on investments is collected from all authorities, the monthly information is collected only from a sample of authorities. The sample is not large enough to provide reliable figures in the detail requested.

Information on local authority bank deposits used in table 4.8 is collected from banks by the Bank of England on a quarterly basis. Monthly figures, used for the provisional calculation of the local authority borrowing requirement, are estimated from information on all public sector bank deposits.

No separate statistics are available for local authority deposits with eligible banks, which are banks whose sterling acceptances are eligible for discount at the Bank of England. The list of eligible banks, which is entirely a matter for the Bank of England, is determined on a functional basis, reflecting levels of activity and commitment to the sterling acceptance market. Whether or not a bank is on this functional list carries no implications for its competence or credit-worthiness.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each month from January 1991 and subsequently outstanding inter-local authority investments by amount outstanding and the net change between periods.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 12 November 1991]: Information from the Department's quarterly survey of local authorities is as follows. I regret that no reliable monthly information is available.

Local authority investments with other local authorities

	Amount outstanding £ million	Change from previous quarter £ million
1991 Q1	960	−159
Q2	1,335	+375
Q3	1,231	[1]−104

[1] Q3 provisional.

Council Tax

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish an update of his tables showing illustrative council tax bills for 1991-92 with the inclusion of an eighth property band.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 12 November 1991]: I do not propose to do so since the inclusion of an eighth property band makes no significant difference to the council tax figures for bands A to G published on 23 April.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Iraq

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the proportion of Government aid moneys given to the Simple Truth Campaign which was spent on Kurds living in Iraq; and if he will provide a breakdown of how the public moneys provided by the Government were spent.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave on 11 November to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes).

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 14 November.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Tibet

Dr. Godman: To ask the Prime Minister what factors he regards as part of the fundamental human rights of the Tibetan people; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: We believe that human rights, as set out in the universal declaration of human rights adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations, should apply to all people.

Redistribution of Wealth

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards reducing the gap between the richest and the poorest 10 per cent. of the British population.

The Prime Minister: The Government's policy is to improve incentives to work and to save. Over the period 1979 to 1988—the latest available information—real incomes in all parts of the income distribution have risen.

EC Regional Body

Ms. Quin: To ask the Prime Minister what consideration he has given to the proposals to establish an EC institution representing the regions of the EC; what are his proposals regarding United Kingdom regional representation on the body; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: We support proposals in the intergovernmental conference on political union for a new consultative body to represent the regions at Community level. Negotiations continue on the detailed arrangements. United Kingdom representation will be considered after the IGC.

Minister for Youth

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will expressly designate a Minister with specific responsibility for youth.

The Prime Minister: No. The opportunities and problems facing young people are often not specific to that age group, and young people are themselves not a homogeneous group. They can best be served through specific actions spanning a range of Departments.

WALES

Labour Statistics

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many companies in (a) Merthr Tydfil and Rhymney, (b) Mid-Glamorgan and (c) Wales employ more than 200 people; and what percentage these are of the total number of companies in each case.

Mr. David Hunt: Available information is given in the table. The analysis excludes agriculture and horticulture, activity heading 0100, of Standard Industrial Classification (revised) 1980.

	Units employing 200 or more persons	Percentage of all units
Merthyr and Rhymney travel-to-work[1]	40	1·8
Mid Glamorgan	128	1·5
Wales	647	1·1

Source Census of Employment, 1989.
[1] Data for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney parliamentary constituency are not available.

Investors in People Awards

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many companies in Wales have to date qualified for Investors in People awards; and whether he will list them, indicating the number of employees in each company.

Mr. David Hunt: Four companies in Wales have so far met the Investors in People standard. They are:

	Employees
Monsanto PLC (Newport)	480
Tulsa Holdings Ltd (Newport)	176
Pirelli Cables (Aberdare)	152
Quattech Services Ltd (Treforest)	3

Low Pay

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many employees in the constituency of Clwyd, South-West are paid less than £3·40 an hour; how many of these employees are (a) women, (b) part time and (c) in manual occupations.

Mr. David Hunt: Information on the numbers of employees earning less than £3·40 per hour is not available for sub-areas of Wales.

Conwy Tunnel

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what were the causes of the recent flooding in the Conwy tunnel; and what remedies he proposes to prevent further flooding.

Sir Wyn Roberts: There has been no flooding of the Conwy tunnel. The westbound carriageway was closed for two hours on 1 November to deal with a faulty heat/gas detection sensor.

169. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if detergents used for cleaning of the Conwy crossing tunnel will be discharged into the Conwy estuary; and how the discharge will be treated.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Detergents are discharged into the public foul sewer. The type used in the tunnel are of a fully biodegradable kind.

Penmaenbach Tunnel

163. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the anticipated annual cost of the maintenance of the Penmaenbach tunnel arising from the cracks in the lining of the tunnel.

Sir Wyn Roberts: To date, the only maintenance cost associated with the cracking since the tunnel was opened to traffic in June 1989 is about £2,000 for minor remedial works. Future costs cannot be predicted, but are not expected to be significant.

168. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consideration was given in the plans for Penmaenbach tunnel of the possibility of cracking of the lining of the tunnel.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The probability of shrinkage cracking in the tunnel lining was always recognised. The lining's main purpose is to provide a smooth surface to aid illumination and assist ventilation.

Conwy Estuary

167. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the annual quantity from all sources of raw, untreated sewage, presently discharged into the Conwy estuary.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This information is not available. The consented volumes of discharges are entered onto public registers maintained by the National Rivers Authority.

Housing Starts

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many council houses, private houses and housing association houses have been started in each of the months in 1991.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The number of dwellings started by district councils, private sector and housing associations for each of the months between January and August 1991 is given in the table:

	Local authority	Private sector	Housing association
January	42	576	157
February	0	435	196
March	3	589	222
April	20	615	236
May	0	562	172
June	9	786	274
July	0	658	213
August	4	690	155

Roads, Mid Wales

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to build a dual carriageway in mid Wales during the next five years; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: No. Our policy is to undertake selective improvements to the A470 which is the main north-south link through mid Wales. That policy is set out in "Roads in Wales: Progress and Plans for the 1990s". The 1991 supplement to that, published in February, details the substantial programme of major improvements.

Burns and Plastic Surgery

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will now direct health authorities within Wales not to place contracts for specialist burns and plastic surgery outside Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The placement of contracts for specialist burns and plastic surgery is a matter for individual district health authorities. However, it is expected that contracts at the historic level for these services for patients in south Wales will continue to be placed with St. Lawrence hospital, Chepstow. I understand that patients in north Wales are continuing to be referred to specialist centres in England.

Inward Investment

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the percentage of inward investment into Wales which is located in (a) Powys, (b) Dyfed excluding Llanelli and (c) Gwynedd, during the financial year 1990-91; and if he has any plans for increasing this amount.

Mr. David Hunt: Statistics held by Welsh Development International show the following percentage shares of inward investment projects secured in Wales:

	Projects Per cent.	Forecast jobs Per cent.
Dyfed (excluding Llanelli)	2·0	1·5
Gwynedd	3·4	2·5
Powys	2·0	0·4
Total	7·4	4·4

Health Authorities (Capital Spending)

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will indicate the funds he has made available to each of the local health authorities for capital expenditure over (a) the past 10 years and (b) the sum proposed in the present year 1991-92.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The information requested is shown in the table.

Notes:

(1) The discretionary allocation figures given above represent "start of year" allocations. They do not reflect any additional capital resources made available in-year as a result of land receipts or brokerage loans; nor do they take account of any funds which health authorities may have vired during the course of any of the years in question from revenue capital.

(2) The figures also exclude further capital expenditure which has been incurred on behalf of health authorities concerned in respect of major building schemes and the purchase of IT equipment or other major items of equipment by the Welsh Health Common Services Authority.

(3) All figures are at cash prices.

(4) During the course of 1991-92 health authorities will also receive specific allocations for centrally funded developments.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what checks he made before the appointment of Touche Ross as his consultants on the reform of local government in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Selection followed the guidance set out in "Seeking help from Management Consultants" produced by the Treasury and published by HMSO.

Youth Training

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairman of the South Glamorgan TEC concerning the numbers of 16 and 17-year-olds leaving school in 1991 not so far in a job or training place under the youth training guarantee.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State holds regular meetings with the chairman of TECs in Wales. He is satisfied that sufficient financial resources have been made available to the South Glamorgan TEC for youth training provision. The TEC and the careers service are working closely with employers and training providers to ensure that the Government's guarantee is met.

Cardiff Bay Development Corporation

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what guidelines were given for his departmental civil servants and Cardifff Bay development corporation consultants attending meetings with individual political parties on Saturday 9 November.

Mr. David Hunt: If the hon. Gentleman is referring to the Labour party meeting held on 9 November to discuss the predicted effects on groundwater levels of the Cardiff Bay barrage, I can confirm that my Department did not give any guidelines on conduct, and was not represented at that meeting.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Baltic States

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further steps are proposed by the European Community to assist the Baltic states in their efforts to create genuine independent economic conditions and policies.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The Foreign Affairs Council on 4 November agreed negotiating directives for the European Commission to negotiate trade and co-operation agreements with the three Baltic states. These would provide a framework for the liberalisation of trading relations between the European Community and the Baltic states, and encourage the process of economic reform. The Community has also extended its PHARE programme of technical assistance to include the Baltic states.

Sovereign Republics

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements he is making for British representation in the sovereign republics of Russia, Ukraine, Georgia, Azerbaijan, Armenia, Kazakhstan, Tadjikistan, Turkenistan and Kirghizia.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: British interests in these republics are represented by the embassy in Moscow. We are discussing the question of resident representation in Kiev and St. Petersburg with the appropriate authorities. We are keeping the question of resident representation elsewhere in the republics under constant review.

Tibet

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received concerning the policy of the Government of the People's Republic of China to transfer Chinese citizens to Tibet; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A number of individuals and organisations have drawn reports of such transfers to our attention. There is however little or no reliable independent confirmation that such a policy exists. According to the most recent Chinese census figures, over 95 per cent. of the population of the Tibet autonomous region is Tibetan while 3·7 per cent. is Han Chinese.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to propose a United Nations or non-governmental organisation sponsored fact-finding delegation to Tibet in the near future to examine allegations concerning the violation of human rights and the destruction of the environment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has no plans to do so. A number of delegations concerned particularly with human rights have recently visited Tibet, including a delegation from the European Parliament. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister specifically raised Tibet when discussing human rights with Chinese Premier Li Peng in Peking in September.

Departmental Papers

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which of his Department's papers have been made available to the public since 1 October 1990.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Between 1 October 1990 and 31 October 1991, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office—excluding the Overseas Development Administration—made the following papers available to the public on request:

TRANSPORT

Harbour Revision Orders

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his reply of 7 November, Official Report, columns 189-90, if he will name the further two applications for harbour revision orders for which the authorisation of specific works projects fell within annex 11 to Council directive 85/337/EEC, indicating in respect of each with whom he consulted and what procedure he adopted before deciding that an environmental impact assessment was not necessary.

Mr. McLoughlin: The two other applications for harbour revision orders which fell to be considered within annex II to Council directive 85/337/EEC were in respect of Portsmouth Flathouse quay and Portsmouth Mile End quay. In both cases this Department consulted the Department of the Environment about the need for an environmental assessment and they in turn consulted the former Nature Conservancy Council to establish whether the project was likely to have any impact on the SSSI at Portsmouth. In neither case was any significant environmental implication identified, and, having regard to the scale and location of the proposed works, no environmental assessment was called for by the Secretary of State.

Trust Ports

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which trust ports have included environmental objectives in their objectives of sale under the privatisation process.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Medway ports authority has included in their objectives for sale the following objectives:

"consultation procedures with local authorities and environmental bodies will be maintained.

"The Authority would wish to see . . . the continuance of existing environmental and conservation protection."

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many of the trust ports which have submitted schemes for privatisation contain sites of special scientific interest or other recognised designation within their harbour limits.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Tees and Hartlepool port authority, the Medway ports authority, and the Clyde ports authority have sites of special scientific interest within their harbour limits.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport further to his answer of 7 November, Official Report, columns 189-90, which of the 35 applications for harbour revision orders since 1988 contain SSSIs or other similar designation within their harbour limits.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information cannot be provided in the form requested except at disproportionate cost. However, there are SSSIs and areas with similar designations in the vicinity of the following harbours which have applied for harbour revision orders since 3 August 1988:

Bristol
Colliestone
Great Yarmouth
Harwich (Parkestone Quay)
Heysham
Langstone
Manchester Ship Canal
Medway
Newport (Gwent)
Portsmouth

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library in respect of each trust port seeking privatisation a copy of the objectives on the sale as agreed between him and the authority.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 12 November 1991]: Yes.

South Circular Road

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what investigations there have been into the safety of the South Circular road at its junction with Lancaster avenue and Rosendale road, London SE21.

Mr. Chope: As part of a backlog inherited from Lambeth council, the previous trunk road agents, our consultant agents for the A205 south circular road are currently undertaking safety studies at both the Lancaster avenue and the Rosendale road junctions. We expect a report with recommendations for appropriate action to be received early in the new year.

Oxleas Wood

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the EC first suggested that the road proposed for Oxleas wood did not meet the environmental requirements of EC directives.

Mr. Chope: The Commission wrote to the Government in October 1989 about a complaint that it had received alleging that the United Kingdom had not complied with the European directive 85/337/EEC on environmental assessment in respect of the east London river crossing. A response was made to the Commission in December 1989.

This directive is concerned with procedures that member states are required to follow to ensure that the environmental effects of certain projects are assessed. The environmental merits of the east London river crossing are not at issue. That, as the Commission fully recognises, is for the United Kingdom Government to determine.

Association of County Councils Report

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consultations his Department has had with the Association of County Councils over the contents of their report, "Towards a Sustainable Transport Policy", launched on 7 November.

Mr. McLoughlin: My right hon. and learned Friend has written to the Association of County Councils welcoming the report as a contribution to the increasingly important debate on how we should respond to the continuing growth in demand for travel, both in urban areas and between them. We look forward to working together with the Association of County Councils and the other local authority associations in improving the measures available to deal with the country's transport needs.

Hot Air Balloons

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what restrictions are imposed on the flight of hot air balloons over built-up areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Rule 5, paragraph (1)(a) of the Rules of the Air Regulations 1991 provides that an aircraft—a term which includes a hot air balloon—

"shall not fly over any congested area of a city, town or settlement below (i) such height as would enable the aircraft to alight clear of the area and without danger to persons or property on the surface, in the event of failure of a power unit. . .; or (ii) a height of 1,500 feet above the highest fixed object within 2,000 feet of the aircraft: whichever is the higher".

The term "congested area" is defined in article 106 of the Air Navigation Order 1989

"in relation to a city, town or settlement"

as being

"any area which is substantially used for residential, industrial, commercial or recreational purposes".

Traffic Calming

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to clarify the law on the application of traffic calming measures.

Mr. Chope: If road humps conform to the Road Hump Regulations 1990, then they are legal. A clarifying power in the Road Traffic Act 1991 places it beyond doubt that, additionally, the Secretary of State has the power to authorise humps on roads including those subject to 30 mph speed limits or less.

We have been considering the extent to which changes in the law are needed to clarify the powers to provide other traffic calming measures. Amending legislation will be sought at the earliest convenient opportunity.

Trunk Roads

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the trunk road schemes in the United Kingdom for which environmental impact assessments have been prepared under EC directive 85/337/EEC since it came into force on 21 July 1988;

(2) if he will list the trunk road schemes for which draft line orders have been published since 21 July 1988, but which he deemed did not require environmental impact assessment under EC directive 85/337/88.

Mr. Chope: All schemes in the national programme have for many years been subject to a very full environmental appraisal. An environmental statement has been published in respect of the following schemes:

A1 Alconbury to Peterborough
A5 Little Brickhill Bypass

Trunk Roads (Fencing)

Mr. Ground: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the London regional office of the Department of Transport has previously erected wire fencing of the type recently erected along the central reservation of the A4 at Cranford along any other trunk road in London; and what information the London regional office of the Department of Transport or the Secretary of State has on similar use of such fencing on trunk roads in England.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 11 November 1991]: This combination of fencing has been installed along some 24 miles of trunk road in north, west and east London. There is no central record of how much wire fencing of a similar design to that on the A4 has been used on other trunk roads in England.

Mr. Ground: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the cost of supplying and erecting the wire fence recently erected along the central reservation of the A4 at Cranford.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 11 November 1991]: About £125,000.

Mr. Ground: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether any consultation took place with the local authority, the local community, the Metropolitan Police or any motoring organisations prior to the erection of the type of fencing recently erected at Cranford.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 11 November 1991]: The Metropolitan police were consulted in the course of regular liaison meetings and are in agreement with the measures taken. The London borough of Hillingdon, which is the Department's agent for these works informed local residents by letter that the works are being carried out.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Light Rapid Transit Systems

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council what will be the consequences of the proposed legislation on Private Bill procedure for Bills on light rapid transit systems introduced in the current Session.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have been asked to reply.

The Transport and Works Bill published this week does not affect the introduction of private Bills in the current Session. Their progress thereafter is a matter for Parliament.

EMPLOYMENT

Training and Employment

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to provide training and employment for the young unemployed aged 18 to 24 years in Stoke on Trent, North constituency.

Mr. Jackson: Provision of training in the Stoke on Trent, North constituency is a matter for the Staffordshire training and enterprise council to answer. Staffordshire TEC, which covers Stoke on Trent, North, is meeting the Government's requirement of providing an employment training place for people in the Government's guarantee and aim groups who wish to enter ET. The TEC has, in addition, been able to open recruitment to ET for all people who have been unemployed for six months or more. The guarantee group is those aged 18 to 24 who have been unemployed for six months or more but less than 12 months and the aim group is those aged 18 to 49 who have been unemployed for two years or more and those people with disabilities regardless of the length of time of the latter's unemployment.

Female Work Force

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of the work force is female.

Mr. Jackson: At June 1991, the latest date for which estimates are available, 42·6 per cent. of the work force in the United Kingdom was female.

Students (Summer Jobs)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will review the progress made by students who applied for temporary jobs during the long university summer vacation compared to non-student applicants for summer jobs;

(2) whether students applying for summer jobs in the long recess are treated by jobcentres differently from non-student applicants.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make it his policy to take steps to make it easier for university students to secure temporary work during the summer vacation.

Mr. Jackson: I appreciate that the long summer break on limited financial support can be a difficult time for many students and this year there are likely to have been fewer vacancies on offer to them.

The Employment Service, through its network of jobcentres, does all that it can to help students find temporary vacational work. All temporary jobs notified are put on display in jobcentres and many students use these facilities. This service will continue to operate.

HEALTH

Child Labour

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he proposes to take to inform businesses about the risks and penalties relating to employment of child labour.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Section 18 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 sets out general restrictions governing the employment of children under minimum school leaving age. Local authorities may make byelaws under that section to regulate further the hours and conditions of children's employment. The purpose of all the provisions is to enable children to work to the extent that their health, education and general welfare are not adversely affected.

Anyone, apart from the person employed, who is found guilty of contravening the provisions of section 18 or of any byelaw is liable to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale. Local education authorities are responsible for enforcing the provisions and ensuring that they are complied with.

Section 1(1) of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Act 1920 prohibits the employment of any person under school leaving age in an industrial undertaking. This legislation is enforced by Health and Safety Executive inspectors. The maximum penalty on conviction in the magistrates court is £2,000.

Tobacco Advertising

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to introduce legislation banning the advertising of tobacco products.

Mr. Dorrell: There are no plans to introduce legislation to introduce further bans on tobacco advertising. Our system of voluntary agreements continues to provide a flexible and effective way of controlling such advertising. On 9 September my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the conclusion of a revised voluntary agreement on advertising which introduces a range of new controls many of which are designed to protect children.

Health Authorities (Referrals)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to ensure that all health authorities will be able to fund extra-contractual referrals.

Mr. Dorrell: All health authorities have reserves set aside for extra-contractual referrals based on information about patient flows. In addition, health authorities have other uncommitted reserves which can be used to cover extra-contractual referrals. Evidence to date suggests that the reserves will prove sufficient.

Asthma

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people die each year from asthma in the United Kingdom; and what action he plans to take to help reduce this number.

Mr. Dorrell: The table gives the number of deaths in the United Kingdom with an underlying cause of asthma for the years 1986 to 1990. The greater use of self-management protocols agreed between patient and doctor, and the availability of peak flow meters, which give advance warning of an impending asthma attack, on GP prescription, should help to reduce the numbers of deaths.

Number of deaths in the United Kingdom with an underlying cause of asthma—all persons, all ages[1]

Year	Number of deaths

Women Employees

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the NHS's employees are women; and what percentage of trusts are chaired by women.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The latest available data for England relate to the position at 30 September 1990 and show that 76 per cent. of all directly employed staff in the hospital and community health service were female. A total of 17 per cent. of trusts are chaired by women. This represents 5 per cent. of first wave trusts and 24 per cent. of second wave trusts.

Coronary Heart Disease

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the number of deaths from coronary heart disease in Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland, with reference to the number in 1989.

Mr. Dorrell: The number of deaths for which coronary heart disease [1] was stated as the underlying cause of death in Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland in 1989 is given in the table.

Country	Numbers
Wales	9,686
Northern Ireland	4,508
Scotland	18,107

Eye and Dental Checks

Sir Barney Hayhoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will simplify the form filling required of retirement pensioners without other significant income who seek free eye tests or dental checks.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The review of the NHS low income scheme is examining all aspects of the administration of the scheme including the potential for simplifying claim form AG1.

Cochlear Implants

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the total funding allocated to health authorities for cochlear implant operations in each of the past five years; and what funds will be made available in the next three years.

Mr. Dorrell: Funding has been agreed for the three-year period 1990-91 to 1992-93. Details of funding made available in the first two years of the scheme are given in the table. It will continue at a similar level in the third year. Decisions about arrangements beyond 1993 will be made in the light of the evaluation of the programme which is being undertaken by Professor Mark Haggard of Nottingham university.

Central funding of cochlear implant operations

Centre	Funding
	1990-91 (£)	1991-92 (£)
University College Hospital/ Royal Ear Hospital	200,000	220,000
Manchester Royal Infirmary	160,000	190,000
Nottingham General Hospital	160,000	200,000
South Hants Hospital, Southampton	150,000	180,000
Queen Elizabeth Hospital, Birmingham	150,000	190,000
North Riding Infirmary, Middlesbrough	150,000	170,000
Addenbrooke's Hospital, Cambridge	—	180,000

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the total number of cochlear implant operations conducted in the last three years in each health authority; and what assessment has been made of the current waiting list.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not available centrally.

Legionnaire's Disease

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how often, and when, the central heating systems at Broadgreen hospital were checked for Legionnaire's disease.

Mr. Dorrell: Closed water systems, such as central heating, which do not generate aerosols will not infect patients or staff and are therefore not tested for the presence of legionella.

In 1988 the Department issued a code of practice on "The Control of Legionellae in Health Care Premises", published by HMSO, which provides detailed advice and guidance on the design, operation and maintenance of hot and cold water systems, cooling towers and other systems which can harbour legionella. It is for hospital managers to ensure compliance with that guidance. A copy of the guidance is available in the Library.

The code of practice does not, however, recommend routine testing of water systems for legionella on the basis that the bacteria are ubiquitous in the environment. Instead the guidance recommends measures designed to minimise the risks of legionella multiplying in water systems in a way that could cause outbreaks of disease.

Abortion

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much the national health service is now receiving each month in receipts from private abortion clinics for the incineration, on national health service premises, of the remains of aborted unborn children; how many hospital furnaces are being used for incineration of the remains of the aborted unborn; and if he will list them.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not collected centrally.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether private abortion clinics may offer abortions in the United Kingdom to foreign women via advertising in magazines with an international circulation.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is a condition of approval under section 1(3) of the Abortion Act that places must not advertise, outside the United Kingdom, their facilities for the treatment of abortion patients.

HIV

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total number of people who received national health service transfusions of blood contaminated with the HIV virus; how many have subsequently been diagnosed HIV positive; and how many have died.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No individual has knowingly been given HIV-contaminated blood. Measures to safeguard the blood supply against HIV infection were applied when these became known and available.

There have been 50 reports in England, Wales and Northern Ireland of HIV infections in people who received blood in the United Kingdom. All these occurred before the screening of donations was introduced in October 1985. Of those persons infected, 22 are known to have died.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioners in the United Kingdom have refused to treat people suffering from HIV and AIDS; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally.

Community Midwives

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are his plans for reviewing the terms and conditions of community midwives.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: None. These are the same as for other nursing and midwifery staff.

Alder Hey Children's Hospital

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many wards have been closed at the Alder Hey children's hospital, Liverpool, since it became a trust; and how many children are on the waiting list.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not collected centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Ian Hill, the chairman of the Royal Liverpool children's hospital and community services NHS trust, for details.

Incontinence Pads

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 7 November, Official Report, column 256, what statutory provisions exist for charging for incontinence pads by local health authorities to those who are not in-patients or in nursing homes.

Mr. Dorrell: There are no statutory provisions allowing health authorities to charge NHS patients for incontinence pads in the course of treatment. Health authorities nevertheless have discretion to provide the level and form of service they judge to be appropriate.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 7 November, Official Report, column 256, whether he will now provide details of the guidance issued to health authorities on the supply of incontinence pads; and if he will make a statment.

Mr. Dorrell: The NHS management executive issued guidance on the supply of incontinence aids—EL(91)28—on 18 February, and guidance on charging—EL(91)129—on 24 October. In addition, the report of a departmental review, "An Agenda for Action on Continence Services", was issued to the health service with a ministerial letter—ML(91)1 of 31 July—and listed key features of an effective local continence service. Copies of this guidance are available in the Library.

Homelessness

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what grants his Department proposes to give to those organisations in the United Kingdom who will provide shelter and comfort to homeless people over the Christmas period; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The responsibility which the Department exercised last winter for providing emergency shelters for people sleeping rough in central London was transferred to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment with effect from 1 April 1991.

SCOTLAND

Channel Tunnel

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has to assist towards the improvement of the railway system in Scotland from Glasgow to connect with the Eurotunnel; when these proposals will be implemented; and what asssessment he has made of the proposals by ScotRail for such services in 1993.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Investment in railways in Scotland and the provision of services between Scotland and the channel tunnel and beyond are matters for British Rail. My right hon. Friend and I have, however, taken every opportunity to impress on British Rail the importance we attach to the provision of fast and efficient links to ensure that Scotland is able to take full advantage of the benefits the tunnel will bring.

Skye Ferry

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the price of a single fare ticket for a car on the Caledonian MacBrayne ferry crossing between Kyle and Kyleakin; and if he will list the prices for each of the last 15 years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is as follows:

Legal Aid

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of solicitors in Scotland; and how many of them have withdrawn from the civil legal aid service.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The number of enrolled solicitors in Scotland as at 31 October 1990 was 8,510. No reliable information is at present available on how many firms and fee earners currently provide civil legal aid or on whether this figure has changed in the past few years.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations the Legal Aid Board has received from Glasgow Bar Association about the levels of legal aid and the board's procedures for payment; and what has been the outcome of the board's consideration of points made to it.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I have asked the chairman of the Scottish Legal Aid Board to write to the hon. Member on this matter.

Local Income Tax

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the level of income tax supplement which would require to be levied in each region, district and island area to raise the local revenue required for 1991-92 local authority budgets under a system of local income tax, taking into account variations in the tax base between local authority areas.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Approximate rates of local income tax required to replace the budgeted income from the community charge in 1991-92, including rebates and after receipt of community charge grant, are given in the table. The calculations assume resources equalisation—that the yield of 1p in the pound is the same per adult in all areas. It is not possible to calculate equivalent figures on the basis of an unequalised local income tax base.

Note: The local income tax rate for Scotland has been estimated for 1991-92 by dividing the total amount to be raised from the community charge (net of community charge grant) by an estimate of the yield of 1p in the £ on the basic rate of income tax for Scotland. Income from the community water charge is not included.

Cochlear Implants

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list the total funding allocated to relevant Scottish health boards for cochlear implant operations; and what funds will be made available in the next three years;

(2) if he will list the total number of cochlear implant operations which were conducted in Scotland in the last three years; and what assessment has been made of the current waiting list.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Government announced their decision in 1990 to allocate £200,000 over the next three years to establish a cochlear implant programme in Scotland. £150,000 per annum has been allocated to Ayrshire and Arran health board to enable the service already initiated there through public support to be developed and consolidated. £50,000 per annum has also been allocated to Lothian health board to establish a second implant centre for Scotland.

A total of 20 cochlear implant operations have been conducted in Scotland to date. Charitable funding had allowed seven operations to take place at Crosshouse hospital, Kilmarnock prior to central funding in 1990-91. Central funding will enable eight implants per year to be undertaken at Crosshouse hospital and three implant operations per annum in Lothian. A further three operations are expected to be carried out at Crosshouse hospital per annum from charitable funds.

There are currently six people on the short-term waiting list for cochlear implant at Crosshouse hospital who are categorised as urgent cases. The board has also assessed a further 30 people who would be expected to benefit from an implant and another 64 who are considered to be low priority cases in terms of expected benefit. At present Lothian health board has identified six people as suitable for cochlear implant. The board expects to undertake three of these operations before March 1992.

Housing Improvement

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will set out the number of housing improvements and modernisations carried out by (a) Edinburgh, (b) Dundee, (c) Glasgow and (d) Aberdeen district councils in each year from 1974-75.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The available information, as supplied by the relevant housing authorities, is set out in the table.

Comparable information for 1974 to 1978 is not available.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Chief Executives Forum

11. Mr. John Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the purpose of the Chief Executives Forum; and how it is funded.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Chief Executives Forum brings together the chief executive officers of almost 100 public bodies in Northern Ireland. Its purpose is to strengthen communication links and provide a mechanism to share best management practice within the Province's public service. The forum is to be funded for a three-year period by a grant-in-aid from the Department of Finance and Personnel of approximately £100,000 per annum.

Inward Investment

13. Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on current levels of inward investment in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: During the last financial year we have secured 13 inward investment projects involving both the private and public sector. These projects are expected to create 1,294 jobs.

Constitutional Reform

14. Mr. Andrew MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his recent talks with the constitutional political parties in the Province.

19. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has for an early introduction of devolution of government in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions are currently being held between Northern Ireland's political parties and with the Irish Government.

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he intends to carry out any further talks between the interested parties on the constitutional position of Northern Ireland within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friends and the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow. (Dr. Godman).

Select Committees

15. Mr. Stanbrook: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions he has given oral evidence to Select Committees.

Mr. Brooke: I have not given evidence myself in my present capacity, but Northern Ireland Office Ministers including my predecessor as Secretary of State have given such evidence on four occasions in the past three years, most recently on 16 October when my hon. Friend the Member for Wiltshire, North (Mr. Needham) appeared before the Select Committee on Energy.

I am particularly pleased that seven Select Committees have visited Northern Ireland in the past 18 months to look at matters for which I have responsibility. I was able to meet two of those committees during their visit.

Security

16. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the latest terrorist killings in Northern Ireland.

20. Sir Patrick Duffy: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on security in Northern Ireland.

Rev. William McCrea: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the security situation in the Province.

Mr. Brooke: Since I last answered a question on the security situation in Northern Ireland on 11 July, 41 people have been killed in terrorist-related incidents. Of these 36 were civilians, four were members of the Army, including one member of the Ulster Defence Regiment, and one was an RUC officer.

The response of the Government and the security forces to terrorist activity has been and will continue to be firm and resolute. It is already the case that a high proportion of attempted terrorist attacks are aborted because of pre-emptive activity by the security forces. Moreover, in the period from 1 September to 13 November, 115 people have been charged with terrorist-related offences, of whom 14 have been charged with murder and 23 with attempted murder.

NHS Spending

17. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the change in real terms of the annual spending on the national health service in Northern Ireland since 1979.

Mr. Hanley: Net public expenditure on the health service in Northern Ireland in 1991-92 will be an estimated £1,015 million, an increase of almost 42 per cent. in real terms, as measured by the GDP deflator since 1978-79.

Murder Sentences

18. Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will make a statement on his Department's policy concerning guideline sentences for persons convicted of the murder of members of the security forces.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Government are conscious of the great debt which the community in Northern Ireland owes to members of the security forces. All life sentences are regularly reviewed. A provisional release date is set only when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is satisfied that a period appropriate to the nature of the crime, and the offender's role in it, has been served and that the risk of reoffending is minimal. The case of each terrorist convicted of murder is dealt with according to those criteria.

Patients Charter

21. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the application of the patients charter to Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: I aim to publish a charter for patients and clients of the health and personal social services in Northern Ireland towards the end of this year.

Plastic Bullets

22. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has for (i) the continued use or (ii) the replacement of plastic bullets.

Dr. Mawhinney: The security situation in Northern Ireland continues to require the protection of life and property from organised and vicious attacks. No method for dealing with such attacks is entirely free from risk. The plastic baton round provides the security forces with an option in circumstances where the only realistic alternatives are the use of live rounds or withdrawal from the scene and consequent risk to life and property.

The existing baton round launchers are no longer in production and are therefore increasingly difficult to maintain. Careful consideration is being given to a replacement baton round system, although no final decision has yet been reached.

Social Security Offices

23. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the changes he has made in social security offices in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: There have been several significant changes in social security office operations and recommendations in Northern Ireland within the past year. A new Social Security Agency has been set up and the 34 social security offices have been reorganised into 11 districts under new management structures. These districts are committed to the provision of a good quality service to the public.

Engineering

24. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what encouragement is being given to encourage the study of engineering in further education institutions in the Province.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Department of Education encourages further education colleges to provide courses which meet the identified training needs of Northern Ireland industry, including the engineering sector. Engineering courses at colleges have been identified by the Department as a priority area for the allocation of additional resources for teachers, capital equipment and staff development.

Northern Ireland Electricity

25. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the proposals for interconnectors with Scotland and the Republic of Ireland following the privatisation of Northern Ireland Electricity.

Mr. Hanley: Heads of agreement for a 250 MW interconnector between Northern Ireland and Scotland were signed in September by NIE and Scottish Power. NIE hopes to have the interconnector operational by late 1995/early 1996.

The re-establishment of the interconnector with the Republic of Ireland is under review.

Health Care

27. Mr. Temple-Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what co-operation takes place between Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland on health care; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: There have been regular and useful meetings between the Health Ministers for a number of years, I have met Dr. O'Hanlon TD, Minister of Health, on two occasions during the past year. Staff from both Departments meet to review areas of existing co-operation and to examine the possibilities for further co-operation as and when the need arises. There are also exchanges between chief executives and managers and long-standing co-operation between professional staff north and south.

The arrangements for co-operation cover the whole spectrum of health care and discussions and initiatives have included health promotion; the provision of highly specialised treatments to each other's patients; joint emergency planning exercises; the export of health care services to other countries and the purchasing of equipment and supplies.

Co-operation of this nature has been of mutual benefit to both health services and the populations they serve.

Student Support

28. Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he will take to improve the financial situation of many students to enable them to continue third level education apart from the student loans regime.

Dr. Mawhinney: The total resources—grant plus loan—available to each full-time student for the 1991-92 academic year have been increased by 6 per cent. The availability of this support, together with new and more flexible access fund arrangements, should mean that no student need suffer undue financial hardship.

Electricity Privatisation

29. Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he intends to publish his Bill to privatise the Northern Ireland electricity industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Following an extended and thorough consultation period, I have recently authorised the draft Electricity (Northern Ireland) Order to be laid before Parliament. I anticipate that it will be printed and available to the House before the end of November. The draft order is based on the Electricity Act 1989 and I am convinced that it will bring lasting benefits to electricity consumers in Northern Ireland.

Employment

Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the levels of employment in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: At June 1991, the latest date for which figures are available, there were an estimated 525,680 employees in employment plus approximately 75,000 self-employed people. This represents an increase of almost 25,000 employees and 40,000 self-employed people over the past five years.

Traffic Flow, Limavady

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many vehicles per day use the one-way section of Catherine street, Limavady; what are the highest and lowest hourly flows; and how many of these vehicles are in each of the categories used in road traffic surveys.

Mr. Hanley: The information is not available in the form requested. On 3 May 1991 the highest hourly flow was 1,121 vehicles.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many vehicles per day use Linen Hall street, Limavady; what are the highest and lowest hourly flows; how many of those vehicles there are in each of the categories used in road traffic surveys; and at what level of hourly traffic flow he would assess this street to be at its maximum possible number.

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that he was given by my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) on 9 January 1990, Official Report, column 577. More recent information is not available in the form requested. On 3 May 1991 the highest hourly flow was 951 vehicles.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table to show for (a) the Roe bridge, Limavady and (b) the Roe bridge, Dungiven, the number of vehicles per day, the highest hourly flow and the lowest hourly flow; and how many of those vehicles are in each case in each category used in traffic surveys for each of the bridges in question.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is as follows:

Location	Date of last survey	Number of vehicles per day	Lowest hourly traffic flow	Highest hourly traffic flow	Number of heavy goods vehicles per day
Roe bridge, Limavady	14 August 1991	14,691	17	1,503	1,836
Roe bridge, Dungiven	20 September 1991	8,125	6	847	894

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many vehicles per day use the two way section of Irish Green street, Limavady; what are the highest and lowest hourly traffic flows; and how many of these vehicles are in each of the categories used in road traffic surveys.

Mr. Hanley: The information is not available in the form requested. On 3 May 1991 the highest hourly flow was 725 vehicles.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the last three traffic surveys were carried out on (a) the Roe bridge, Dungiven, (b) the Roe bridge, Limavady, (c) Linen Hall street, Limavady, (d) the one-way section of Catherine street, Limavady and (e) the two-way section of Irish Green street, Limavady; and what is his estimate of the change in traffic flows at each of those places since the last survey was carried out.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is as follows:

Location	Date for last Three Surveys
Roe bridge, Dungiven	February 1991, May 1991, September 1991
Roe bridge, Limavady	January 1991, April 1991, August 1991
Linenhall Street, Limavady	June 1986, September 1989, May 1991
Catherine Street, Limavady	June 1986, September 1989, May 1991
Irish Green Street, Limavady	June 1985, June 1986, May 1991

There has been no significant change in traffic volumes at these locations since the last surveys were carried out.

Local Enterprise Development Unit

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what sums have been paid in each of the last three years by the Local Enterprise Development Unit for consultancy fees in respect of clients seeking assistance from the Local Enterprise Development Unit; and what percentage of the grant aid paid to those clients in each of those years these fees represent.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested in relation to consultancy fees, expressed as a percentage of the total grants paid to clients in each of the last three years, is given in the table:

Year	Consultancy Fees £'000	Fees as a percentage of Total Grant Aid per cent.
1988-89	713	3·5
1989-90	641	2·4
1990-91	507	1·6

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Republican remand prisoners there were in Crumlin road prison every year from 1976 until the present date.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information requested is not available.

Rates Collection

139. Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what total sums were collected by the Housing Executive in respect of rates for the Department of the Environment in each of the last three years for which figures are available; what was the cost of collection; what sums were transferred to the rates after the costs of collection were deducted; and how many dwellings were involved in each of those years.

Mr. Hanley: I have been informed by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive that it is not possible to disaggregate the total value of rates collected as both rent and rates are collated and collected as one amount. This also applies to the cost of rate collection.

The Housing Executive has an agreement with the Department of the Environment (NI) under article 21(a) of the Rates (NI) Order 1977 by which it pays the rates chargeable in respect of each of its properties whether they are occupied or not. The executive receives an allowance of 10 per cent. when payment in full is made on or before the prescribed date in the agreement.

Over the last three years the rates paid by the executive to the Department were as follows:

Net Rates Paid

Years	£'000
1988-89	31,321
1989-90	33,912
1990-91	35,827

The number of properties involved were:—

Rateable Properties

Year	Number
At 31 March 1989	180,576
At 31 March 1990	176,097
At 31 March 1991	172,032

Social Fund

Mr. Bendall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether any additional funds are to be made available for social fund payments in Northern Ireland in the current financial year.

Mr. Hanley: I am glad to be able to announce that the budgets of all district offices are being increased by a total of £1 million for loans and £0·4 million for community care grants. Details of the revised budgets are being placed in the Library. These increases are additional to any extra expenditure which may be incurred on automatic cold weather payments under the greatly improved arrangements which will apply during the approaching winter.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has reached a decision on the Royal Ulster Constabulary's manpower bid.

Mr. Brooke: I have today conveyed to the Police Authority for Northern Ireland the statutory approval required under section 6 of the Police Act (Northern Ireland) 1970 for an increase in the total strength of the RUC regular force from 8,250 to 8,489 and of the full-time RUC reserve from 3,000 to 3,202. My approval of this increase in the RUC establishment of 441 extra officers endorses the decision of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland to support in full the Chief Constable's request for additional manpower. It will now be for the authority and the Chief Constable to make arrangements for the new officers to be recruited and trained; but I understand that it will be possible for that process to start immediately.

DEFENCE

Press Reports

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the remarks of Admiral Sir Julian Oswald concerning the safety of Royal Navy marine nuclear reactors, the operational condition of Polaris submarines and the dunking, naming and in service dates of the first Trident submarine, reported in The Times of 29 October 1991, were agreed with his Department before publication.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As is the normal practice, Ministers agreed in advance that Admiral Oswald should give an interview; and Ministers take responsibility for all interviews properly given by senior serving officers and officials.

HMS Vanguard

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the planned in service date for HMS Vanguard of December 1994 became declassified information.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: It remains our practice not to make public the exact date upon which a warship becomes operational.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the planned dates of the first dunking and the official naming ceremony of HMS Vanguard.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: It is not our practice to make public the precise dates of submarine construction and related programmes.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence who it is planned to carry out the official naming ceremony for HMS Vanguard.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: We expect to be able to make an announcement nearer the time of the event.

Polaris Submarines

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make a decision over any further refits for Polaris submarines.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not the usual practice to disclose details about the nuclear submarine refit programme.

Staff Cars

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current total requirement for (a) grade A and (b) grade B staff cars in each service, and for civilians employed by his Department; and how many procurement authorisations for such vehicles were given in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Alan Clark: Current total requirements for grade A and grade B staff cars are:

	Grade A	Grade B
Royal Navy	47	332
Army	88	1,017
Royal Air Force	30	753

Vehicles used by MOD civilians are included in service totals, but there is no fixed allocation. Procurement authorisations in the last financial year were:

	Number
Grade A staff cars	0
Grade B staff cars	451

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate how many service personnel in each service are allocated to (a) driving and (b) maintaining staff cars; and what is the approximate annual cost.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: All service personnel in possession of a valid driving licence may be called upon to drive a service vehicle. Maintenance of staff cars is carried out with that of other service vehicles. The work is performed by MOD civilian and military staff, and contractors.

Nuclear Weapon Safety

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will identify those nuclear weapon safety arrangements in force in the United Kingdom which Dr. Sidney Drell recommended in the United States House of Representatives Armed Services Committee panel on nuclear weapons safety as a model for the United States to follow; and what assistance or information was given by his Department to the panel.

Mr. Alan Clark: Section III Of Dr. Drell's report recommends setting up an advisory committee similar in function to our own nuclear weapons safety committee. On the question of assistance or information given by my Department, I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave to the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) on 28 June, Official Report, column 581.

Menwith Hill Station

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what security personnel he provides at Menwith Hill station and at Hunter's Stones post office tower; at what cost in each of the past three years, to date; and how many security staff are provided at each location.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: MOD police and civilian patrolmen are employed at Menwith Hill. Security at the Hunter's Stones site is not the responsibility of the MOD.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people, in each of the last three years, to date, have been issued with summonses for trespass and other breaches of byelaws at Menwith Hill station; in how many cases such people have been (a) fined, (b) found not guilty and (c) had summonses withdrawn.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will write to the hon. Member.

Depleted Uranium

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what health and safety guidelines have been issued to those service personnel whose duties will bring them into contact with depleted uranium;

(2) what information has been given to service personnel deployed in Kuwait about the health and safety risks involved in clearing depleted uranium munitions;

(3) what steps he has taken to minimise the health and safety risks associated with the clearance of depleted uranium munitions.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Existing service procedures and instructions cover the health and safety aspects of the handling, transport and storage of ammunition containing depleted uranium. In addition, specific advice on the detection and clearance of depleted uranium was provided to British forces involved in clearing ordnance in Kuwait.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the health and safety risks resulting from (a) the chemical toxicity of depleted uranium and (b) the radioactivity generated by depleted uranium.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The explanatory memorandum on anti-armour ammunition with depleted uranium penetrators which was placed in the Library of the House in March 1979 makes it clear that depleted uranium has a chemical toxicity similar to that of lead and is a material of low radioactivity. The properties of depleted uranium have been taken into account in the procedures adopted for its transport, handling and storage.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what reports he has received from the Atomic Energy Authority regarding the health risks associated with the use of depleted uranium during the Gulf conflict.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence has a copy of a commercially produced, theoretical appraisal by Atomic Energy Authority Technology of the possible consequences of the use during hostilities in the Gulf of ammunition containing depleted uranium. The assessment of the situation in Kuwait is a matter for the Kuwait Government. Her Majesty's Government have not received a request for assistance with the production of such an assessment.

Armoured Divisions

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 8 November, Official Report, column 297, in what form information on the percentage change in capabilities of British armoured divisions is held.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Assessments of the percentage increase in 1st Armoured Division's future capability were carried out as part of the Ministry of Defence's examination of our defences for the 1990s. There is no requirement for a comparable historical analysis and, therefore, no information is held on the percentage change in capabilities of British armoured divisions.

Army Personnel

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current proportion of Army personnel who are (a) private soldiers, (b) non-commissioned officers and (c) officers, respectively.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A total of 36 per cent. of the Army are currently serving as private soldiers, 52 per cent. are non-commissioned officers and 12 per cent. are officers.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current proportion of Army personnel with (a) the Corps of Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers, (b) the Royal Corps of Signals and (c) the Corps of Royal Engineers.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A total of 10 per cent. of the Army are currently serving in the REME and 10 per cent. in the Royal Engineers; 8 per cent. are serving in the Royal Corps of Signals.

Service Accommodation

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total maintenance backlog of (a) unavoidable and essential repairs and (b) urgent repairs for service accommodation as of 1 April.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Information in the form requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Post-service Training

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 8 November, Official Report, column 296, when work began on the production of a guide detailing services available to personnel after they have left the service; and if he will place a copy of the guide in the Library when it is completed.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Work on preparation of the guide began on 11 September 1991. I shall arrange for copies of it, and of the revised Employment Service booklets, to be placed in the Library when they are completed.

Southern Africa

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British military personnel have been killed in southern Africa during the last five years; and what were the circumstances of their deaths.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There have been four deaths since 1 January 1986; a staff sergeant was killed in a climbing accident in Botswana in February 1986; two corporals were killed in a road traffic accident in Namibia in March 1989; a sergeant died in a further road traffic accident in Zimbabwe in September 1990.

Helicopters

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make available to police forces helicopters that are surplus to the needs of the armed forces and encourage Army helicopter pilots who may be facing early redundancy to seek to transfer to the police service.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We do not, at present, have surplus helicopters, nor do we expect to have to make Army helicopter pilots redundant.

TRANSPORT

United States Cabotage Regulations

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to obtain the agreement of the United States Government to eliminate their cabotage regulations preventing United Kingdom airlines from developing feeder networks within the United States of America; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Discussions with the United States Government are taking place about possibilities for the liberalisation of transatlantic air services. Our aim is to remove unnecessary regulation and obstacles to fair competition between airlines, and United States cabotage restrictions are among those being discussed.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Clubs (Registration)

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many convictions have been obtained as a result of prosecutions brought under article 39 of the Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Order 1987 since 1 February 1988;

(2) how many prosecutions have been brought under article 39 of the Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Order 1987 since 1 February 1988.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information requested is as follows:

	Prosecutions	Convictions
1988	3	—
1989	1	1
1990	—	—
[1]1991	—	—

[1] Figures not yet available.

Owen and James Carragher

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what date the firm of Robins AHW Ltd., loss adjusters, was appointed to deal with compensation claim ASC 24337/45 submitted on behalf of Owen and James Carragher.

Dr. Mawhinney: The letter of appointment was issued on 13 September 1991.

RUC Constables

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the average annual wage received by a constable in the RUC; and how much overtime he or she is likely to do during 12 months.

Dr. Mawhinney: I am advised by the Police Authority for Northern Ireland that the annual average wage received by a constable in the RUC is £30,370. This figure includes allowances and average overtime of 540 hours per year.

Economy

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current financial subvention made to Northern Ireland; and if he will break it down into the relevant parts of the economy that benefit.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 14 November 1991]: The figures for the subvention from the United Kingdom to Northern Ireland for 1990-91 are as follows:

	1990-91 outturn £ million
Grant in aid under the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973	1,066
Expenditure by Northern Ireland Office	699
Expenditure by Northern Ireland Court Service	28
Contribution from the Great Britain National Insurance Fund	225
Total Subvention	2,018

The grant in aid is a general contribution to revenue and is not hypothecated to any particular area of public expenditure.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Airports (Terrorism Checks)

Mr. John P. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy on counter-terrorist checks at airports.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Under schedule 5 to the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, the police may examine and detain any person who has arrived in or is seeking to leave Great Britain or Northern Ireland by ship or aircraft for the purpose of determining whether he or she appears to be or to have been concerned in the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism. Controls unde schedule 5 to the 1989 Act are operated selectively by special branch officers at designated airports throughout the United Kingdom. The Government believe that port controls are an essential part of the national response to the threat of terrorism and they must remain in place as long as the circumstances require.

Mr. John P. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what level of Government resources were devoted to counter-terrorist checks at Cardiff Wales airport six months ago; and what is the level at the current time.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: It is not the practice to disclose the size of special branch units at ports and airports. However, the costs of such units are met by the respective police authorities, subject to the payments of specific grant by my Department at a rate in the case of provincial forces of 51 per cent.

Illegal Drugs (Wales)

Mr. John P. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the South Wales constabulary on the penetration of illegal drugs into Wales from abroad.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. Police forces throughout the United Kingdom make every effort to tackle drug trafficking.

Glanely School

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place a copy in the Library of his report and conclusions on his visit to Glanely comprehensive school on 6 November; and if he will supply a copy of the same report to the chairman of the education committee of South Glamorgan county council.

Mr. John Patten: I will write to the hon. Member.

Criminal Injuries Compensation Board

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the outstanding number of cases before the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board; and how much compensation has been paid for each year in the last 10 years.

Mr. John Patten: At the end of October 1991, 80,404 cases were outstanding of which 58,645 were awaiting decision by a member of the board or the staff, 10,020 were awaiting the applicant's response to an offer, and 11,739 were awaiting an oral hearing.

Compensation paid in each of the last 10 years was as follows:

1981-82	21,976,696
1982-83	29,444,675
1983-84	38,820,772
1984-85	35,293,451
1985-86	41,559,996
1986-87	48,241,764
1987-88	52,042,581
1988-89	69,381,286
1989-90	72,721,563
1990-91	[1]109,330,303

[1] Provisional figure.

Immigration

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many cases since 1989 the Home Secretary has overturned a decision by immigration officers at the ports following representations by hon. Members to allow passengers into the country.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is not available centrally.

Staffordshire Police

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what immediate steps he intends to take to remedy the understaffing of the Staffordshire police force; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend has approved eight additional police posts for Staffordshire as from 1 October 1991, bringing the establishment to 2,211. There were 15 vacancies at the end of October, bringing the force within 1 per cent. of its establishment.

It is for the Staffordshire police authority to determine the level of manpower required, subject to my right hon. Friend's approval. The authority has made an application for 20 additional police posts in 1992-93; my right hon. Friend will make an announcement on the allocation of additional police posts for 1992-93 shortly.

Isle of Man

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent agreements have been reached between Her Majesty's Government and the Isle of Man about adjustments of territorial waters.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: As my right hon. Friend announced on 1 August, Her Majesty's Government and the Isle of Man Government have agreed terms for the extension of the provisions of the Territorial Sea Act 1987 to the Isle of Man. An order in Council extending the territorial sea around the Isle of Man from three to 12 miles came into force on 2 September.

Police Discipline Appeals

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average time take by appeals tribunals considering police discipline measures in England and Wales; and what proportion of recommendations made by them are (a) accepted and (b) rejected by him.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: During the year ended 31 October 1991 it took an average of 14·7 weeks for an appeal tribunal to make its recommendations known to my right hon. Friend. Over the same period my right hon. Friend accepted the recommendations in 30 cases (81 per cent.) and rejected those relating to the level of punishment in 7 (19 per cent.).

Operation Burlington

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will supply the figures for the number of people (a) arrested, (b) charged and (c) convicted of a criminal offence under Operation Burlington conducted by the Metropolitan police in 1991;

(2) if he will list the offences under which people were charged when arrested under Operation Burlington conducted by the Metropolitan police in 1991.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that under Operation Burlington and its successor, Operation Taurus, 817 people have been arrested, of whom 702 have been charged with one or more of the following criminal offences:

Offence	Charge
Begging	Section 4 Vagrancy Act 1824

Hippy Convoys

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue guidance to police forces on means of improving the information which is passed between police forces on the existence and movement of hippy convoys during the summer months.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. I understand that chief constables already make arrangements for the collection and dissemination of such information.

Executive Agencies

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy on answering parliamentary questions in respect of bodies given agency status.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I or the responsible Minister will reply on agency policy issues and on any other matters which do not fall within the responsibility of the chief executive. The chief executives will reply on matters within their areas of responsibility, because they are best placed to do so. This policy is described in the framework documents of the United Kingdom Passport Agency and the Forensic Science Service, copies of which were placed in the Library in April. It has been recently restated in the Government's reply to the seventh report from the Treasury and Civil Service Committee (Cm 1761).

Police Establishment

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the authorised establishment figure for each police force in England and Wales; and what was the actual strength on the last day for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is set out in the table.

As at 31 August 1991	Authorised Establishment[1]	Strength

[1] Police establishments are those approved for 1990-91, so as to be compatible with the latest strength figures. Establishments for 1991-92 were increased from 1 October 1991.

Auto Crime

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons convicted of taking away vehicles without consent were given custodial sentences of up to three years' imprisonment in each of the five years before the penalty was reduced to six months in the Criminal Justice Act 1988.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is given in the table. Of those sentenced, about 3 per cent. in each year received a sentence of over six months in custody.

Prisoners (Police Cells)

130. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the latest available figures showing the average number of prisoners being held in police cells per day in each police authority area.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The average number of prisoners held in police cells in each police force for the period 28 October to 8 November are as follows:

	Number
Avon and Somerset	42
Bedfordshire	26
Cambridgeshire	23
Cheshire	40

West Yorkshire	104
Wiltshire	22

132. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are being kept in police cells as a direct result of the dispute at Her Majesty's prison, Cardiff.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The industrial action at Cardiff was temporarily suspended with effect from 5 November. On 8 November, the latest date for which figures are available, 178 prisoners in police cells were from courts in Cardiff prison's catchment area.

Joyriders

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if persons killed or injured by joyriders are covered by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 7 November 1991]: The criminal injuries compensation scheme applies where injury or death is caused by a deliberate attempt to run the victim down. Otherwise, claims for compensation for death or injury arising from the use of a stolen vehicle are dealt with by the owner's insurers or by the Motor Insurers' Bureau.

HEALTH

District General Hospitals

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many district general hospitals there are currently in each of the health districts in Greater London; and what are the numbers of residents in each of those districts.

Mr. Dorrell: There is no agreed definition of a district general hospital. Acute hospital services may be provided to a district from single site or multiple site general hospital facilities which may or may not be supplemented by specialist or single specialty hospitals. The available relevant information is given in the table.

Pensioners

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimates he has made of the number of additional pensioners in receipt of the retirement pension who will be in receipt of income support arising from the recent uprating statement and as a consequence will be eligible for (a) free eye tests, (b) free dental check and (c) any other health entitlements, giving the number and projected costs by category and funding source in each case.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A breakdown by age is not available.

Cot Deaths

Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what advice is now given to parents on the avoidance of cot deaths; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what progress is being made in reducing the incidence of cot deaths.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The rate of cot death has been coming down over recent years, from 2·35 per 1,000 live births in 1988 to 1·81 in 1990. We welcome this reduction, and hope to see a further reduction following the advice contained in a press release issued by the Government's chief medical officer on 31 October. The press release was widely taken up in the national press.

The advice that is now given to parents is that the risk of cot death can be reduced if babies are not placed on their tummies when they are going to sleep. This advice is based on the recommendations of a group of experts set up by the chief medical officer to advise him on the results of several recent studies carried out in this country and abroad.

The chief medical officer took the opportunity to reiterate advice which had been offered previously: to keep babies warm, but avoid overheating; to avoid tobacco smoke; and to ensure good ventilation and to follow good hygiene.

The Health Education Authority is ensuring that this advice is incorporated in the text of its publications the "Pregnancy Book" and "Birth to Five", copies of which are distributed to first-time mothers and parents. All health professionals are being sent a letter from the chief medical officer and chief nursing officer respectively setting out the new advice in more detail. Contact between parents and health professionals is the key channel for communicating advice on reducing the risks of cot death. The Department is considering urgently whether any further action is needed.

Brompton Hospital

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the investigations made at the Brompton hospital into the use of NHS services for private patients.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I understand that no substantive evidence has been found to support such allegations.

Pharmaceutical Plants (Inspections)

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish inspection reports on pharmaceutical plants for the years 1986 to 1988 carried out by the Medicines Control Agency.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Section 118(1) restricts the disclosure of "any information with respect to any manufacturing process or trade secret" obtained on inspection. Details of inspection reports on pharmaceutical companies by the Medicines Control Agency are not, therefore, published.

Childcare

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much free childcare provision is available through the state.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information available centrally about total local authority provision of day care for the under fives is set out in the table. Information is not collected centrally about how much of the total provision is free. Following the implementation of the Children Act 1989, the Department will be collecting information about provision made for children under eight.

	Number at 31 March 1990
Children on the register of local authority day nurseries	32,413
Children placed and paid for by local authorities in non-local authority day nurseries	1,788
Children on the register of local authority playgroups	2,525
Children placed and paid for by local authorities in non-local authority playgroups	11,556
Places with childminders sponsored by the local authority	1,889
Children placed and paid for by local authority with registered childminders not provided by the local authority	5,492

Ships (Public Health Reports)

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many reports made by port health officials into matters relating to public health on ships passing between the United Kingdom and the United States of America and departing the port of Southampton were made public in the year 1990.

Mr. Dorrell: None.

Drugs

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to extend the patent life of new drugs developed in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The United Kingdom, along with some other member states, considers the present EC proposals to be overgenerous, but is committed to working constructively towards a satisfactory outcome.

Social Work Students

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make available to local authorities the specific funding for social work student placements which is available to voluntary and private agencies;

(2) what action he is taking to ensure that local authorities provide an adequate number of social work placements for students on the course leading to the Diploma in Social Work.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is the responsibility of local authorities as employers to ensure that they have adequate numbers of suitably qualified social work staff. Authorities must, therefore, plan to make available sufficient good quality practice placements for students on social work qualifying courses and to honour agreements to do so into which they have entered as partners in Diploma in Social Work programme provider consortia.

Funding for practice placements is made available to local authorities through the revenue support grants, and we have also allowed authorities to use the training support programme to fund additional placement days. In recognition of the importance which we attach to securing practice placement provision, we have provided CCETSW with £1·85 million (rising to £2·5 million in 1993-94) for a practice placements initiative which will enable additional practice teachers to be appointed.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consideration has been given to using the training support programme for social work student placements in local authorities.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Practice placements for social work students are already eligible expenditure under the training support programme. In 1990-91 over 16,800 additional practice placements days were funded from TSP.

Medical Negligence (Legal Action)

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many national health service consultant obstetricians are currently facing legal action relating to possible medical negligence; and if he will also give the figure for orthopaedic consultants in the national health service.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not held centrally.

Medical Accidents

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consideration he has given to setting up an arbitration board to consider compensation in medical accident cases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: A consultation document entitled "Arbitration for Medical Negligence in the National Health Service" was issued by the Department on 29 October. Comments are requested by 31 January 1992: detailed consideration will be given to these responses. Copies of the document are available in the Library.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money has been paid out by regional health authorities as medical accident indemnity since the present scheme started; and how funding to regional health authorities reflects the carrying of indemnity on the regional health authority budget.

Mr. Dorrell: Between January 1990 and March 1991 it is estimated that English health authorities spent about £60 million on costs associated with legal claims for clinical negligence against doctors and dentists in NHS hospitals. This includes payments of damages to plaintiffs, legal and other fees, and in-house expenses. Prior to January 1990 these liabilities were borne by the medical defence organisations. Figures for the financial year 1991-92 are not yet available.

Health authorities meet these costs from within their overall resources. Most regional health authorities operate pooling or other arrangements to assist district health authorities with the costs of large settlements. In addition the NHS has access to funds set up by the medical defence organisations as part of the agreements when these liabilities were passed to the NHS. Between January 1990 and March 1991 payments of some £9 million were authorised from these funds to English health authorities to help meet the cost of settlements.

World Health Organisation

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether Her Majesty's Government has yet decided on their preferred candidate for the position of chairman of the World Health Organisation general assembly in May 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It has been the practice for a number of years for the post of President of the World Health Assembly to be rotated between the six regions of the World Health Organisation—that is, European, Eastern Mediterranean, African, South East Asian, Western Pacific and American. It is left to the region whose turn it is to hold the Presidency to decide which candidate to put forward for nomination to the World Health Assembly. Candidates are normally elected unopposed. In 1992 it will be the turn of the eastern mediterranean region to nominate a candidate for the Presidency.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensions

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on the level and type of national insurance rebates for those who contract out of the state earnings-related pension scheme for the 1993-98 quinquennium.

Miss Widdecombe: We are awaiting the Government actuary's report on his review of the contracting out rebate before determining what the rebate should be for the 1993-98 quinquennium.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, further to his reply of 7 November, Official Report, column 240, how many of the parliamentary questions which were not answered due to disproportionate costs were (a) matters answered by the benefits agency and (b) matters answered by the Department both as a number and as a percentage of total questions answered.

Miss Widdecombe: All 70 questions were answered by Ministers of the Department. These questions represent approximately 3 per cent. of the 2,157 answered during the year. However, 29 answers concerned matters which are the responsibility of the Benefits Agency which represents about 1 per cent. of the questions answered.

Iraqi Students

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received from Scottish local authorities which are funding Iraqi students in Scotland in the form of section 12 payments under the Social Work (Scotland) Act who have no other income following the freezing of Iraqi Government assets in the United Kingdom; and if he intends to introduce social security reforms to provide for students from abroad in an emergency situation such as war.

Miss Widdecombe: I met representatives of Strathclyde regional council and Glasgow district council on 30 September 1991. There are no plans to change the existing provisions in the income support rules relating to students from abroad.

Benefits

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the extra costs (a) to local authorities and (b) to his Department of those additional benefits including (i) poll tax benefit and (ii) housing benefit payable to pensioners as a result of their becoming eligible for income support as a result of the recent uprating statement.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 5 November 1991]: Depending on the numbers of newly eligible pensioners who choose to claim, the total extra cost of their gains through income related benefit provision could be as much as £35 million in a full year. Any costs arising out of extra benefit provision by local authorities will be financed by central Government through the usual subsidy arrangements.

Source: Modelled using data drawn from the 1986-87-88 Family Expenditure Surveys.

ENVIRONMENT

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he intends to bring forward to compensate local authorities for the initial costs incurred as a result of extending compulsory competitive tendering.

Mr. Portillo: None. We expect that any initial costs incurred in preparing for compulsory competitive tendering for additional services will be more than offset by the savings that will result from competition.

Gloucestershire County Council

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the financial position of Gloucestershire county council.

Mr. Key: My right hon. Friend and other Environment Ministers have received a number of representations, including correspondence from county councillors and hon. Members regarding external support for the council. The most recent correspondence received was from my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) and a constituent of his on the subject of support for the fire service.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment by how much the (a) central provision and (b) other funds available to Gloucestershire county council have changed each year since 1979.

Mr. Key: The available information is as follows:

Gloucestershire County Council

[1] In 1980-81, only the needs and resources elements of Rate Support Grant were paid directly to the County. Between 1981-82 and 1989-90 only the Block Grant element of Rate Support Grant was paid to the County. Domestic element, Domestic Rate Relief Grant and Rate Rebate Grant were paid directly to the Districts' Rate Funds. From 1990-91 only Specific Grants are paid directly to the County General Fund. All other grants are paid into the Districts' Collection Funds which is used to fund expenditure by different tiers of authority. It is therefore not possible to say what proportion of the county precept is funded by central Government support, or from other sources.
[2] Needs and Resources Elements of RSG before adjusting for National Pools.
[3] Revised estimate.
[4] Budget estimate.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information is available to his Department on the financial position of Gloucestershire county council.

Mr. Key: The financial information available to the Department for all local authorities includes all the information necessary to calculate grant entitlement and standard spending assessments, authorities' budget estimates for previous years and statements of outturn expenditure for the years to 1989-90. These figures show that in 1989-90 Gloucestershire overspent against their budget by £6·7 million, or 3 per cent.

Social Work Students

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what level of funding for social work student placements has been assumed within the revenue support grant settlement.

Mr. Key: The local authority finance settlement provides for an appropriate level of spending by local authorities on their various functions. The resources made available are not attributed to particular activities.

Docklands Light Railway

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what powers the London Docklands development corporation has south of the River Thames; and how it is intended London Docklands development corporation will run the proposed docklands light railway extension to Lewisham.

Mr. Portillo: Section 136 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 provides that the object of an urban development corporation shall be to secure the regeneration of its area. I consider that an extension of the Docklands light railway to Lewisham will contribute to that object.

Noisy Parties

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further measures he has under consideration to deal with noise nuisance from noisy parties.

Mr. Baldry: The working group set up to consider whether there is a need for further measures to control noisy parties, announced by my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside on 10 September met for the first time on 6 November.

The members of the group are Mr. Richard Ashworth, chief executive (environmental health and trading standards), Merton London borough council; Mr. David Horrocks, head of environmental health services, Brentwood district; Mr. Ron Hadfield, chief constable, West Midlands police; and officials from my Department and the Home Office.

The group are currently considering the extent to which existing legislation to control parties causing excessive noise might be used more effectively. The group expects to go on to consider whether amending legislation may be required.

Direct Labour

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to take against those local authorities whose direct labour organisations made significant financial losses in 1989-90.

Mr. Key: Statutory notices under the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980 and the Local Government Act 1988 were served on 26 local authorities between July and October this year in respect of financial failure in 1989-90. The Secretary of State has now considered the responses of the 11 authorities on whom notices were served at the beginning of July. He has today given directions under section 19B and section 14 of the 1980 and 1988 Acts respectively to Barrow-in-Furness borough council in respect of major new construction, Harrogate borough council (refuse collection, building maintenace, and highways work), Shepway district council (building maintenance), and the London borough of Tower Hamlets (highways work).

He has decided to take no further action in respect of financial failure in 1989-90 against Epsom and Ewell borough council (vehicle maintenance), the London borough of Redbridge (building cleaning), West Devon borough council (refuse collection), North Tyneside metropolitan borough council. (vehicle maintenance), Shepway district council (highways work), the London borough of Camden (minor new works), and Salford city council (in respect of anti-competitive behaviour).

He is still considering the responses of the London borough of Camden, Copeland borough council and Salford city council, all in respect of building maintenance work, and expects to announce his decisions shortly. He is also considering responses from a further nine authorities on whom notices were served on 30 July.

Deer (Richmond and Bushy Park)

Mr. Jessel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he proposes to contract out the deer management in Richmond and Bushy parks.

Mr. Heseltine: Management of deer is a specialised and skilled operation. We have made it clear that we would not contract this out unless we could guarantee the welfare of the animals. Following consultation with the British Deer Society we have concluded that we should continue to undertake deer management in the Richmond and Bushy parks. We will therefore continue to employ three gamekeepers.

Nature conservation is an important element in the management of Richmond and Bushy parks and the gamekeepers will continue caring for wildlife generally. The management of the contracts and the work carried out by the contractor's staff will also take this into account.

PRIME MINISTER

Draft EC Treaties

Mr. Benn: To ask the Prime Minister under what legal authority he would sign any treaties agreed at Maastricht; and what force such treaties would then have in British law.

The Prime Minister: Signature of any treaty agreed at Maastricht would be an Executive act and as such would have no force in the United Kingdom law. Ratification of any treaty is a prerogative act, exercised by the Government on behalf of the Crown. Before the United Kingdom could ratify any treaty signed at Maastricht, its provisions would need to be incorporated into United Kingdom law by amending the European Communities Act 1972.

European Central Bank

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the potential benefits and penalties that would arise from the full operation of a European central bank as currently proposed in the Dutch draft treaty for economic and monetary union.

The Prime Minister: That judgment can be made only if and when the adoption of a single currency becomes a realistic prospect. Under the treaty now under negotiation the earliest date envisaged for the introduction of a single currency is some years away. It will be for the Government and Parliament to assess at that stage the potential benefits and penalties of a European central bank.

Special Advisers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister on how many occasions he has declined to appoint a special adviser nominated for appointment.

The Prime Minister: The appointment of special advisers is a matter for the relevant Minister in consultation with me. It would not be appropriate to give the information requested.

Political Advisers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answers of 5 November, Official Report, column 42 and 11 November, Official Report, column 353, listing current political advisers, if he will list the names of the advisers alongside the Ministers and Department which they serve.

The Prime Minister: The special advisers (political) who are currently serving are:

Name	Department	Minister
Mr. K. Adams	Agriculture, Fisheries and Food	Minister
Mr. H. Harris-Hughes	Cabinet Office (including No. 10)
Mr. J. Hill	Cabinet Office (including No. 10)

South Africa

Mr. Richard Page: To ask the Prime Minister what steps the Government are taking to help prepare black South Africans for a rôle in public administration under a post-apartheid constitution.

The Prime Minister: Our growing aid programme for black South Africans emphasises education and training as the key to enabling black people to play their rightful role in a post-apartheid South Africa. In this context, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and Minister for Overseas Development has announced the Government's plans to help to train those who may become officials within the new political system. This help is open to black South Africans of all parties and to those without political affiliation. We have invited nominees from various political groups, including the African National Congress, the Inkatha Freedom party, the Pan-Africanist Congress and AZAPO, as well as from non-political bodies. A course for potential senior officials will start in January at the Civil Service college. My right hon. Friend is preparing plans for further help in this area.

Environmental Policy

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the priority Her Majesty's Government attache to environmental policy against the Government's other policies.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 14 November 1991]: The Government aim to integrate environmental concern into all policies, as explained in detail in the White Paper, "This Common Inheritance" (Cm 1200) and "This Common Inheritance: The First Year Report". (Cm 1655)

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many (a) nursery schools, (b) primary schools, (c) universities, (d) polytechnics and (e) colleges of further education he has visited in the last 12 months.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has visited a number of varied institutions in the past twelve months, including five primary schools, seven universities, three polytechnics and four colleges of further education.

Standard Spending Assessments

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the local education authorities to which he has sent information or advice regarding the past, current or future component of the standard spending assessment for adult education and local education authority the amounts so specified.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has sent no information or advice on this matter to local education authorities.

Undergraduates

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many undergraduates from the United Kingdom were attending courses in (a) EC countries and (b) non-EC countries in each of the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Estimates prepared by the United Kingdom Erasmus Student Grants Council show that, in academic year 1990-91, some 4,800 United Kingdom domiciled students were studying under ERASMUS arrangements in a higher education institution of another EC member state as part of their United Kingdom undergraduate course.

Information on other United Kingdom students studying abroad is not available centrally.

Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Schools

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing the numbers of members of Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools in each category of job function which will be lost when Her Majesty's inspectorate is reduced to the level proposed in his statement of 27 September 1991.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Detailed decisions of this kind have not been taken and need not be taken at this stage. The figure of 175 is the best estimate that the senior chief inspector and I have made of the eventual size of HMI when they assume their full duties after a suitable transitional period.

LEAs (Employees)

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information is available showing the numbers of teaching and non-teaching employees of each local education authority in 1991.

Mr. Fallon: Numbers of teaching and non-teaching staff employed by local authorities are collected regularly by the joint staffing watch, managed by representatives of local and central Government.

Figures for the education service within each authority for March 1991 are now available and have been placed in the Library.

Class Sizes

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the number of primary school pupils in class sizes of one to 15, 16 to 20, 21 to 25, 26 to 30 and 30 and over, by local education authority for each school year since 1979-80.

Mr. Eggar: It is not possible to provide all the information requested for the number of years stated because of disproportionate cost. Tables showing the number of pupils taught by one teacher in classes of sizes one to 30, 31 to 35, 36 to 40 and 41 and over in maintained primary schools in each local education authority in England for the years 1988 to 1991 (provisional) are being placed in the House of Commons Library.

SCOTLAND

Scottish Ambulance Service (Mileage Allowance)

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the effect of the decision by the Inland Revenue to tax the profit element of the motor car mileage allowances paid to the voluntary car drivers used by the Scottish Ambulance Service.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: We greatly appreciate the work undertaken by the voluntary car drivers and the contribution which they make to the community.

The Inland Revenue's decision mainly affects those volunteer drivers who exceed 4,000 miles per year who will be liable for income tax on the profit element of their mileage allowance. The new tax arrangements will be phased in gradually over a number of years. Only one quarter of the profit element for the period 6 October 1991 to 5 April 1992 and for 1992-93 will be taxed, one half for 1993-94 and three-quarters for 1994-95. Tax will therefore not be payable on the full amount of the profit element until 1995-96.

I have, however, agreed that mileage allowances for voluntary car drivers should be substantially increased. The new rates are:

27·7p per mile for motor vehicles up to 1500cc and 33·2p per mile for motor vehicles over 1500cc.

This represents an increase of nearly 10 per cent. These rates will be kept under review and are backdated to 1 October 1991.

WALES

Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowance

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will make it his policy to increase the hectarage payments made under the hill livestock compensatory allowance to the level of the limit set by the European Community;

(2) if he will make it his policy to increase the level of headage payments for (a) cows, (b) hardy breeding ewes and (c) other ewes in both severely disadvantaged and disadvantaged areas.

Mr. David Hunt: The payment arrangements for the hill livestock compensatory allowance scheme are considered within the context of the autumn review of economic conditions and prospects for our hill and upland farmers. The HLCA payment arrangements to apply from 1 January 1992 will be announced as soon as possible.

Road Improvements

162. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the total expenditure by his Department on local road improvements, at constant prices, in each year between 1979 and 1990.

Mr. David Hunt: Expenditure on local roads in Wales is the responsibility of each county highway authority. Capital expenditure on new construction and improvement and current expenditure on highway maintenance, structural maintenance (including bridges), lighting, street cleaning, and other highways purposes, at constant prices are:

Road construction index 1st quarter 1990 prices (£ million)

	Capital	Current	Total
1979-80	53·5	72·8	126·2
1980-81	61·6	81·4	143·0
1981-82	62·9	113·7	176·6
1982-83	83·5	99·7	183·2
1983-84	73·1	109·7	182·8
1984-85	67·5	108·4	175·9
1985-86	74·7	103·1	177·8
1986-87	83·1	120·9	204·0
1987-88	79·8	111·5	191·2
1988-89	60·8	111·0	171·8
1989-90	73·3	124·6	197·9
[1]1990-91	78·3	133·9	212·2

[1] Provisional.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the outstanding applications for road bypass schemes before his Department, and the date on which each application was initially submitted.

Mr. David Hunt: Trunk road bypass schemes are added to the programme as a result of route and feasibility studies and have been listed in successive editions of "Roads in Wales". Current plans are given in the supplement to "Roads in Wales: Progress and Plans for the 1990s" published in February.

Applications from local authorities for transport grant support in 1992-93 include bypass schemes. These are under consideration and an announcement will be made shortly.

Nurses

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total number of nursing posts filled in Wales in each year from 1986 to 1990.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Information on the whole time equivalent (wte) number of nursing and midwifery staff in Wales is given in the following table:

	wte[1]
1986	27,187
1987	27,764
1988	27,920
1989	28,037
1990	28,093

[1] At 30 September.

The increase of 906 in the number of nurses in the Welsh NHS in just four years is an indication of the Government's commitment to improving the NHS.

Home Improvement Grants

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will list the specific criteria and allowances in means tesing applicants for mandatory and discretionary home improvement grants.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Details of the test of resources are contained in "The Housing Renovation etc. Grants (Reduction of Grant) Regulations 1990 (SI 1990 No. 1189)" (as amended) copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House.

Sheep Scab

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of sheep scab there were in Wales during the last 12 months; what were the corresponding figures for 1970 and 1980; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: In the last 12 months 14 cases of sheep scab were reported in Wales. No cases were reported in 1970 and 1980.

Aberystwyth Harbour

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to develop the harbour at Aberystwyth, Cardiganshire during the next five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Ceredigion district council has submitted a bid for additional resources under the projects of regional or national importance (PRNI) scheme to enable them to provide infrastructure works prior to development of a marina. This bid, together with all others received under the PRNI scheme is presently being considered.

EMPLOYMENT

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many applicants have been accepted under the new enterprise allowance scheme; and if he will give the figures by regional or local authority area.

Mr. Jackson: New flexibilities in the operation of the enterprise allowance scheme were introduced on 1 April 1991 for existing TECs. TECs going live after that date were able to use the flexibilities when they became operational.

In the current financial year, to 15 September, 22,294 people in England and Wales have started a new business with the help of an enterprise allowance. A regional breakdown of these entrants is shown in the table. It is not possible to give a breakdown of entrants by local authority area.

Region	Participants
Northern	1,375
North West	3,397
Yorkshire and Humberside	2,770
West Midlands	2,238
East Midlands and Anglia	2,541
South East	2,387
South West	2,560
London	3,163
Wales	1,863

Training, Cumbria

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons were on ET sponsored training programmes in each travel-to-work area in Cumbria for each month since January 1990.

Mr. Jackson: The information is not available in the format requested. The following table gives the numbers of people in Employment Training (ET) in the area covered by Cumbria training and enterprise council for each month from January 1990 to September 1991.

Period ending	ET in training (actual in period)
January 1990	1,380

[1] Estimate.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what study he has made of the extent to which the recession in British industry is influencing the decision of employers acting as work experience providers for young people under the YT programme in the county of Cumbria.

Mr. Jackson: In Cumbria, as in other parts of the country, training opportunities are dependent on employers' participation in the training programme. With my support TECs are actively promoting the commitment of employers to investment in training. The Government are committed to ensuring the availability of suitable training for young people under the terms of its YT guarantee.

School Leavers

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many school leavers for the year 1991 were awaiting places on YT schemes as of mid-September 1991.

Mr. Jackson: The information requested is not available centrally.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish the range of payments made by TEC's to managing agents under ET in the counties of Northumbria, Cumbria, Lancashire, Cheshire, Surrey and Kent, separately.

Mr. Jackson: It is not possible to provide this information. Details of financial arrangements between training and enterprise councils and their training managers are commercial-in-confidence.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish a table showing, for Greater London and for each TEC area in London, the number of youth training and employment training places which were available 12 months ago, and are available for and specifically targeted at (a) people with learning difficulties, (b) people whose first language is not English, (c) people with physical disabilities and (d) ex-offenders.

Mr. Jackson: The information is not available as requested.

All ET and YT places are available to the four groups of clients listed, provided that they meet the eligibility criteria for the two programmes.

The Government have guaranteed that all young people who are under 18 and not in full-time education or a job and are seeking training are offered and if necessary re-offered, a suitable youth training place. The Government remain committed to ensuring that the YT guarantee is met and has ensured that adequate funding is available to do so.

The Government require that an ET place is provided for people in the Government's guarantee and aim groups who wish to enter ET. The guarantee group is those aged 18 to 24 who have been unemployed for six months or more but less than 12 months, the aim group is those aged 18 to 49 who have been unemployed for two years or more and those people with disabilities, regardless of the length of time of the latters unemployment.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish a table showing the number of YT and ET places available now and 12 months ago in the area of each TEC in London, and the total for Greater London, and also the comparable figures for the number of places occupied.

Mr. Jackson: The information is not available in the form requested.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish estimates for each TEC area in London, and for Greater London as a whole, for the numbers of people eligible now and 12 months ago for YT and ET places.

Mr. Jackson: The information is not available in the format requested.

All young people in the 16 and 17 age group are eligible for YT if they do not stay on at school, do not go on to further education, or do not have a full time job.

The following table shows numbers in the 16 and 17 age group by training and enterprise council (TEC) area in London. Many of these young people will have other options available to them.

The Government have guaranteed that all young people who are under 18 and not in full-time education or a job and are seeking training are offered and if necessary re-offered, a suitable youth training place. The Government remain committed to ensuring that the YT guarantee is met and have ensured that adequate funding is available to do so.

The information requested relating to ET is not available. However, the Government require that an ET place is provided for people in the Government's guarantee and aim groups who wish to enter ET. The guarantee group is those aged 18 to 24 who have been unemployed for six months or more but less than 12 months, and the aim group is those aged 18 to 49 who have been unemployed for two years or more and those people with disabilities, regardless of the length of time of the latters unemployment.

Tributyltin Oxide

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will place in the Library a copy of the letter from J. D. McGuinness and the Health and Safety Executive on tributyltin oxide.

Mr. Jackson: Yes. The letter from Dr. J. McGuinness to the US Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) was sent on behalf of the Health and Safety Executive in May 1990. It is a covering letter, sent with a copy of the publicly available Tributyltin Oxide review for information purposes. A copy of the review and accompanying letter, will be made in the Library.

Earnings Statistics

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report the number and percentage of people, working full-time and part-time earning less than (a) £3·40 an hour, (b) £4·00 an hour, (c) £4·60 an hour and (d) £5·20 an hour respectively; and if he will give the information separately for men and women and, in each case, those aged (i) under 17 years, (ii) under 18 years, (iii) 18 years to 20 years and (iv) 21 years to 24 years, respectively.

Mr. Jackson: The information available from the 1991 "New Earnings Survey" closest to that requested is given in the following tables.

Employees whose pay was not affected by absence and whose gross hourly earnings (excluding overtime) were less than specified amounts April 1991

Invoice Payments

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on his Department's survey of the Government's performance in paying invoices, particularly to small and medium-sized companies.

Mr. Jackson: The Government believe that it is important that all organisations recognise their responsibilities to their suppliers by settling accounts on time. I recognise that Government should itself set an example to both the private and public sectors. All Government Departments are committed to ensuring that they pay within agreed terms or, if there is no contractual provision or other understanding governing the timing of payment, within 30 days of receipt of goods or a valid invoice, whichever is the later. Furthermore, my hon. Friend, the Minister for Small Firms, has offered to follow up individual cases of delayed payments to small firms by Government Departments.

During the financial year 1991-92, major spending Departments are undertaking surveys of their payment performance and making a return to the Department. The surveys will encompass payments to businesses of all sizes. The results will be published as soon as possible after the end of the financial year.

Employment Action

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish a table showing the number of employment action places in London which were (a) established and (b) occupied, for each training and enterprise council area in London and for Greater London as a whole.

Mr. Jackson: Contracts for employment action are for the number of participant weeks to be delivered rather than the number of places. The exact terms of such contracts must be commercial in confidence.

For London as a whole we aim to have sufficient provision in place by March 1992 to help about 4,400 people. I am confident that we will meet that target.

We have instituted a system for collecting management information, including numbers of participants in place. The first returns from that system will be available shortly.

Travel to Interview Scheme

Mr. Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the working of the travel to interview scheme for people seeking employment; how many people have received help with travel costs in each of the past four years; what is the average amount paid; and what help residents in the Faversham constituency may receive for travel to London for job interviews.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service Executive Agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list the numbers of industrial tribunal members; and how many are (a) black, (b) Asian and (c) women.

Mr. Jackson: I have been asked to reply.

There are 1,599 members of the industrial tribunals, of whom 382 are women. Information on the racial origin of members has been systematically collected only since 1986 and is not available in the form requested. However, of the 1,599 lay members we estimate that there are 50 from the ethnic minorities: 18 Afro-Caribbean, 15 Asian and 17 whose particular racial origin is not currently recorded.

DEFENCE

Wrens

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the number of Wrens at sea on Royal Naval ships on 1 November.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The total number of members of the Womens Royal Naval Service serving in seagoing ships of the Royal Navy on 1 November 1991 was 330, comprising 31 WRNS officers, 15 officer cadets and 284 WRNS ratings.

Hangar, Cardington

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department expects to raise from the sale of the five acre hangar at Cardington, Bedfordshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The former No. 1 and No. 2 airship hangars at Cardington, Bedfordshire, were disposed of in 1986 and 1989 respectively. The sum realised from their disposal is a matter of commercial confidentiality.

Boards of Inquiry

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will take steps to ensure that when Ministry of Defence board of inquiry reports are released by order of a judge, they are not restricted to professional advisers.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is common practice in legal proceedings to confine disclosure of documents to the parties and their professional advisers. It is, of course, for the courts to decide the precise terms of any order for the discovery of documents.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions in the last year his Department has been ordered by a judge to release documents relating to a board of inquiry report following the death of a service man; what has been the response of the Ministry; and whether all the requested papers have been handed over unabridged.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Department has been subject to an order for discovery to include a board of inquiry report on only one occasion in the last year in the case of Russell Edward Ferrante (Administrator of the Estate of Simeon Mervyn Ferrante deceased) v. Secretary of State for Defence. In that particular case the Department has made every effort to supply documents covered by the order to the plaintiff. Correspondence between respective solicitors on the terms of the order continue.

Anglo-French Nuclear Missile

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will publish details of the arrangements being made to supply tritium and plutonium for the recently announced Anglo-French air launch nuclear missile;

(2) what is the source of the tritium and plutonium to be used in the warhead to be fitted to the recently announced Anglo-French air launch nuclear missile; and who is to be the primary contractor to supply the tritium and plutonium.

Mr. Alan Clark: There has been no recent announcement of an Anglo-French air-launched nuclear missile. We are continuing to study options for the replacement, in due course, of our WE177 free-fall bombs. No final decision has been taken.

Army (Operating Costs)

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated annual operating cost of (a) an armoured regiment, (b) a regular infantry battalion and (c) a Territorial Army infantry battalion.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Operating costs vary according to a unit's composition and its precise task at the time. Estimated annual operating costs for 1991-92 are as follows:

	United Kingdom £ million	BAOR £ million
Armoured regiment	15·0	15·0
Infantry battalion	12·5 to 15·0	17·0
TA Infantry battalion	2·0	—

These figures do not include either civilian support costs or the procurement costs of major weapon platforms operated by these units.

Army (Manpower Reductions)

Mrs. Heal: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence between what dates colonels and colonels commandant of the Army's regiments and corps were consulted about the proposed reductions in manpower.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: All regimental colonels and colonels commandant were involved between 4 June and 2 July 1991 in the formal consultative process which took place before decisions were taken upon how the reductions in the combat arms should be achieved. The representative colonels commandant of the logistic corps were similarly consulted on the logistic support review as it developed.

Trident

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his estimate of the cost of cancelling (a) the entire Trident submarine programme, (b) the fourth Trident and (c) the building projects at Coulport and Faslane, under the liquidated damages clauses in the contracts.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The costs of cancellation of the Trident programme as a whole, or of any element within it, would depend on the timing of the cancellation and would reflect the contractors' properly incurred liabilities at the time of termination. These costs should be less than the total amount committed, which currently stands at about £6 billion.

Former Ministry Property, Gosport

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action his Department is taking to assist in the resolution of the problems arising from the collapse of balconies at blocks of flats and maisonettes at Rowner, Gosport, which were originally owned by the Ministry of Defence and are now in private or local authority ownership.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Ministry of Defence officials met Gosport borough council officers on 10 October 1991 to discuss the problem and agreed to attend a further meeting once the final report from the Building Research Establishment had been received. I understand that the council now has the report; my officials will meet council officers in the near future. My Department will of course consider sympathetically any proposals for the future of the properties put forward by the council.

Gulf War (Friendly Fire)

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in the light of information handed to Her Majesty's ambassador in Washington by the United States Administration on the Warrior/A-10 incident in the Gulf war regarding British service men killed by friendly fire, if he will now launch a further inquiry into this matter to clarify the apparent contradictions in evidence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No. As I made clear in the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) on 24 July at column 706, the board of inquiry was unable to resolve a conflict of evidence on the passing of a target grid reference to the A-10 pilots or establish why the Warrior vehicles were misidentified. The letter from the United States Administration to Her Majesty's ambassador in Washington confirms that all relevant information was passed to the board of inquiry and that no new evidence is available. A copy of that letter was placed in the Library of the House on 12 November.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Public Limited Companies

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to introduce legislation to require all public limited company auditors signing the audit report to state whether the firm within the preceding five years has been criticised by his Department's inspectors.

Mr. Redwood: No.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry following the provisions of the Companies Act 1989, from what date auditing firms will be able to set up limited liability companies.

Mr. Redwood: Since 1 October there has been no statutory bar on the appointment of a limited liability company as a company auditor provided it is eligible for appointment under the rules of its recognised supervisory body.

Supervisory Bodies

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to appoint an independent ombudsman to hear complaints against the recognised supervisory bodies.

Mr. Redwood: No. When recognising the supervisory bodies my right hon. Friend was satisfied that they met the statutory requirement to have effective arrangements for the investigation of complaints against them.

Textile Industry

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will see a delegation of hon. Members to discuss the textile industry.

Mr. Leigh: The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Technology has arranged to meet a delegation early in December.

Post Office

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to reduce the £1 threshold of the letter monopoly.

Mr. Lilley: As stated in the citizens charter, we propose to reduce the Post Office's letter monopoly from its present level of £1 to a level much closer to that of the first-class letter stamp. This will require legislation.

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the negative external finance limit targets achieved by the Post Office for each year since 1979, together with the cumulative amount expressed (a) as a total and (b) at April 1991 prices.

Mr. Lilley: Negative external finance limit achievements by the Post Office since 1979 appear in the table (a) at outturn and (b) at April 1991 values. With effect from 1989-90, pay bill creditors have been excluded from working capital for the purposes of the external finance limit calculation. The effect of this adjustment is expected to be neutral in the long term. Figures adjusted to take account of this change are also given from 1985-86, the earliest date for which this information is available.

Machine Tools Industry

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to bring about increased investment in the machine tools industry and to prevent further redundancies.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 11 November 1991]: The Government can best help the machine tool industry by providing a stable economic framework based on low inflation. In the past year inflation has fallen from 11 per cent. to about 4 per cent., allowing interest rates to fall by 4·5 percentage points. Output is set to rise in the second half of this year and to rise still faster in 1992, with manufacturing growing faster than the economy as a whole.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Civil Service Pensions

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any plans to extend the arrangements made by the civil service pension scheme for the payment of pensions to the widows of post-retirement marriages to include those widows of such marriages whose husbands retired before 6 April 1978.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The Government's position in respect of the payment of pensions, under the civil service pension scheme, to the widows of post-retirement marriages has not changed since I replied to a similar question from my hon. Friend on 14 December last year. There are no plans to extend the present arrangements so that account is taken of pensionable service before 6 April 1978.

Banks (Interest Rates)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any plans to introduce legislation to require the banks in their annual reports to reveal the highest interest rate charged by them during the year.

Mr. Maples: No. The rate of interest charged by banks depends on the particular circumstances in which funds are being lent and I do not think it would be appropriate to require banks to publish such figures.

Inflation

Mr. Lawson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average underlying rate of inflation, defined in terms of the retail prices index excluding mortgage interest payments, between June 1985 and October 1991.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Between June 1985 and October 1991 the retail prices index excluding mortgage interest payments increased at an average annual rate of 5·3 per cent.

Cardiff Wales Airport (Customs)

Mr. John P. Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will instruct Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to restore permanent customs cover at Cardiff Wales airport.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The permanent customs cover at Cardiff Wales airport has not been withdrawn. The staff have been re-located for reasons of efficiency to other premises outside the airport but will continue to fulfil the same functions as prior to their re-location.

Iraqi Assets

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to release the assets of the Iraqi Government in the National Westminster bank in London; and if he will negotiate with the Iraqi Government to ensure that this money is not removed from Britain but is used to fund Iraqi students studying in the United Kingdom and allow them to repay loans received from local authorities since the freezing of Iraqi assets.

Mr. Maples: The United Nations Sanctions Committee has informed national Governments where Iraqi assets are held that they have discretion to unfreeze them to pay for approved humanitarian purposes. There could be no question of unfreezing assets for purposes incompatible with United Nations decisions.

The Bank of England will, however, continue to consider applications to debit Iraqi accounts for living, medical, educational and similar expenses in the United Kingdom of residents of Iraq. So far, no such applications have been received to meet the fees of students sponsored by the Iraqi Government.

Drug Smuggling

Mr. John P. Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to improve the control of illegal drugs coming into the United Kingdom at Cardiff Wales airport.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The recent national review of anti-smuggling controls which has taken place within the Customs and Excise department has directed resources far more towards areas of risk and has increased the flexibility of staff to address those risks. Flexible anti-smuggling teams are being used at Cardiff Wales airport and these have improved the controls to combat the importation of illegal drugs both there and in other parts of the executive unit.

Companies

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any plans to amend the tax laws relating to groups of companies.

Mr. Maude: There are various tax provisions which treat a group of companies as if it were a single company. Two weaknesses in the legislation have come to light where tax benefits could be enjoyed by companies in a way that does not properly reflect commercial reality. We intend to introduce provisions in the next Finance Bill to correct these defects.

The first point concerns circumstances in which there are "arrangements" in existence in respect of shares and whether they are taken into account in determining whether a group of consortium relationship exists between two companies. This issue was considered in the case of J. Sainsbury plc v. O'Connor in which judgment was given by the Court of Appeal earlier this year. The effect of that judgment was that, for the purposes of the provisions of schedule 18 to the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 about one company's entitlement to profits and assets of another, share "arrangements" mean arrangements to vary rights attaching to particular shares but not, as the Inland Revenue had previously thought, arrangements involving changes in the ownership of shares. The legislation we propose introducing will extend the definition of arrangements to cover cases where arrangements exist for the whole or part of a company's holding of shares or securities to be disposed of to, or otherwise effectively reduced in favour of, another party. This is the way the Inland Revenue used to interpret the law. The new legislation will, if passed by Parliament, take effect for arrangements which come into existence on or after today.

The second point concerns the transfer of assets between companies in the same group. When this happens, any capital gain is generally deferred. When a company leaves a group still holding an asset on which gains have been deferred, a charge can be raised to recover the tax on the deferred gains. But when a company leaves a group in the course of the winding up of another group member, the company may be able to benefit from a defect in the law and avoid paying tax on those deferred gains. The legislation correcting this defect will, if passed by Parliament, also take effect where a company leaves a group on or after today.

The Inland Revenue will consult interested parties about the details of both aspects of this new legislation. We intend to publish draft clauses to help those consultations. Further details are in a press release issued today by the Inland Revenue.

Citizens Charter

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give details of all the additional charters in the various service areas which arise directly from the citizens charter; and when each of the new charters will be published.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 14 November 1991]: I have been asked to reply. To date, 12 charters have been published:

Education
The Parent's Charter (England)
The Parent's Charter in Scotland
A Charter for Parents in Wales

Health
The Patient's Charter (England)
The Patient's Charter in Scotland
A Charter for Patients in Wales

Revenue
The Taxpayer's Charter (Inland Revenue)
The Taxpayer's Charter (HM Customs & Excise)

National Insurance
A Contributors' Charter
An Employers' Charter

Employment
Redundancy Payments Service Charter

Justice
The Justice Charter for Scotland

Further charters to be published include tenant's charters. Benefits Agency customer's charter, and charters for passengers, jobseekers and customs and excise businesses.

Charters are an important way of informing citizens about their entitlements, the standards of service they can expect; and what to do when things go wrong.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

EC Social Charter

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom has ratified the European social charter of the Council of Europe; if he will list the member states of the Council of Europe which have ratified the charter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The United Kingdom ratified the European social charter of the Council of Europe on 11 July 1962 and was the first state to do so. Since then, the charter has been ratified by Austria, Belgium, Cyprus, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, Malta, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and Turkey. The United Kingdom regards the charter as an important statement of economic and social principles which recognises that the same obligations can be met through a diversity of systems and practices.

Draft EC Treaties

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will state the number of new articles proposed in the material for draft treaties proposed by the Dutch presidency of the European Community; and if he will state the number and scope of new treaties which would be required to implement these draft proposals other than amendments to current treaties;

(2) if he will list the numbers of those articles of the current version of the treaty of Rome which would be amended, replaced, or repealed by the current Dutch texts of draft treaties on economic, monetary and political union.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The draft treaty amendments on economic and monetary union circulated by the Netherlands Presidency on 28 October and the draft treaty on the union issued by the Presidency on 8 November comprise a comprehensive account of which articles of the treaty of Rome it is proposed should be amended, replaced, repealed or remain unchanged. In addition, the latter includes a number of new articles relating to the establishment of a European union, as opposed to the European Community. It is intended that all these amendments and new articles should be included in one treaty. Copies of all of these proposals are available in the Library of the House.

If these proposals were retained in any treaty signed by the United Kingdom, then United Kingdom law would need to be amended to ensure that legal provision existed for us to meet our treaty obligations before ratification of the treaty could take place. We anticipate that this legislation will take the form of an amendment to the European Communities Act, 1972, adding to the definition of "the Community Treaties" therein those provisions of the Maastricht agreement which amend the Community treaties.

EC Foreign Ministers Meeting

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EC Foreign Ministers conclave meeting held in Noordwijk between 12 and 13 November.

Mr. Hurd: At their conclave in Noordwijk on 12-13 November, Foreign Ministers discussed the latest Netherlands Presidency draft treaty on political union. My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and I represented the United Kingdom.

I made clear, as did others, that nothing could be agreed until everything was agreed, and that if the package on the table at Maastricht was not acceptable to the United Kingdom, we would not agree it.

The conclave made useful progress in some areas. A broad consensus emerged on a number of treaty articles, including a number of our own proposals. These included a power for the European Court of Justice to fine member states who failed to comply with its judgments; a strengthening of financial accountability in the Community; and other non-legislative powers of the European Parliament. There was broad consensus on a text on citizenship, which safeguards the right of member states to determine who should be a national. The proposal to establish a consultative regional body was broadly endorsed.

There was a detailed discussion of proposed extensions of Community competence and qualified majority voting. No agreement was reached and this issue will be considered again at a further conclave on 2 December.

It was recognised that several other issues would be resolved only by the European Council at Maastricht. These included:

- the legislative powers of the European Parliament;
- proposals to strengthen inter-governmental co-operation on interior and justice matters, in a separate "pillar" of the union treaty;
- a common foreign and security policy, with a possible defence dimension.'

HOUSE OF COMMONS

European Legislation

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Lord President of the Council what consideration he has given to the impact of the granting of veto powers in the European Parliament on the scrutiny process of European legislation in the House.

Mr. MacGregor [holding answer 11 November 1991]: The proposals under consideration in the inter-governmental conference on political union to extend the powers of the European Parliament would, if agreed, have no direct impact on the process of scrutiny of European legislation in the House. The Government have made clear in the intergovernmental conference the importance they attach to effective scrutiny of proposals for European legislation by national Parliaments and has tabled a draft conference declaration to this effect.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Wild Birds (Imports)

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what action he is taking to investigate the reasons for repeated high mortality of certain species of imported wild birds including humming birds;

(2) whether, following the recent report by the joint Nature Conservation Committee, he has exchanged information with exporting and other importing countries concerning the mortality of imported wild birds;

(3) what measures he intends to take to reduce the rate of mortality among wild-caught birds which are imported into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: The Government share the concern about the mortality levels of birds in trade, which we consider unacceptably high. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment and I wrote recently to the European Commissioners for the Environment and Agriculture, urging that action should be taken through the Community to ensure much stricter controls on this trade. We have asked, among other things, for measures to be drawn up to address the problem of trade in species which are particularly vulnerable to stress and mortality as a result of transport or captivity. In relation to the conditions of transport, the Community has recently agreed a new directive on the protection of all types of animals including birds during transport. This contains some important new provisions including a requirement for air transport to be carried out in accordance with the International Air Transport Association (IATA) guidelines. It also, following pressure from the British Government for specific action on this issue, requires the Council to adopt further conditions on transport of wild birds.

Carcases of birds dead on arrival or which die in quarantine are examined at veterinary investigation centres for evidence of infectious diseases which could spread to the national poultry flock. During these investigations it has been established that the most common cause of death is considered to be stress associated with malnutrition, dehydration, adverse environmental condition or enteropathies. Other specific causes of death recorded are salmonellosis, psittacosis, mycotic pneumonia and coliseptic aemia. In relation to nectar feeders such as hummingbirds mortality is considered likely to be associated with difficulties in adapting to an artificial feeding regime.

The Department is reviewing animal health conditions and health certification requirements for imports to ensure that only birds which are healthy and fit to travel are exported from their country of origin. Senior ministry veterinary officials have visited a number of major exporting countries to discuss with their veterinary authorities various animal health and welfare matters, the standard of health certification and the conditions under which future imports of captive birds would take place, and have made it clear that we will cease to authorise imports from countries which fail to co-operate. Letters have been sent to airlines to emphasise the importance of complying with IATA rules and of reviewing their handling procedures. There is an ongoing review of quarantine premises and their operational standards, the level of veterinary supervision and stocking rates. Additional training has been instituted for official veterinary officers responsible for approving and supervising quarantine premises.

Copies of the Ministry's annual mortality statistics among imported birds are circulated widely to various interests including importing and exporting countries.

Bovine Spongiform Encaphalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 11 November, Official Report, column 421, what were the dates of birth of the three cattle; and what research he has undertaken of possible causes of BSE in these cattle.

Mr. Maclean: The dates of birth for these cattle were September 1988, November 1988 and June 1989. Detailed epidemiological investigations are being carried out into these cases to establish whether there has been any inadvertent feed contamination and assess the potential for maternal and horizontal routes of infection.

In the case of the animal born in November 1988 our inquiries have almost certainly ruled out a feed source. As its dam also had BSE we cannot rule out the possibility of maternal transmission. Even if it was, the advice we have had from the independent Tyrell committee is that all the necessary safeguards are in place and there should be no change of policy or approach. Inquiries into the other two cases are not complete.

Farmers

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the number of farmers who stopped farming in the 10 months to the end of October 1991.

Mr. Curry: This information is not available.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list any proposal in the matters being considered by the intergovernmental conferences on economic, monetary and political union which are directly or indirectly relevant to the common agricultural policy; and if he will list the changes envisaged in the relevant articles of the present treaty of Rome.

Mr. Curry: No changes to title II (Agriculture) of the treaty of Rome are being considered by the intergovernmental conferences. However, the administration of the common agricultural policy will be affected by the United Kingdom proposals, accepted by the conference, to strengthen financial accountability and compliance with judgments of the European Court of Justice.

Triazophos

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans his Advisory Committee on Pesticides has to alter the maximum residue level of triazophos; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The Advisory Committee on Pesticides is currently considering triazophos. I shall take account of its recommendations in determining the appropriate maximum residue level.

Citrus Fruits (Pesticides)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what testing is carried out on soft citrus fruits and sweet oranges to assess pesticide residue levels at their port of entry; whether they are refused entry if they contain pesticide residues above the maximum residue levels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Citrus fruit are monitored each year by the Government's working party of pesticide residues. Where residues in such produce are found in excess of maximum residue levels follow-up action is taken with the authorities in the supplying country to ensure that the problem is resolved.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 198

SESSION 1991–92

31st October—15th November 1991

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc, between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes and cannot therefore, be used in connection with the daily part or weekly Hansard. For these versions use the Fortnightly Index.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speaker's rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Money res = money resolution, Com = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
